offense cases, unless inherently incredible, "courts should be particularly wary of collateral sexual offense evidence...." Id. (citing Syl. Pt. 5, State v. Beck, 167 W.Va. 830, 286 S.E.2d 234 (1981)). Finally, this Court specifically held "[i]t is impermissible for collateral sexual offenses to be admitted into evidence solely to show a defendant's improper or lustful disposition toward his victim." Id. 176 W.Va. at 690, 347 S.E.2d at 210, Syl. Pt. 7. To the extent that the Dolin decision finds evidence introduced to show lustful disposition to be impermissible in cases involving child victims, it is overruled.

The importance of allowing such evidence to be admitted under a lustful disposition exception was noted in the dissenting opinion to Dolin in which Justice McHugh, joined by Justice Brotherton, stated that > [t]he victim's testimony as a crucial element of the State's case must be examined in context in order to establish a complete record of events, thereby reducing the incredibility of the victim's testimony. Therefore, carving out a sexual propensity exception allows the finder of facts to weigh the credibility of the victim's unabridged testimony.

176 W.Va. at 699, 347 S.E.2d at 220. We find this rationale to be particularly applicable in cases involving child victims. This is evident since these cases generally pit the child's credibility against an adult's credibility and often times an adult family member's credibility. Since sexual abuse committed against children is such an aberrant behavior, most people find it easier to dismiss the child's testimony as being coached or made up or conclude that any touching of a child's private parts by an adult must have been by accident. In addition, children often have greater difficulty than adults in establishing precise dates of incidents of sexual abuse, not only because small children don't possess the same grasp of time as adults, See footnote 12 but because they obviously may not report acts of sexual abuse promptly, either because they are abused by a primary care-taker and authority figure and are therefore unaware such conduct is wrong, or because of threats of physical harm by one in almost total control of their life. In most cases of sexual abuse against children by a care-taker or relative, the acts of sexual abuse transpire over a substantial period of time, often several years. Consequently, under the existing collateral acts rule, a child victim is unable to present the complete record of events forming the context of the crime. Lastly, there is a common misconception that children have a greater propensity than adults to imagine or fabricate stories of sexual abuse. Research indicates, however, that absent coaching, children are far less likely to lie about matters in the sexual realm than adults, See footnote 13 and that absent sexual experience there is little means by which children can imagine sexual transactions. See footnote 14 In consideration of all these factors, the probative value of such testimony far outweighs the potential for unfair prejudice.

Therefore, collateral acts or crimes may be introduced in cases involving child sexual assault or sexual abuse victims to show the perpetrator had a lustful disposition towards the victim, a lustful disposition to children generally, or a lustful disposition to specific other children, provided such acts occurred reasonably close in time to the incident(s) giving rise to the indictment. To the extent this conflicts with our decision in State v. Dolin, 176 W.Va. 688, 347 S.E.2d 208 (1986) it is overruled. In adopting such an exception to W.Va.R.Evid. 404(b) we follow a number of other jurisdictions which have permitted such evidence to be admitted in sexual assault or abuse cases on the theory that such evidence shows the accused's incestuous and lustful attitude toward that particular person, See footnote 15 and upon the theory that in cases involving child victims, a full disposition of the facts forming the context of the crime presents a fairer opportunity for the triers of fact to assess the credibility of the witnesses.

Finally, the evidence that the appellant patted the front of his pants, would masturbate after having sex, See footnote 16 and would lean against the washing machine during the spin cycle was not relevant to the issues at trial, and its admission was error. We reach this conclusion because it appears this evidence was introduced solely for the purpose of proving the character of the defendant and his propensity for obtaining sexual gratification in unusual ways. There was no evidence that these particular instances either occurred in the presence of the children or as part of the transactions with them. We further find, however, that this error was harmless. We base our decision on the Fourth Circuit Court of Appeals decision in United States v. Davis, 657 F.2d 637 (4th Cir.1981). In Davis, the court found harmless error where the lower court admitted testimony concerning alleged sales of heroin to twelve or thirteen-year-old children that were made some six to eleven years before the current offenses of conspiracy to distribute heroin were supposed to have begun.

The court stated that "[t]he test for harmlessness for nonconstitutional error is when it is probable that the error could have affected the verdict reached by the particular jury in the particular circumstances of the trial." Id. at 640 (emphasis added) (citingUnited States v. Nyman, 649 F.2d 208 (4th Cir.1980)). The court further opined that it was proper to consider other evidence which tended to show the defendant's guilt and that in this case "the evidence supporting Carter's [the defendant's] conviction was so conclusive that it is altogether unlikely that the error affected the verdict." Davis, 657 F.2d at 640.

Similarly, in West Virginia, we have held that the test for determining whether the introduction of improper evidence at trial constitutes harmless error is:

> '(1) the inadmissible evidence must be removed from the State's case and a determination made as to whether the remaining evidence is sufficient to convince impartial minds of the defendant's guilt beyond a reasonable doubt;

> (2) if the remaining evidence is found to be insufficient, the error is not harmless;
> (3) if the remaining evidence is sufficient to support the conviction, an analysis must then be made to determine whether the error had any prejudicial effect on the jury.'

Syl. Pt. 3, in part, State v. Maynard, 183 W.Va. 1, 393 S.E.2d 221 (1990) (quoting Syl. Pt. 6, State v. Smith, 178 W.Va. 104, 358 S.E.2d 188 (1987); Syl. Pt. 2, State v. Atkins, 163 W.Va. 502, 261 S.E.2d 55 (1979), cert. denied, 445 U.S. 904, 100 S.Ct. 1081, 63 L.Ed.2d 320 (1980)).

In the present case, the evidence which was properly introduced certainly constituted a sufficient basis to support the convictions. While obtaining sexual gratification from the movement of a washing machine is unusual, it certainly is not the sort of evidence which would have any real prejudicial effect against a defendant such as to cause a jury to convict him. Since the evidence of masturbation actually involved sexual activity with an adult, the defendant's wife, it would seem to indicate the defendant's normalcy in the sexual arena. In the face of such direct evidence as the testimony of the two victims, this evidence cannot seriously be considered to have had any prejudicial effect on the jury's consideration of the issues.

In cases of this sort, where the victims themselves testify and where the defendant testifies and denies the charges, it really comes down to whether the jury believes that the victims are telling the truth, or that they are lying, either because of their own motivations or as a result of having been coached or coerced. Thus, the likelihood that the improperly admitted evidence had any prejudicial effect whatsoever on the jury is minimal.

II.

The appellant contends the trial court committed plain error when it permitted the victim's mother, Sharon L., and the psychologist, Greg Trainor, to testify concerning the children's extrajudicial statements which directly implicated the appellant. These statements were made between one and four years after these sexual assaults allegedly took place. The state contends that not only did the appellant fail to object to this testimony, but the appellant utilized the testimony to bolster his own theory of the case--which was that the children were coached by their mother and thereby fabricated the alleged offenses against the appellant stemming from the parent's divorce--and that Trainor's testimony was not offered solely to bolster the credibility of the child witnesses but was also offered to give his opinion as to whether the children fit the profile of child sexual abuse victims and whether they were sexually abused.

In order to address the issue of whether the psychologist's testimony and the victims' mother's testimony was properly admitted it is helpful to examine each of the witness' testimony separately. First, the psychologist's testimony included the following excerpts:

> You know there's one description that Bubbie said his dad, I believe, it was in conjunction with some pornographic magazines, you know, masturbating in front of Bubby and while he was doing that and inserting his other, taking his other hand and inserting a finger in his rectum, again....
> ... we had a session after that where, as I described earlier, we, we had, had her tell a story about a girl in the third person and so she described the story in the third person where a little girl had her dad in a bathtub insert his finger into the little girl's vagina, and so, at our next session ... she acknowledged that that's, that happened to her ... I think she described earlier that she was the magazines and the, and heard, the telephone calls, too, but denied actually any contact with them. And then as we went along further, she acknowledged that dad, had on one occasion had inserted his finger in her vagina and then, on another occasion, attempted intercourse with his penis and tried to put his penis in her....

In deciding whether the psychologist's testimony was properly introduced, the state contends that: (1) the statements were given to the medical health profession for the purpose of diagnosis and treatment See footnote 17 and are therefore admissible; and (2) the statements are not hearsay since they were not "offered in evidence to prove the truth of the matter asserted," See footnote 18 but rather were cited only as support used by the psychologist in forming his opinion.

West Virginia Rule of Evidence 803(4) provides that:

> The following ... [is] not excluded by the hearsay rule, even though the declarant is available as a witness: ... (4) Statements for Purposes of Medical Diagnosis or Treatment--Statements made for purposes of medical diagnosis or treatment and describing medical history, or past or present symptoms, pain, or sensations, or the inception or general character of the cause or external source thereof insofar as reasonably pertinent to diagnosis or treatment.

Even though we have previously held in Syl. Pt. 3, State v. Murray, 180 W.Va. 41, 43, 375 S.E.2d 405, 407 (1988) that "[o]ut-of-court statements made by the victim of a sexual assault may not be introduced by a third party unless the statements qualify as an excited utterance under Rule 803(2) of the West Virginia Rules of Evidence," that case is factually distinguishable from the instant case. It did not in any way concern W.Va.R.Evid. 803(4) or what is admissible thereunder.

In Murray, a nine-year-old girl, made statements to a secretary and a principal at her school and a child protective services worker to the effect that she had been sexually assaulted by the defendant some two weeks earlier. 375 S.E.2d at 408-09. The school principal and protective services worker were permitted to testify about these statements at trial. On appeal, this Court found that the statements were inadmissible because they failed to meet the criteria for the excited utterance exception found in W.Va.R. of Evid. 803(2). See Syl. Pt. 2, State v. Young, 166 W.Va. 309, 273 S.E.2d 592 (1980).

In contrast, in the present case, the statements made by the children regarding the sexual abuse by their father were made to the psychologist who the children were seeing in a therapeutic context. Similarly, in Matter of Lucas, 94 N.C.App. 442, 380 S.E.2d 563 (1989), the Court of Appeals of North Carolina was faced with determining whether statements made by a three-year-old child to a medical doctor when she was taken to a local hospital within fourteen days of an alleged sexual assault incident for medical attention were admissible. Matter of Lucas, 380 S.E.2d at 566.

In that case, the doctor was permitted to testify that while conducting an exam to determine whether there was evidence of sexual abuse, the child told him that the fourteen-year-old juvenile offender pulled his penis out and pulled the victim's pants down. The doctor was further permitted to testify:

> A. And then [child] said that he put a spring in me and I questioned her, 'Where was this spring?', 'On his whacker'. Did it hurt when he put this spring in you? She said yes. Did he tell you that he had a spring and she said yes. Then I asked her 'Where did he put it in you, can you show me?' Show me on the doll baby where he put it and I asked her to pull the doll baby's pants down and 'Where did he put it in?'; she pointed to the vaginal area of the female doll. Then I asked her, 'Did he do this one time?' and she indicated two times. She said that it was on two different days.
> A. ... In obtaining the rectal culture, she stated that this was where Ronnie put his 'whacker'. When I did the vaginal exam, she said, 'This is not where Ronnie put his whacker.' ...
> A. The rectal structure appeared to be normal. There were no tears, lacerations or other abnormalities or alteration than normal [word not audible] tone. It was a normal examination....,
> Id. at 565.

The court found that "the trial court properly admitted Dr. Fisher's testimony as to the out-of-court statements of the child pursuant to Rule 803(4)." Id. at 568. The North Carolina Court reasoned that the above-mentioned statements of the doctor were admissible since the doctor used those statements in making his diagnosis and on recommending follow-up treatment by a psychologist. Id. at 567.

Likewise in Morgan v. Foretich, 846 F.2d 941 (4th Cir.1988), the court considered whether the testimony of a psychologist who had spent over one hundred hours examining and working with the victim was permitted to testify about out-of-court statements made by the child. Id. at 948. In the Morgan case the trial court only permitted the psychologist to give his opinion as to the child's abuse and was excluded from testifying about out-of- court statements made by the child to him. Id.

The Fourth Circuit indicated that "the two-part test set for admitting these hearsay statements is (1) 'the declarants motive in making the statement must be consistent with the purposes of promoting treatment'; and, (2) 'the content of the statement must be such as is reasonably relied upon by a physician in treatment or diagnosis.' " Id. at 949 (footnotes omitted) (citing United States v. Renville, 779 F.2d 430, 436 (8th Cir.1985)). The court, in its application of this test to the facts before it, found that the child's statements to her psychologist were properly admissible at trial. The court relied heavily upon the Renville decision which concluded that "not only would the young victim have a motive consistent with the purpose of treatment, but also, '[s]tatements by a child abuse victim to a physician during an examination that the abuser is a member of the victim's immediate household are reasonably pertinent to treatment.' " Morgan, 846 F.2d at 949 (emphasis in original) (quoting Renville, 779 F.2d at 436.)

Consequently, we conclude that the statements made by the children to their treating psychologist, Trainor, were properly admitted at trial. In adopting the two-part test applied by the Fourth Circuit, we find that not only was the motive behind the statements made by the children consistent with promoting treatment, since the mother brought the children to the psychologist for the purpose of treatment at a time prior to any criminal action even being contemplated; but also, the statements were such that they would have been reasonably relied upon by Trainor in his diagnosis and treatment of the children.

The trial court also permitted the victims' mother to testify without objection regarding extrajudicial statements made by her son involving the sexual assaults. It is extremely important to note, however, that each child also testified regarding the matters contained in the statements made to the mother and to Dr. Trainor, and was subject to cross-examination by the appellant. These statements do not fall under the excited utterance exception to the hearsay rule found in W.Va.R.Evid. 803(2) because they were not statements made by the declarant "relating to a startling event or condition ... while the declarant was under the stress of excitement caused by the event or condition." Id.

However, other courts have admitted statements like these made by child victims to a parent under other exceptions to the hearsay rule.

In Matter of Lucas, the court admitted statements made by a three-year-old child to her mother that a juvenile boy had sexually assaulted the little girl anally. 380 S.E.2d at 565. The court upheld the admissibility of these statements made several days after the incident under Rule 803(4) which involve statements made for the purposes of medical diagnosis or treatment. Matter of Lucas, 380 S.E.2d at 566. The court reasoned that "the child's statements were pertinent to diagnosis and treatment as they suggested to the doctors, the nature of the problem which in turn directed the doctors in their examination of the child." Id. Likewise, in the instant case, the mother's testimony concerning her son's statements was presented primarily to explain why she took the children to the psychologist, not for the purpose of proving the matter asserted.

Other courts have permitted hearsay statements, such as those present before the Court, under Rule 803(24). West Virginia Rule of Evidence 803(24) provides:

> The following are not excluded by the hearsay rule, even though the declarant is available as a witness:
> (24) Other Exceptions:--A statement not specifically covered by any of the foregoing exceptions but having equivalent circumstantial guarantees of trustworthiness, if the court determines that (A) the statement is offered as evidence of a material fact; (B) the statement is more probative on the point for which it is offered than any other evidence which the proponent can procure through reasonable efforts; and (C) the general purposes of these rules and the interests of justice will best be served by admission of the statement into evidence. However, a statement may not be admitted under this exception unless the proponent of it makes known to the adverse party sufficiently in advance of the trial or hearing to provide the adverse party with a fair opportunity to prepare to meet it, his intention to offer the statement and the particulars of it, including the name and address of the declarant.

In Mitchell v. State, --- Miss. ----, 539 So.2d 1366 (1989) the court indicated that the mother's and babysitter's testimony involving hearsay statements made by a five-year-old female child should be analyzed under Rule 803(24) exception on remand. See footnote 19 In its instructions to the lower court, the Mississippi Supreme Court stated:

> We note that, as other courts have applied the 'catch-all' to a child's out-of-court statement about an incident of sexual abuse, they have found that the statements did not fit under the excited utterance exception or under the exception for seeking medical treatment. In determining the equivalent > guarantees of trustworthiness, these courts have considered the age of the child, under the rationale that young children do not possess enough sexual knowledge to fabricate such incidents. These courts further look at the length of delay in reporting the incident and the surrounding reasons for the delay, such as fear, threats, and lack of opportunity to report. They also consider the persons to whom the incident was reported--family, social workers, law enforcement officers.

Mitchell, 539 So.2d at 1370 (citing U.S. v. Dorian, 803 F.2d 1439 (8th Cir.1986); U.S. v. Renville, 779 F.2d 430 (8th Cir.1985); State v. Robinson, 153 Ariz. 191, 735 P.2d 801 (1987); State v. Brown, 341 N.W.2d 10 (Iowa 1983)); See generally Note, A Comprehensive Approach to Hearsay Statements in Sex Abuse Cases, 83 Colum.L.Rev. 1745 (1983).

In examining the statements made to the mother by the child victim in the present case, we must look at the requirements this Court has set out in order for a statement to come in under W.Va.R. of Evid. 803(24). We have previously held that > [t]he language of Rule 804(b)(5) of the West Virginia Rules of Evidence and its counterpart Rule 803(24) requires that five general factors must be met in order for hearsay evidence to be admissible under the rules. First and most important is the trustworthiness of the statement, which must be equivalent to the trustworthiness underlying the specific exceptions to the hearsay rule. Second, the statement must be offered to prove a material fact. Third, the statement must be shown to be more probative on the issue for which it is offered than any other evidence the proponent can reasonably procure. Fourth, admission of the statement must comport with the general purpose of the rules of evidence and the interests of justice. Fifth, adequate notice of the statement must be afforded the other party to provide that party a fair opportunity to meet the evidence.

Syllabus Point 5, State v. Smith, 178 W.Va. 104, 358 S.E.2d 188 (1987); See Syl. Pt. 1, State v. Bailey, 179 W.Va. 1, 365 S.E.2d 46 (1987).

These factors were set forth with an obvious eye towards evaluating the reliability of hearsay evidence in light of what legal writers have described as the four dangers of hearsay: See footnote 20 misperception, faulty narration, inaccurate memory, and insincerity. If the likelihood of these dangers is slight, the reliability of the evidence is enhanced.

Furthermore, it is important to bear in mind that most of the cases analyzing the admissibility of hearsay statements under Rule 803(24)(5) have been decided in contexts where the declarant was not present to testify in person. It is extremely important to recognize that in the defendant's trial, each child was present, testified in court, and was cross- examined by defense counsel. Furthermore, neither the mother nor the psychologist added anything substantive to the children's testimony. It would cause us grave concern as to the propriety of the mother's testimony if the children gave a barebones or sketchy account of what occurred, and then the mother was permitted to expand upon or add detail and substance to such testimony through the children's extra-judicial statements. Such was not the case here. Judge Weinstein and Professor Berger have written that "[t]he availability of the declarant at trial vitiates the main concern of the hearsay rule, which is the lack of any opportunity for the adversary to cross-examine the absent declarant." See footnote 21

Not only are hearsay dangers minimized by the presence of the declarant, but such appearance removes potential confrontation clause issues as well. See footnote 22 Furthermore, since the defendant claimed maternal coaching of the children, the mother's account of the child's statements to her gave the jury a fuller opportunity to observe her demeanor and her motivations in recounting such statements. The testimony of the mother and psychologist presented the defendant an opportunity to explore on cross-examination any coaching or motive on behalf of the mother or psychologist to help the children fabricate the accusations. When a child witness is present to testify, however, it would generally seem to be a better practice not to permit a parent to testify as to the child's extrajudicial statements unless such testimony clearly falls into one of the hearsay exceptions. But it is harmless when, viewed in the spectrum of all the evidence, it creates no prejudice to the defendant. The statements comport to this hearsay exception and the general rules of evidence because they not only meet the relevancy and probativeness requirements but the fact that the children testified at trial and were subject to cross-examination ameliorates the real risks of admitting hearsay. Finally, we examine the requirement of giving adequate notice to the opposing party. In this case, not only did the defendant have notice that Mrs. L. would be called as a witness, but the court ordered the state to provide the defendant with a copy of the written statement of Mrs. L. if she were called as witness. A review of the statement which was contained in the record indicates that the defendant did have notice as to the nature of the evidence the state would offer through Mrs. L.'s testimony.

Therefore we conclude that the mother's testimony was properly admitted at trial by the lower court, since the children were present to testify and be cross-examined; the mother added nothing substantive to the children's direct testimony, and primarily related the child's statements not to prove the truth of the matter asserted, but to explain why she took them to the psychologist; and because the mother's motivations were an issue raised by the defense, and therefore her appearance on the stand provided the defendant an opportunity to cross-examine her and the jury a chance to observe her demeanor and assess her motivations and credibility.

III.

The appellant also argues that the trial court erred in permitting the family psychologist, Greg Trainor, to express his opinion that the children had been sexually assaulted by the appellant. The state argues that this case should be distinguished from cases involving the expert who is testifying about "rape trauma syndrome."

West Virginia Rule of Evidence 702 states that "[i]f scientific, technical, or other specialized knowledge will assist the trier of fact to understand the evidence or to determine a fact in issue, a witness qualified as an expert by knowledge, skill, experience, training, or education may testify thereto in the form of an opinion or otherwise." Further, W.Va.R.Evid. 704 provides that "[t]estimony in the form of an opinion or inference otherwise admissible is not objectionable solely because it embraces an ultimate issue to be decided by the trier of fact."

In this case, the expert psychologist testified as followed:

> (By the prosecuting attorney):
> Q: Okay, do you have an opinion as to whether Bubby was sexually assaulted and sexually abused?
> A: Yes, it's my opinion that, that Bubby, little [E.L.], was, was sexually abused.

The expert at that point went on to give the basis for his opinion. See footnote 23 Later, in the expert's testimony, the prosecutor asked the following with regards to both children:

> Q: Your professional opinion then is that both of these children, were, in fact, abused and assaulted as they have reported to you?
> A: That's, that's my opinion, yes.

In State v. McCoy, 179 W.Va. 223, 366 S.E.2d 731 (1988) this Court was faced with the admissibility of expert testimony on post-rape behavior, i.e. testimony regarding rape trauma syndrome. 179 W.Va. at 226, 366 S.E.2d at 734. We held that:

> [q]ualified expert testimony regarding rape trauma syndrome is relevant and admissible in a prosecution for rape where the defense is consent. The expert may testify that the alleged victim exhibits behavior consistent with rape trauma syndrome, but the expert may not give an opinion, expressly or implicitly, as to whether or not the alleged victim was raped.

Id. 179 W.Va. at229, 366 S.E.2d at737. The reason for this holding was concern over "[t]he danger involved in permitting an expert to include that because a complainant suffers from rape trauma syndrome, the complainant was, therefore, raped ... [since] '[such a] conclusion vouches too much for the victim's credibility and supplies verisimilitude for her on the critical issue of whether defendant did rape her.' " Id. 179 W.Va. at 228, 366 S.E.2dat 736 (footnote omitted)(citing State v. Taylor, 663 S.W.2d 235, 241 (Mo. 1984); see State v. Jackson, 181 W.Va. 447 , 383 S.E.2d 79 (1989). See footnote 24

While the facts of this case do not involve rape trauma syndrome, but rather sexual abuse and sexual assault on children, an analogy can be drawn in that children who are sexually abused or assaulted frequently display indications which may comport to a profile of child victims which has been developed by psychologists and social workers with experience in this area of expertise. In State v. Myers, --- Minn. ----, 359 N.W.2d 604 (1984) the Minnesota Supreme Court was asked to determine whether the trial court erred in admitting expert psychological testimony describing the behavior and symptoms typically exhibited by children who have been sexually abused and further, expressing an opinion that the child victim's allegations were not fabricated. 359 N.W.2d at 606. Specifically, the court addressed the issue of "whether or not the emotional and psychological characteristics observed in sexually abused children is a proper subject of expert testimony." Id. at 609.

The court ruled that such testimony was admissible even though the indirect result was to bolster the credibility See footnote 25 of the victim witness finding that

> [t]he nature ... of the sexual abuse of children places lay juror at a disadvantage. Incest is prohibited in all or almost all cultures, and the common experience of the jury may represent a less than adequate foundation for assessing the credibility of a young child who complains of sexual abuse. If the victim of a burglary failed to report the crime promptly, a jury would have good reason to doubt that person's credibility. A young child subjected to sexual abuse, however, may for some time be either unaware or uncertain of the criminality of the abuser's conduct. As ... [the expert] testified, uncertainty becomes confusion when an abuser who fulfills a caring-parenting role in the child's life tells the child that what seems wrong to the child, is, in fact, all right. Because of the child's confusion, shame, guilt, and fear, disclosure of the abuse is often long delayed. When the child does complain of sexual abuse, the mother's reaction frequently is disbelief, and she fails to report the allegations to the authorities. By explaining the emotional antecedents of the victim's conduct and the peculiar impact of the crime on other members of the > family, an expert can assist the jury in evaluating the credibility of the complainant.

Id. at 610; see State v. Middleton, 294 Or. 427, 657 P.2d 1215 (1983); see also State v. Kim, 64 Hawaii 598, 645 P.2d 1330 (1982).

Similarly, the Ohio Court of Appeals in State v. Timperio, 38 Ohio App.3d 156, 528 N.E.2d 594 (1987) was faced with expert testimony offered at trial which was very similar to the expert's testimony in the present case. In Timperio, the expert psychologist testified about the symptoms sexually abused children exhibit and stated that in her opinion the child in that case had been sexually abused. 528 N.E.2d at 595. The court held that "[i]t is permissible to permit an expert to testify for the purpose of helping the jury to assess the credibility of a sexually abused child," and further, "[a]n expert may state her opinion that a child has been sexually abused." Id. at 595, Syl.Pts. 1 and 2; see State v. Humfleet, (Sept. 9th, 1985), Clermont App. Nos. CA84-04-031 and CA84-05-036, unreported [available on WESTLAW, 1985 WL 7728]; State v. Geyman, 224 Mont. 194, 729 P.2d 475 (1986); Middleton, 657 P.2d 1215.

In McCoy, this Court pointed out that rape trauma syndrome is a phrase coined to describe those physical and emotional symptoms and behaviors frequently experienced by rape victims. McCoy, 179 W.Va. 223, 366 S.E.2d 731. Similarly, children who are the victims of sexual abuse or assault frequently manifest identifiable physical and emotional behaviors and characteristics. Certainly, then, qualified expert testimony may be taken regarding the behavioral and emotional indicia of child sexual abuse victims, and an expert may testify that an alleged victim exhibits behavior consistent with such a profile. There is no valid reason that a physician cannot give an opinion based on physical findings that a person has been sexually assaulted. Similarly, there is no valid reason a psychologist or psychiatrist should not be allowed to give an opinion based on objective findings as to whether an individual, most particularly a child, has been sexually assaulted. It is true that such an expert opinion aids the victim's verisimilitude, but it is a fair and proper basis for doing so and the probative value of such testimony far outweighs any potential for unfair prejudice. Furthermore, whether a person has been sexually assaulted is not the ultimate issue for a jury. The ultimate issue is whether the defendant committed the assault.

Consequently, we adopt the holding and rationale of the courts which permit expert psychological testimony in cases involving incidents of child sexual abuse, and determine that an expert may state a conclusion as to whether a child who is alleged to be the victim of sexual abuse or assault exhibits behavior consistent with being so victimized, and may give an opinion as to whether the child has been sexually abused. Such expert may not give an opinion on whether he personally believes the child, nor on the issue of whether the defendant was the perpetrator of the abuse or assault, for that would improperly and prejudicially invade the province of the jury. Thus, we find that the expert's testimony in this case was permissible and the trial court committed no error in allowing the testimony in evidence.

IV.

The appellant next argues that the uncorroborated testimony of the children was inherently incredible and does not sustain the guilty verdict. The appellant based his contention on the time lapse from when the crimes actually occurred until they were reported approximately four years later, on the appellant's allegation that the children exhibited no unusual behavior during this time, and the fact that there was no physical evidence that either child had been sexually assaulted. See footnote 26

In State v. McPherson, 179 W.Va. 612, 371 S.E.2d 333 (1988) and State v. Humphrey, 177 W.Va. 264, 351 S.E.2d 613 (1986), this Court dealt with the issue of inherently incredible testimony. In McPherson, we held that "[i]nherent incredibility, ... is more than contradiction and lack of corroboration." 179 W.Va. at 617, 371 S.E.2d at 338 (footnote omitted). Inherent incredibility thus requires "a showing of 'complete untrustworthiness' ... [testimony which] defies physical laws." Id.

In the present case, we find the children's testimony far from inherently incredible. We base this finding on the children's descriptions of what happened to them. Although they were obviously upset and embarrassed at testifying, they related the incidents clearly. Also, the children were subject to thorough cross-examination during which the children were consistent in maintaining their accounts of what transpired. The jury was able to judge their demeanor and assess their credibility directly. Their testimony does sustain a guilty verdict.

V.

Finally, appellant's counsel on appeal raises an ineffective assistance of counsel argument based upon (1) the defense being a denial of any sexual conduct or misconduct; See footnote 27 (2) the failure to object to the assertion of the prosecuting attorney during opening statements that the appellant's divorce was the result of his fondling the four-month-old baby; (3) the defense counsel questioning defense See footnote 28 witnesses concerning improper sexual acts by the appellant; See footnote 29 (4) the failure to request that the lower court have the child victims examined by an independent psychologist for competency purposes; and (5) the failure to offer expert testimony concerning the lack of physical evidence of sexual assault or sexual abuse.

In Syl.Pt. 19, in part, State v. Thomas, 157 W.Va. 640, 203 S.E.2d 445 (1974), this Court held that > [i]n the determination of a claim that an accused was prejudiced by ineffective assistance of counsel ... courts should measure and compare the questioned counsel's performance by whether he exhibited the normal and customary decree of skill possessed by attorneys who are reasonably knowledgeable of criminal law....

We also held in Syl. Pt. 21, of Thomas, that

> [w]here a counsel's performance, attacked as ineffective, arises from occurrences involving strategy, tactics, and arguable courses of action, his conduct will be deemed effectively assistive of his client's interests, unless no reasonably qualified defense attorney would have so acted in the defense of an accused.
> 157 W.Va. at 643, 203 S.E.2d at 449.

In applying Thomas to the case at bar, thorough pre-trial motions were filed in defendant's behalf and the defendant's counsel at trial conducted thorough voir dire, gave an effective opening statement, provided affirmative evidence in defense of the appellant, including the appellant's current girlfriend who testified as to the appellant's relationship with his children, placed the defendant on the stand who testified that he did not sexually assault his children, made a closing argument based on defendant's theories of fabrication and coercion, and finally made appropriate objections and motions with specificity and vigor throughout the trial.

While it is true that defense counsel did introduce the evidence relating to Sharon L.'s statements regarding the defendant having sex with the family dog and the defendant masturbating until he tore loose the surgical stitches from his vasectomy, it is necessary to read the cross-examination of Mrs. L. to discern trial counsel's strategy. First of all, the allegation concerning the dog supposedly took place as part of the transactions with the children, and therefore would have been admissible as part of the res gestae of the offense had the state attempted to introduce it. Secondly, defense counsel's question on cross-examination makes clear that the dog was such an extremely small animal that defense counsel was attempting to show that it would be patently unbelievable that a grown man could accomplish a sex act with it. Similarly, the former wife was questioned by defense counsel as to her previous statement on the incident relating to vasectomy stitches. The defense counsel was attempting to demonstrate that it was absurd to believe a person would derive sexual gratification from such a self-mutilating and painful act as that of tearing surgical stitches. The obvious strategy behind defense counsel's questions was to show what ludicrous stories Mrs. L. could concoct regarding her former husband's propensities. There is no doubt that defense attorney's strategy in attacking Mrs. L.'s credibility in this manner was arguable, and she obviously was not successful in the representation of her client in that he was not acquitted.

Finally, regarding the failure of the defense counsel to request that the child victims be examined by an independent psychologist for competency purposes, we have already discussed the competency issue supra at note 27. There we concluded that trial court properly exercised its discretion on the competency issue. See State v. Stacy 179 W.Va. 686, 371 S.E.2d 614 (1988).

The primary difficulty defense counsel had at this trial was that she did not have much to go on in the way of evidence favorable to the defendant. As is frequently the case in this type of charge, it really was a credibility contest. When young children testify that a defendant has sexually abused them and the defendant testifies and denies such charges, defense counsel must attempt to elicit evidence and make argument as to why they would lie.

In this case, the defense counsel attempted throughout to demonstrate that the children had been coerced or coached by their mother or that either they or their mother was upset at the defendant's girlfriend's role in the defendant's life. The defendant's girlfriend testified, however, that she had accompanied the defendant to Sharon L.'s home on a number of occasions to visit the children, and that Mrs. L. always made her feel welcome. In addition, there was a lack of evidence which tended to show that the children had been coached since their mother did not pursue prosecution until some time after the allegations came to her attention. Even after she reported it to the prosecutorial authorities, it was approximately two years before the grand jury indicted. Nor was there any basis to believe Mrs. L. was acting out of any animosity toward her former husband, both because of the passage of time and because she reported the offenses only upon the urging of the psychologist. Also, the reason the victims stated that they didn't disclose these events sooner was due to threats of bodily harm made upon them by the appellant.

> 'Judicial scrutiny of counsel's performance must be highly deferential. It is all too tempting for a defendant to second-guess counsel's assistance after conviction or adverse sentence, and is all too easy for a court, examining counsel's defense after it has proved unsuccessful, to conclude that a particular act or omission of counsel was unreasonable....'

State ex rel. Levitt v. Bordenkircher, 176 W.Va. 162, 172, 342 S.E.2d 127, 137 (1986) (citing Strickland v. Washington, 466 U.S. 668, 689, 104 S.Ct. 2052, 2065, 80 L.Ed.2d 674 (1984)). In reviewing the attorney's overall performance, we are hard pressed to conclude that it amounted to an ineffective assistance of counsel.

Therefore, based on the foregoing opinion, we affirm the judgment of the Circuit Court of Mineral County.

Since, in this case, the victims are related to the appellant, we have referred to the appellant by his last name initial. See Benjamin R. v. Footnote: 26 The appellant also appears to question the competency of the children to testify at trial. However, we find that the trial court properly examined the truth-telling abilities of the children at trial and determined that they were competent to testify. We conclude therefore that the trial court properly exercised its discretion on this competency issue. See State v. Stacy, 179 W.Va. 686, 371 S.E.2d 614 (1988).

Footnote: 27 We are unable to discern how appellant alleges that this constituted ineffective assistance. Appellant neither explains this assignment nor argues it further, and we therefore deem it to be without merit.

Footnote: 28 It appears the appellant means to complain of such questions being propounded to state witnesses as well as defense witnesses, and we deal with this assignment as such. As to defense witnesses being questioned as to improper sexual acts, it certainly did not constitute ineffective assistance of counsel to elicit denials of such acts by the defendant once he decided to testify in his own defense.

Footnote: 29 We do not need to address the admissibility from an evidentiary perspective of the two specific instances involving other sexual acts since both were brought in by the defendant, in this case to impeach the credibility of previous testimony. See

W.Va.R.Evid. 404(a)(1). If the prosecution attempted to bring in these two instances, the family dog incident would have been admissible as part of the res gestae; however, the incident involving the vasectomy stitches would have been inadmissible.

MILLER, Justice, dissenting:

My disagreement with the majority involves a wide variety of issues. The majority has not only overruled several settled points of law in our jurisdiction, but has done so with only the most meager authority to support its position. The principles it has adopted are clearly outside the mainstream.

I.

On May 28, 1987, the defendant was convicted of two counts of first degree sexual assault and two counts of first degree sexual abuse. The defendant was sentenced to serve consecutive sentences of fifteen-to-twenty- five years for each of the two sexual assault convictions with concurrent sentences of one-to-five years for the sexual abuse convictions.

The events which led to these convictions allegedly occurred in the fall of 1983. During this period of time, the defendant resided with his wife, his four-year-old twins, a boy and a girl, and an infant son. In December of 1983, the defendant and his wife separated, at which time the defendant ceased living with his family. The divorce was finalized in July of 1984.

Approximately two years later, the ex-wife reported to the authorities that her husband had sexually abused the twins during the fall of 1983. The defendant had visitation rights with the twins during this two-year period, and their relationship appeared to be normal. The twins received therapy and, after several sessions, both of them stated that their father had sexually abused them. There was no physical evidence which supported these allegations. Because I believe the majority has misapplied the law to the facts of this case, I respectfully dissent.

II.

First, the majority's "lustful disposition" exception to Rule 404(b) of the West Virginia Rules of Evidence See footnote 1 will permit admission of evidence of a particular character trait of a defendant accused of a sexual offense in order to show that the defendant acted in accordance with the trait. Nothing could be more directly contrary to the explicit admonition of W.Va.R.Evid. 404(a): "Evidence of a person's character or a trait of his character is not admissible for the purpose of proving that he acted in conformity therewith on a particular occasion[.]" The majority tacitly acknowledges the inconsistency of its "exception" and W.Va.R.Evid. 404(a) by its failure to cite or discuss this rule.

In order to establish its "lustful disposition" exception, the majority had to overrule Syllabus Point 8 of State v. Dolin, 176 W.Va. 688, 347 S.E.2d 208 (1986). See footnote 2 The majority opinion cites four cases from other jurisdictions which it represents as sanctioning a lustful disposition collateral act exception. See footnote 3 Though four of the United States hardly represent most of the American jurisdictions, the prevalence of the majority's new view is even less than it asserts. Two of the jurisdictions, Ohio and Wisconsin, have abandoned their ill-conceived lustful disposition exceptions. See State v. Curry, 43 Ohio St.2d 66, 330 N.E.2d 720 (1975); State v. Fishnick, 127 Wis.2d 247, 378 N.W.2d 272 (1985). The majority's position is against sound logic and the overwhelming weight of authority, which holds that collateral acts are inadmissible to show a lustful disposition. Such evidence serves no purpose other than to prove that the defendant acted in conformity with a character trait and is, therefore, guilty of the crime charged. E.g., Johnson v. State, 727 P.2d 1062 (Alaska App.1986); People v. Tassell, 36 Cal.3d 77, 201 Cal.Rptr. 567, 679 P.2d 1 (1984); Getz v. State, 538 A.2d 726 (Del.1988); Heuring v. State, 513 So.2d 122 (Fla.App.1987), decision quashed on other grounds, 559 So.2d 207 (Fla.1990); Pendleton v. Commonwealth, 685 S.W.2d 549 (Ky.1985); People v. Major, 407 Mich. 394, 285 N.W.2d 660 (1979); State v. Schumann, 111 N.J. 470, 545 A.2d 168 (1988); State v. Curry, supra; Commonwealth v. Shively, 492 Pa. 411, 424 A.2d 1257 (1981); State v. Burchfield, 664 S.W.2d 284 (Tenn.1984); State v. Harris, 36 Wash.App. 746, 677 P.2d 202 (1984). Cf.Lehiy v. State, 501 N.E.2d 451 (Ind.App.1986), adopted and aff'd, 509 N.E.2d 1116 (Ind.1987) (limiting prior acts showing depraved sexual instinct to acts of sodomy and incest).

We recognized in Dolin that there are occasions when prior sexual acts could be admissible under W.Va.R.Evid. 404(b). We cited State v. Pancake, 170 W.Va. 690, 296 S.E.2d 37 (1982), where we held that prior forcible acts against the victim or other persons known to the victim could be shown to establish the victim's fear of her attacker. See also State v. Lucas, 178 W.Va. 686, 364 S.E.2d 12 (1987); State v. Miller, 175 W.Va. 616, 336 S.E.2d 910 (1985). Dolin also acknowledged the specific exceptions for admission of character evidence under W.Va.R.Evid. 404(b). Thus, there are several purposes for which evidence of collateral acts involving prior sexual episodes are properly admissible, but none approach the lustful disposition exception adopted by the majority despite its rejection by almost every other jurisdiction.

Another point the majority ignores is the balancing test that has heretofore applied to the admission of
445 (1974), we outlined how to use the balancing test:

> "15. In the proper exercise of discretion, the trial court may exclude evidence of collateral crimes and charges if the court finds that its probative value is outweighed by the risk that its admission will create substantial danger of undue prejudice or confuse the issues or mislead the jury or unfairly surprise a party who has not had reasonable ground to anticipate that such evidence would be offered.
> "16. In the exercise of discretion to admit or exclude evidence of collateral crimes and charges, the overriding considerations for the trial court are to scrupulously protect the accused in his right to a fair trial while adequately preserving the right of the State to prove evidence which is relevant and legally connected with the charge for which the accused is being tried."

We have consistently followed Thomas and have recognized that the balancing test is now embodied in W.Va.R.Evid. 403. See footnote 4 See, e.g., State v. Hanna, 180 W.Va. 598, 378 S.E.2d 640 (1989); State v. Stacy, 179 W.Va. 686, 371 S.E.2d 614 (1988); State v. Johnson, 179 W.Va. 619, 371 S.E.2d 340 (1988); State v. Dolin, supra; State v. Nicholson, 162 W.Va. 750, 252 S.E.2d 894 (1979), overruled on other grounds, State v. Petry, 166 W.Va. 153, 273 S.E.2d 346 (1980). Other jurisdictions uniformly agree that before evidence of collateral acts is admissible, its probative value must be weighed against its prejudicial effect to the defendant. See, e.g., United States v. Johnson, 893 F.2d 451 (1st Cir.1990); United States v. Scarfo, 850 F.2d 1015 (3rd Cir.), cert. denied, 488 U.S. 910, 109 S.Ct. 263, 102 L.Ed.2d 251 (1988); United States v. Conners, 825 F.2d 1384 (9th Cir.1987); United States v. Cuch, 842 F.2d 1173 (10th Cir.1988); Getz v. State, supra; State v. Just, 184 Mont. 262, 602 P.2d 957 (1979); State v. Micko, 393 N.W.2d 741 (N.D.1986).

Moreover, as we held in Syllabus Point 3 of Dolin, the trial court should conduct an in camera hearing to determine whether the prejudicial effect of the collateral act evidence outweighs its probative value. See footnote 5 Furthermore, in Syllabus Point 9 of that opinion, we explained that it is customary to give a limiting instruction to the jury that the collateral evidence is not offered to prove guilt of the present crime, but is to be considered exclusively in determining the particular issue on which it is properly offered, e.g., identity, intent, motive, etc. See footnote 6 The rule that evidence of collateral crimes is not admissible to prove guilt of the crime charged, but rather only to bear on subordinate issues such as system, motive, or intent, is black letter law and is explicitly stated in W.Va.R.Evid. 404(b). See United States v. Steele, 727 F.2d 580 (6th Cir.), cert. denied, Scarborough v. United States, 467 U.S. 1209, 104 S.Ct. 2396, 81 L.Ed.2d 353 (1984); United States v. Bartley, 855 F.2d 547 (8th Cir.1988); State v. Ramirez Enriquez, 153 Ariz. 431, 737 P.2d 407 (App.1987); State v. Walls, 541 A.2d 591 (Del.1987), cert. denied, 493 U.S. 967, 110 S.Ct. 412, 107 L.Ed.2d 377 (1989); State v. Guinn, 114 Idaho 30, 752 P.2d 632 (App.1988); Commonwealth v. Madyun, 17

Mass.App. 965, 458 N.E.2d 745 (1983); State v. Paige, 316 N.C. 630, 343 S.E.2d 848 (1986).

Several courts have suggested that admission of evidence of prior collateral acts of the defendant is best deferred until after the defendant's case, in order to see whether intent, motive, or identity are actually disputed. See, e.g., United States v. Benedetto, 571 F.2d 1246 (2d Cir.1978). In this case, none of these safeguards were followed, mainly because defendant's trial counsel neglected to raise an objection to this inflammatory and prejudicial evidence. I will address this failure in Part VI(C).

III.

Also rather astounding to me is the majority's footnote 24 "limiting" (but for all intents overruling) State v. McCoy, 179 W.Va. 223, 366 S.E.2d 731 (1988). See footnote 7 In that unanimous two-year-old opinion, we held in Syllabus Point 2 that a qualified expert could opine that the victim of a sexual assault suffered from rape trauma syndrome, "but the expert may not give an opinion, expressly or implicitly, as to whether or not the alleged victim was raped." See footnote 8

In isolation, it is possible to read the majority's footnote 24 to apply only to a situation where the physician, after making a physical examination of the victim, states that there are physical findings that are consistent with a person having been raped or sexually assaulted. Such a conclusion is entirely permissible. However, this rule would not require the limitation on McCoy.

The confusion springs from Syllabus Point 7 of the majority opinion which states, rather perplexingly, that "an expert may state an opinion as to whether the child comports with the psychological and behavioral profile of a child sexual abuse victim, and may offer an opinion based on objective findings that the child has been sexually abused." See footnote 9 (Emphasis added). I cannot reconcile the majority's statement in footnote 24 that "physical findings" might enable a physician to conclude that sexual abuse had occurred with its shift to the broader phrase "objective findings" in Syllabus Point 7.

In this case, the psychologist, Mr. Trainor, did not see the children until two years after the alleged abuse incidents. He made no physical examination of the children and did not state that there were physical findings consistent with sexual abuse. Instead, Mr. Trainor's testimony about his observation of the children and their behavioral characteristics was quite similar to that condemned in McCoy. He gave his permissible opinion that the children suffered from child abuse syndrome. However, the State went beyond this point and asked Mr. Trainor directly if, in his opinion, the children had been sexually abused; he responded in the affirmative.

In McCoy, the conviction was reversed because the expert indicated that the victim had been raped. Not only does this type of unfounded opinion bolster the credibility of the victim's testimony, a point that we emphasized in McCoy, but where, as here, the identity of the perpetrator is undisputed, it purports to directly prove the ultimate issue of guilt. Furthermore, because of the expert's credentials, his opinion carries with it a stamp of scientific legitimacy which obviously will weigh heavily upon the jury.

The majority offers scant authority for its new position. It relies chiefly on State v. Myers, 359 N.W.2d 604 (Minn.1984), in which the expert was not asked the ultimate question of whether in his opinion the child had been sexually abused. The expert testified only that the child exhibited characteristics consistent with sexual abuse. See footnote 10 Moreover, in footnote 25, 183 W.Va. at 658, 398 S.E.2d at 140, the majority incorrectly suggests that the Minnesota court sanctioned the prosecutor's elicitation of the expert's opinion as to the truthfulness of the victim. This line of questioning was only sanctioned because the defense challenged the victim's credibility during cross-examination. See footnote 11

Myers only permitted expert testimony to explain the often erratic and ambivalent conduct of sexually abused children. Significantly, the Myers opinion cites with approval the earlier case of State v. Saldana, 324 N.W.2d 227 (Minn.1982), where the Minnesota Supreme Court ruled that expert testimony regarding rape trauma syndrome was inadmissible because such "testimony furnishes no assistance to jurors, who are as capable as the expert in assessing the credibility of the alleged adult rape victim." 359 N.W.2d at 610. The Minnesota Supreme Court in Myers simply did not adopt the rule, espoused by the majority, that a psychological expert can opine that a child victim has been physically abused.

The majority also cites State v. Kim, 64 Haw. 598, 645 P.2d 1330 (1982); however, this case dealt solely with expert testimony regarding the credibility of the child abuse victim. As in Myers, the Kim court permitted this testimony only after the defendant had attacked the victim's credibility. The same credibility issue was involved in State v. Middleton, 294 Or. 427, 657 P.2d 1215 (1983), and State v. Geyman, 224 Mont. 194, 729 P.2d 475 (1986), also cited by the majority. The same cases relied on by the majority were used by the Ohio Court of Appeals in State v. Timperio, 38 Ohio App.3d 156, 528 N.E.2d 594 (1987), which talked about the credibility issue, but failed to discuss the implications of the expert's opinion that the child had been sexually abused.

Certainly, the majority's reliance on Kim is misplaced. Indeed, the majority does not attempt any analysis of the credibility issue under the appropriate beginning point, W.Va.R.Evid. 608(a), which limits attacks on credibility "to evidence in the form of opinion or reputation, but subject to these limitations: (1) the evidence may refer only to character for truthfulness or untruthfulness[.]" See footnote 12 Indeed, the Utah

Supreme Court in State v. Rimmasch, 775 P.2d 388, 392 (Utah 1989), was sharply critical of Kim's failure to properly analyze Rule 608(a):

> "[Rule 608(a)] represents an important policy choice: it prevents trials from being turned into contests between what would amount to modern oath- helpers who would largely usurp the fact-finding function of judge or jury. State v. Moran, 151 Ariz. 378, 382, 728 P.2d 248, 252 (1986). The overwhelming majority of courts have expressly or impliedly rejected Kim. We join these courts and hold that rule 608(a)(1) bars admission of an expert's testimony as to the truthfulness of a witness on a particular occasion." (Footnote omitted). See footnote 13

It is impossible from the majority's opinion to state with any degree of accuracy what its view is on this issue. I take some comfort from the last sentence of Syllabus Point 7 that the majority does not sanction an expert expressing an opinion as to the child's credibility: "Such an expert may not give an opinion as to whether he personally believes the child, nor an opinion as to whether the sexual assault was committed by the defendant, as this would improperly and prejudicially invade the province of the jury." See footnote 14 Certainly, as illustrated by the Utah Supreme Court's careful analysis in Rimmasch, the expert should not be able to give an opinion as to the truthfulness of the victim.

Finally, while some courts have permitted a qualified expert to testify that a child victim of sexual abuse displays symptoms of the typical child abuse profile, there is almost universal agreement that the expert is not entitled either to express an opinion as to the truthfulness of the victim or to state, in the absence of physical findings, that the child has been sexually abused. See footnote 15 The majority's position is, simply put, wrong.

IV.

Yet another point overlooked by the majority is the threshold question of whether the expert's testimony with regard to the child abuse syndrome had the necessary degree of scientific reliability to render it admissible. This issue was unfortunately not raised by defense counsel at trial and is part of the ineffective assistance of counsel claim that I discuss in Part VI, infra.

The majority instead cites W.Va.R.Evid. 702, which generally permits expert testimony if it "will assist the trier of fact to understand the evidence or to determine a fact in issue[.]" See footnote 16 We have never interpreted W.Va.R.Evid. 702 as an open door to admit any supposed scientific testimony without some inquiry into its reliability. Before the adoption of W.Va.R.Evid. 702, we formulated two general rules on the admissibility of scientific tests in Syllabus Points 7 and 8 of State v. Clawson, 165 W.Va. 588, 270 S.E.2d 659 (1980):

> "7. In order for a scientific test to be initially admissible, there must be general acceptance of the scientific principle which underlies the test.
> "8. There are certain scientific tests that have been widely used over a long period of time, such that their general acceptance in the scientific community can be judicially noticed."

Since the adoption of W.Va.R.Evid. 702, we have acknowledged that its adoption may have liberalized the admissibility of scientific tests. See State v. Armstrong, 179 W.Va. 435, 369 S.E.2d 870 (1988); State v. McCoy, 179 W.Va. 223, 366 S.E.2d 731 (1988). Our most recent case, State v. Woodall, 182 W.Va. 15, 385 S.E.2d 253 (1989), sets forth the approach used under W.Va.R.Evid. 702 in Syllabus Points 1 and 2:

> "1. Under W.Va.R.Evid., Rule 702, expert testimony concerning generally recognized tests is presumptively admissible and the burden of excluding such testimony is upon the side seeking exclusion. However, when a test is novel or not generally accepted, that circumstance alone meets the threshold requirement of rebutting any presumption of admissibility under Rule 702 and, therefore, with regard to tests that are not generally accepted the burden of proof that the test is reliable remains on the proponent.
> "2. When senior appellate courts have concluded that a test is generally accepted by the scientific community, a trial court may take judicial notice of a test's reliability."

In the present case, the State made no attempt to demonstrate the reliability of the so-called "child sexual abuse profile."

The Utah Supreme Court addressed this precise issue in State v. Rimmasch, 775 P.2d at 400 observing that there was an absence of any "unanimity in the legal community as to the inherent reliability of a child sexual abuse profile to show that abuse has actually occurred with respect to a specific alleged victim." See footnote 17 The court in Rimmasch surveyed scientific literature in this area and came to these conclusions in reversing the conviction:

> "Not only is there a lack of any consensus about the ability of the profile to determine abuse, but the scientific literature raises serious doubts as to the reliability of profile testimony when used for forensic purposes to demonstrate that abuse actually occurred. Scholars acknowledge that no uniformly identifiable psychological profile applies to sexually abused children as a class....
> "Suffice it to say, then, that the literature in the area is disparate and contradictory and that child abuse experts have been unable to agree on a > universal symptomology of sexual abuse, especially a precise symptomology that is sufficiently reliable to be used confidentially in a forensic setting as a determinant of abuse. See Cerkovnik, The Sexual Abuse of Children: Myths, Research, and Policy Implications, 89 Dick.L.Rev. 691, 705-08 (1985) (compilation of studies on victims of sexual abuse); [Note, The Unreliability of Expert Testimony on the Typical Characteristics of Sexual Abuse Victims, 74 Geo.L.J. 429] at 439-48 [(1985)]" 775 P.2d at 401. (Footnote omitted). See footnote 18

In this case, the State made no attempt to establish the reliability of the expert testimony under the Clawson-Woodall standard for admissibility. See footnote 19

V.

The majority has also mishandled the mother's hearsay testimony recounting what her son told her. In addressing the mother's recitation of her son's out-of-court statement, the majority says it "must look at the requirements ... under W.Va.R.Evid. 803(24)" and then quotes the general language of Syllabus Point 5 of State v. Smith, 178 W.Va. 104, 358 S.E.2d 188 (1987). See footnote 20 From its citation, I think that at least the majority agrees that the mother's recitation of her son's out-of-court statements was hearsay.

The age-old rule is that a witness's in-court testimony about an out-of-court statement, if offered to prove the truth of the matter asserted, is hearsay, and is not made admissible merely because the declarant testifies and is available for cross-examination. The Second Circuit Court of Appeals in United States v. Pedroza, 750 F.2d 187, 200 (2d Cir.1984), cert. denied, Pelaes v. United States, 479 U.S. 842, 107 S.Ct. 151, 93 L.Ed.2d 92 (1986), quoting from its earlier decision in United States v. Check, 582 F.2d 668, 675 (2d Cir.1978), agreed with this analysis:

> " '[T]he federal courts do not recognize any exception to the hearsay rule, or, except in the limited circumstances set forth in Fed.R.Evid. 801(d), any exclusion from the definition of hearsay, which would permit testimony in court relating to the prior out-of-court statements of a witness merely because the witness is available at trial for cross-examination and subject to cross- examination concerning those statements.' " See footnote 21

See also People v. Davis, 130 Ill.App.3d 41, 85 Ill.Dec. 19, 473 N.E.2d 387 (1984); Daly v. State, 99 Nev. 564, 665 P.2d 798 (1983); State v. Velasquez, 672 P.2d 1254 (Utah 1983).

Furthermore, I believe that any attempt to utilize the hearsay residual exception in W.Va.R.Evid. 803(24) to shoehorn the mother's testimony into admissibility is unavailing. In Smith, where we discussed this exception and its counterpart, Rule

804(b)(5), we warned "that Rule 803(24) and 804(b)(5) cannot be viewed as an open door to thrust hearsay statements into a trial." 178 W.Va. at 114, 358 S.E.2d at 198. Our rule is identical to the corresponding federal rule of evidence. The notes of the Senate Committee on the Judiciary as to the intended scope of this residuary exception are telling:

> "It is intended that the residual hearsay exceptions will be used very rarely, and only in exceptional circumstances. The committee does not intend to establish a broad license for trial judges to admit hearsay statements that do not fall within one of the other exceptions contained in Rule 803 and 804(b). The residual exceptions are not meant to authorize major judicial revisions of the hearsay rule, including its present exceptions. Such major revisions are best accomplished by legislative action." Committee on the Judiciary, S.Rep. No. 93-1277, Note to Paragraph (24), 28 U.S.C.A. F.R.Evid. 583 (1975).

E.g., United States v. Kim, 595 F.2d 755 (D.C.Cir.1979); United States v. Bailey, 581 F.2d 341 (3rd Cir.1978).

In this case the out-of-court declarant, the son, was available and did testify. Consequently, there was absolutely no necessity to have the mother testify as to the child's out-of-court statements. It is true that from a purely technical standpoint, W.Va.R.Evid. 803(24) does not require that the out-of-court declarant be unavailable, as does its counterpart in W.Va.R.Evid. 804(b)(5). Nevertheless, several courts that have had occasion to consider this particular point have held that there is an implied requirement of unavailability.

This implication arises from language in W.Va.R.Evid. 803(24) that the proponent of out-of-court statements must demonstrate that the statement "is more probative on the point for which it is offered than any other evidence which the proponent can procure through reasonable efforts." Thus, in United States v. Mathis, 559 F.2d 294, 299 (5th Cir.1977), the court found that the trial judge erred in admitting an extrajudicial statement of an available witness under Rule 803(24):

> "Although the introductory clause of Rule 803 appears to dispense with availability, this condition re-enters the analysis of whether or not to admit statements into evidence under the last subsection of Rule 803 because of the requirement that the proponent use reasonable efforts to procure the most probative evidence on the points sought to be proved. Rule 803(24), thus, has a built-in requirement of necessity. Here there was no necessity to use the statements when the witness was within the courthouse."

See also Steele v. Taylor, 684 F.2d 1193 (6th Cir.1982), cert. denied, 460 U.S. 1053, 103 S.Ct. 1501, 1502, 75 L.Ed.2d 932 (1983); Cummins v. State, 515 So.2d 869 (Miss.1987); Daly v. State, supra; State v. Smith, 315 N.C. 76, 337 S.E.2d 833 (1985); State v. Velasquez, supra.

The cases cited by the majority for the proposition that courts use the exception to W.Va.R.Evid. 803(24) to permit third parties to testify to child abuse victims' out-of-court statements are not persuasive. In United States v. Dorian, 803 F.2d 1439 (8th Cir.1986), State v. Robinson, 153 Ariz. 191, 735 P.2d 801 (1987), and State v. Brown, 341 N.W.2d 10 (Iowa 1983), the child victims were found incompetent to testify and, therefore, "unavailable." W.Va.R.Evid. 804(b)(5) would have come into play in these circumstances. We must also remember that our rules of evidence are written for all cases and must be more narrowly construed in the criminal than in the civil arena. This is because in a criminal case where the victim does not testify, a Sixth Amendment Confrontation Clause consideration would arise. None of the majority's cases held that a Confrontation Clause violation had occurred, but none had the benefit of the United States Supreme Court's recent decision in Idaho v. Wright, 497 U.S. 805, 110 S.Ct. 3139, 111 L.Ed.2d 638 (1990), which decided that in this type of situation the Confrontation Clause was violated.

United States v. Renville, 779 F.2d 430 (8th Cir.1985) typifies the confusion that can be encountered in addressing this issue. Renville involved testimony of a deputy sheriff who offered the out-of-court statement of the child victim identifying the defendant as the abuser. The victim also testified to this fact at trial. The defendant denied any responsibility for the act. The court, instead of finding that the out-of-court statement was one of identification and thus admissible under W.Va.R.Evid. 801(d)(1)(C), [FN22] proceeded to discuss only the trustworthiness of the statement under W.Va.R.Evid. 803(24).

Besides confusion, the majority's opinion demonstrates that the majority fails to understand the extremely limited purpose of the residual hearsay exception. Where the out-of-court declarant is unavailable to testify, but his statement provides a key piece of evidence, it is absolutely crucial to determine whether the strictures of W.Va.R.Evid. 804(b)(5) can be met. Even then, it is gravely doubtful that the Sixth Amendment confrontation question can also be satisfactorily resolved. See Idaho v. Wright, supra.

I cannot conceive that W.Va.R.Evid. 803(24) was designed to provide a means of corroborating the in-court testimony of a witness by permitting third parties to come forward at trial and testify that the witness had told them a similar story in a prior out-of-court conversation. Had that been the intent of the rule, it certainly could have been better expressed.

I daresay that if a defendant sought to use this tactic, it would be rejected. This point is aptly illustrated in two Mississippi Supreme Court cases announced within one month of each other. In Clanton v. State, 539 So.2d 1024 (Miss.1989), the court rejected the defendant's efforts to introduce two out-of-court statements he made to police officers wherein he said that the victim had consented to have sex with him. The court rejected the statements because they were hearsay and were consistent with the defendant's trial testimony. See footnote 23 The defendant's reliance on Rule 803(24) was dismissed almost out of hand. "Clanton overlooks 803(24)(B) which requires that 'the statement is more probative on the point for which it is offered than any other evidence which the proponent can produce through reasonable efforts.' " 539 So.2d at 1028.

On the other hand, in Mitchell v. State, 539 So.2d 1366 (Miss.1989), the issue was whether two witnesses to whom the child victim had related her story of abuse could testify as to these statements. The child victim testified at trial. The court concluded that these statements had been admitted under a wrong theory, but suggested that upon a proper analysis they might be admitted under Mississippi's counterpart to Rule 803(24). See footnote 24 I find this disparate treatment irrational and disturbing.

Finally, I believe that even if we assume that W.Va.R.Evid. 803(24) is applicable, the evidence in this case does not meet the strictures of the rule. The majority overlooks the Supreme Court's opinion in Idaho v. Wright, supra, which dealt with Idaho's counterpart to Rule 803(24). The issue before the Supreme Court involved the Confrontation Clause because the child victim did not testify. See footnote 25 Her statements about the alleged sexual abuse were related at trial by a pediatrician. The Supreme Court's analysis bore a striking parallel to the requirements of W.Va.R.Evid. 803(24):

> "The crux of the question presented is therefore whether the State, as the proponent of evidence presumptively barred by the hearsay rule and the Confrontation Clause, has carried its burden of proving that the younger daughter's incriminating statements to Dr. Jambura bore sufficient indicia of reliability to withstand scrutiny under the Clause." 497 U.S. at ---, 110 S.Ct. at 3147, 111 L.Ed.2d at 652-53.

The United States Supreme Court began its analysis by recognizing that Rule 803(24) is not "a firmly rooted hearsay exception ... [that] satisfies the constitutional requirement of reliability because of the weight accorded long- standing judicial and legislative experience in assessing the trustworthiness of certain types of out-of-court statements." 497 U.S. at ---, 110 S.Ct. at 3147, 111 L.Ed.2d at 653. (Citations omitted). The Supreme Court went on to determine that the State must show "particularized guarantees of trustworthiness." 497 U.S. at ---, 110 S.Ct. at 3147, 111 L.Ed.2d at 655. " 'The circumstantial guarantees of trustworthiness on which the various specific exceptions to the hearsay rule are based are those that existed at the time the statement was made and do not include those that may be added by using hindsight.' " 497 U.S. at ---, 110 S.Ct. at 3149, 111 L.Ed.2d at 655, quoting Huff v. White Motor Corp., 609 F.2d 286, 292 (7th Cir.1979).

Following this point, the Supreme Court in Wright took pains to point out that the "evidence ... must possess indicia of reliability by virtue of its inherent trustworthiness, not by reference to other evidence at trial." 497 U.S. at ---, 110 S.Ct. at 3150, 111 L.Ed.2d at 657. (Citations omitted). The majority's rejection in Idaho v. Wright of consideration of corroborating evidence to enhance the reliability of the out-of-court statement sparked the dissent. The majority made this unequivocal statement:

> "In short, the use of corroborating evidence to support a hearsay statement's 'particularized guarantees of trustworthiness' would permit admission of a presumptively unreliable statement by bootstrapping on the trustworthiness of other evidence at trial...." 497 U.S. at ---, 110 S.Ct. at 3150, 111 L.Ed.2d at 657.

Because the hearsay exception embodied in W.Va.R.Evid. 803(24) has no historical guarantee of trustworthiness, it is presumptively unreliable. In order to overcome this presumption, before a statement will be admitted under W.Va.R.Evid. 803(24), it must meet the strict test of Wright.

Another problem with the mother's recitation of the son's story is that no one attempted to elicit any coherent statement of what the child said to her. According to the mother's trial testimony, in October, 1984, she noticed her son, who was then five years of age, "constantly bouncing on the floor, at times I'd catch him ridin' the chair arms, and, I just knew it wasn't natural."

She spoke about the behavior to a neighbor, who agreed to baby-sit her two other children. While giving her son a bath, the mother then asked why he was bouncing up and down, and he told her that "daddy told me to do it, it feels good." She then inquired if daddy had said or done anything else. The mother testified that the child stated he could not tell her. She asked if he could tell the neighbor, "Aunt Kika." According to the mother, the child's response was, "well, daddy didn't say I couldn't tell nobody except you, mommy [.]" The mother then asked "Aunt Kika" to come into the room, and, according to the mother, the child then disclosed the sexual abuse incident. See footnote 26

If the analysis begins as suggested in Wright, that "the Supreme Court of Idaho properly focused on the presumptive unreliability of the out-of- court statements[,]" 497 U.S. at ---, 110 S.Ct. at 3152, 111 L.Ed.2d at 659, then there is little to lend any reliability to the declarant's statement. The statement was not made soon after the event. It was not spontaneous or even made in a volunteered sense, because it came about as a result of interrogation by the mother. The Supreme Court in Wright placed special emphasis on this latter point by stating that "we note that it is possible that '[i]f there is evidence of prior interrogation, prompting, or manipulation by adults, spontaneity may be an inaccurate indicator of trustworthiness.' " 497 U.S. at ---, 110 S.Ct. at 3152, 111 L.Ed. at 659-60, quoting State v. Robinson, 153 Ariz. 191, 201, 735 P.2d 801, 811 (1987).

I am convinced that there is no evidence to compel the conclusion that the child's statement to the mother had the "particularized guarantee of trustworthiness" necessary to admit it under Rule 803(24) as circumscribed by the Confrontation Clause. See footnote 27 This guarantee of trustworthiness is set out as the primary factor in Syllabus Point 5 of State v. Smith, supra, which outlines the requirement for admissibility under Rule 803(24): "First and most important is the trustworthiness of the statement which must be equivalent to the trustworthiness underlying the specific exceptions to the hearsay rule."

VI.

In its rush to throw a blanket of approval over the hearsay testimony of the psychologist, Mr. Trainor, the majority misunderstands the purpose of W.Va.R.Evid. 803(4), involving statements made to a physician for purposes of medical diagnosis or treatment. The two-part test set out in Syllabus Point 5 of the majority opinion misconceives the requirements of the rule. See footnote 28 The initial language of W.Va.R.Evid. 803(4) is "[s]tatements made for the purpose of medical diagnosis or treatment[.]" See footnote 29

As this language indicates by the disjunctive "or," there are two alternate grounds for permitting testimony by a physician of statements made to him by patients. A patient's statement to a treating physician as to present and past mental and physical conditions, including causative factors, have always been admitted, because the patient has a selfish interest to speak truthfully in order to receive appropriate treatment. This "self interest" guarantees the trustworthiness of the out-of-court statements. See generally E. Cleary, McCormick on Evidence § 292 (3d ed. 1984); Annot., 37 A.L.R.3d 778 (1971 & Supp.1990). We recognized this exception in Syllabus Point 8 of Sutherland v. Kroger Co., 144 W.Va. 673, 110 S.E.2d 716 (1959). See footnote 30

Prior to the adoption of W.Va.R.Evid. 803(4), courts consistently held that statements made by the patient to a nontreating physician who examined the patient for purposes of trial testimony were not admissible. See generally E. Cleary, supra at § 293. We adhered to this view in Syllabus Point 9 of Sutherland. See footnote 31

The adoption of Fed.R.Evid. 803(4) and its accompanying committee note explanation has resulted in a broadening of this hearsay exception to include statements made to a physician consulted for the purpose of diagnosis when no treatment is anticipated by the declarant. See footnote 32 See generally,, R. Mosteller, Child Sexual Abuse and Statements For the Purpose of Medical Diagnosis or Treatment, 67 N.C.L.Rev. 257 (1986). I think the majority has failed to grasp the separate, alternative grounds available under W.Va.R.Evid. 803(4). This failure stems from its reliance on Morgan v. Foretich, 846 F.2d 941 (4th Cir.1988). Morgan followed the two-part test set out in United States v. Renville, 779 F.2d 430 (8th Cir.1985), which joins the alternative grounds for admissibility to make a combined two-part test, See footnote 33 in which the physician may occupy both roles, i.e., as a treating physician and as one who also gives a diagnosis.

Aside from the majority's incorrect legal analysis, I doubt from my reading of Mr. Trainor's rambling account of his contact with the children that he was a treating physician. The State did not attempt to establish a foundation that he was a treating physician by showing what treatment he actually rendered. Likewise, the State did not attempt to isolate what statements the children actually made to him.

Mr. Trainor's testimony suggests that on his first contact with the case, the sexual abuse story was told to him by the mother. He then began to work with the children, particularly the son who was not able to talk about the abuse. See footnote 34 Certainly, the mother's statements given to Mr. Trainor about what her son had told her do not qualify as a patient's statement under W.Va.R.Evid. 803(4). I cannot help but conclude that Mr. Trainor began his "treatment" with his "diagnosis" a foregone conclusion.

Other courts have expressed concern that where very young children are involved whose testimonial competence is questionable, and no physical findings of abuse are involved, the physician's testimony as to statements supposedly made by the children may not be admissible. At their young age, children can lack the maturity to appreciate the link between their statements and the treatment. Cassidy v. State, 74 Md.App. 1, 536 A.2d 666, cert. denied, 312 Md. 602, 541 A.2d 965 (1988). Colorado courts have required the State to demonstrate in camera that very young children understand the obligation to provide the doctor with accurate information in order for the statements to be admissible under its counterpart to W.Va.R.Evid. 803(4). See Olden v. People, 732 P.2d 1132 (Colo.1986); W.C.L. v. People, 685 P.2d 176 (Colo.1984).

Mr. Trainor was never specifically directed to define his role or to separate what the children actually told him from what their mother said that she had been told. Further confusion arose when he discussed general characteristics of the child abuse syndrome without explaining whether they were present in the case at hand. I discussed the foundation deficiency of his opinion in Part III, supra. Defense counsel made no pertinent objections on any of these points.

A.

The majority brushes aside the defendant's claim of ineffective assistance of counsel. However, the record is replete with incidents where counsel not only failed to object to evidentiary matters, but also to substantive issues that might well have produced a different result at trial or on this appeal. In addition, counsel questioned witnesses in such a faulty manner as to award the prosecution an erroneous and unwarranted advantage. I find it impossible to conclude that counsel's error can be washed away under the rubric of strategy and tactics.

First, the record discloses that the two child victims were permitted to testify by way of a closed-circuit television. The child witness was placed in the judge's office with a television camera. The defendant, attorneys, judge, and jury were in the courtroom where they could view the television screen and hear the questions and the child's answers. They could not be seen by the child witness. For some unexplained reason, in the judge's office with the witness was a state trooper who, according to the record, had participated in the investigation. This entire arrangement was by agreement between the prosecutor and defense counsel.

The Sixth Amendment guarantees that "[i]n all criminal proceedings, the accused shall enjoy the right ... to be confronted with the witnesses against him[.]" U.S. Const. amend. VI. As the United States Supreme Court explained in California v. Green, 399 U.S. 149, 157, 90 S.Ct. 1930, 1934, 26 L.Ed.2d 489, 496 (1970): "Our own decisions seem to have recognized at an early date that it is this literal right to 'confront' the witness at the time of trial that forms the core of the values furthered by the Confrontation Clause."

In Coy v. Iowa, 487 U.S. 1012, 108 S.Ct. 2798, 101 L.Ed.2d 857 (1988), the Supreme Court found the Sixth Amendment right of confrontation was violated when the trial court permitted the sexually abused child witness to be screened from the defendant while testifying, even though the witness could be observed by the jury. We followed Coy's dictates in Syllabus Point 5 of State v. Murray, 180 W.Va. 41, 375 S.E.2d 405 (1988):

> "Under Coy v. Iowa, 487 U.S. [1012], 108 S.Ct. 2798, 101 L.Ed.2d 857 (1988), and State ex rel. Grob v. Blair, 158 W.Va. 647, 214 S.E.2d 330 (1975), the right to confrontation assured by the Sixth Amendment and W.Va. Const. art. III, § 14 is violated where a witness testifies at trial and the defendant is denied the opportunity to confront the witness face-to-face."

We acknowledged in Murray the Supreme Court's caveat in Coy that "[w]e leave for another day, however, the question whether any exceptions exist. Whatever they may be, they would surely be allowed only when necessary to further an important public policy."

State v. Murray, 180 W.Va. at 48 n. 3, 375 S.E.2d at 412 n. 3, quoting 487 U.S. at 1021, 108 S.Ct. at 2803, 101 L.Ed.2d at 867.

This issue is weighty and difficult. In any event, by failing to raise a Sixth Amendment right of confrontation objection, counsel made a grievous mistake. I recognize that, after this case was tried, the United States Supreme Court held in a 5-4 opinion that in certain instances live television testimony is permissible at trial by a child who is a victim of sexual abuse. Maryland v. Craig, 497 U.S. 836, 110 S.Ct. 3157, 111 L.Ed.2d 666 (1990). However, Craig does not grant a blanket approval of this technique. In order to invoke the procedure, the Supreme Court decided that it must be shown that an important state interest could be furthered: "We likewise conclude today that a State's interest in the physical and psychological well-being of child abuse victims may be sufficiently important to outweigh, at least in some cases, a defendant's right to face his or her accusers in court." 497 U.S. at ----, 110 S.Ct. at 3167, 111 L.Ed.2d at 683. The Supreme Court went on in Craig to spell out in some detail how a requisite finding should be made:

> "The requisite finding of necessity must of course be a case-specific one: the trial court must hear evidence and determine whether use of the one-way closed circuit television procedure is necessary to protect the welfare of the particular child witness who seeks to testify.... The trial court must also find that the child witness would be traumatized, not by the courtroom generally, but by the presence of the defendant.... Finally, the trial court must find that the emotional distress suffered by the child witness in the presence of the defendant is more than de minimus, i.e., more than 'mere nervousness or excitement or some reluctance to testify,'Wildermuth [v. State], 310 Md. [496], 524, 530 A.2d [275] at 289 [(1987)]; see also State v. Mannion, 19 Utah 505, 511-512, 57 P. 542, 543-544 (1899)." 497 U.S. at ----, 110 S.Ct. at 3169, 111 L.Ed.2d at 685. (Citations omitted).

Furthermore, the Supreme Court took pains to emphasize that the procedures used must ensure

> "the reliability of the evidence by subjecting it to rigorous adversarial testing and thereby preserv[ing] the essence of effective confrontation. Because there is no dispute that the child witnesses in this case testified under oath, were subject to full cross-examination, and were able to be observed by the judge, jury, and defendant as they testified, we conclude that, to the extent that a proper finding of necessity has been made, the admission of such testimony would be consonant with the Confrontation Clause." 497 U.S. at ----, 110 S.Ct. at 3170, 111 L.Ed.2d at 686.

In the present case, no objection was made to the testimony by closed-circuit television, and there is no record of whether the initial requisite finding could be met. In Craig, there was expert testimony regarding the particular trauma that the child witnesses would have experienced if forced to confront the defendant face to face.

A further critical point is embedded in this case which was not present in Craig. Here, the child witness was in the room with an adult who was one of the State's investigating officers. I do not believe that any court would sanction this type of procedure. With the officer not on camera, the potential for him to influence the child witness by head nodding or other signals without detection by the court or jury is available. In short, I do not believe that the procedure used in this case comports with Craig, and I believe that a violation of the Sixth Amendment right of confrontation has occurred.

B.

I have previously addressed the admissibility of the expert's testimony in Part IV, supra. Counsel made no objection to the reliability of the expert's so-called tests that led to his child abuse profile. As a consequence, the State was never required to prove this threshold issue. Moreover, no objection was made to Mr. Trainor's conclusion that the children had been the victims of sexual abuse even though there were no physical findings of abuse. These omissions clearly demonstrate the inadequacy of trial counsel's representation.

C.

As I discussed in Part II, defense counsel made no attempt to preclude the prosecution from offering evidence of collateral crimes under W.Va.R.Evid. 404(b). Counsel did not request an in camera hearing to determine if the prejudicial effect of this testimony outweighed the probative value under W.Va.R.Evid. 403 and as required by State v. Dolin, supra. Finally, counsel did not request a cautionary or limiting instruction to the jury that such collateral crimes could not be considered as evidence of guilt. Counsel was totally ineffective in this regard, and there can be no doubt that the defendant was severely prejudiced.

Defense counsel's ill-conceived questioning of witnesses, coupled with the failure to object to the prosecutor's questions, led to devastating results for the defendant.

First, the defendant's ex-wife testified that the defendant had made telephone calls to sex clubs. She was not present when the telephone calls were made and did not hear the conversations. Defense counsel made no objection.

The ex-wife also testified that the defendant had masturbated in front of his son. She did not witness these events, but testified that she had been informed of them by her son approximately two years afterwards. Again, counsel did not object, although it was clear from the very beginning of the ex-wife's testimony that she was going to relate not what she observed, but what was related to her by her son.

Defense counsel's cross-examination of the defendant's ex-wife, who was the State's key witness, and who was hostile towards the defendant, led to some disastrous consequences. Despite defense counsel's failure to object to the direct testimony about the defendant's calls to sex clubs, there was no linkage of these calls to the children until defense counsel asked this question and received the following answer:

> "Q So, that there doesn't appear to be any connection between these phone calls and any abuse of the children, isn't that correct?
> "A That's not true, because my children said that their father made them listen to these phone calls."

In a bizarre attempt to impeach the ex-wife's credibility, defense counsel unaccountably brought into evidence another collateral act of the defendant which involved sex with a dog. Not only was this statement hearsay, but the ex-wife managed to expand on the statement to include the defendant's threat to the son. See footnote 35

Further unenlightened cross-examination of the ex-wife by defense counsel brought to the jury's attention that the defendant had pulled out his vasectomy stitches because he had been "playing with himself." See footnote 36 Even with defense counsel's absence of objections, the State had not tried to introduce these acts on direct examination of the defendant's ex-wife.

Finally, when defense counsel asked the ex-wife whether she and the defendant had a normal sex life, she responded: "I thought it was normal up until the end, towards the end." On redirect, the prosecutor made several more pulverizing points based on defense counsel's "opening the door" about the defendant's normal sex life. The prosecutor was able to have the ex-wife describe the defendant's inability to have an orgasm without masturbating. The ex-wife also described the defendant's practice of leaning against the washing machine and masturbating when it was in the spin cycle.

I cannot help but believe that all of this bizarre sexual information would cast the defendant as a monstrous sexual pervert who, in the eyes of the jury, was easily capable of accomplishing the sexual abuse of his children. For defense counsel to bring this information to the attention of the jury by direct and explicit questions defies any logic. In the words of Syllabus Point 21 of State v. Thomas, 157 W.Va. 640, 203 S.E.2d 445 (1974), "no reasonably qualified defense attorney would have so acted in the defense of an accused." See footnote 37

I am at a loss to account for the majority's glossing over of the ineffective assistance of counsel claim.

Conclusion

I conclude on a rather elegiac note. Perhaps I have read more into the majority's opinion than was meant; perhaps it did not intend to stand the law in this area on its head. I trust that our circuit judges and counsel will approach this area with a cautionary balanced view of the law as it exists elsewhere, as I hope it will exist here, and as I have attempted to outline.

I am authorized to state that Chief Justice NEELY joins me in this dissent.

Footnote: 1 W.Va.R.Evid. 404(b) provides:
"Other Crimes, Wrongs, or Acts.--Evidence of other crimes, wrongs, or acts is not admissible to prove the character of a person in order to show that he acted in conformity therewith. It may, however, be admissible for other purposes, such as proof of motive, opportunity, intent, preparation, plan, knowledge, identity, or absence of mistake or accident."

Footnote: 2 Syllabus Point 8 of Dolin states:
"To the extent that State v. Beacraft, 126 W.Va. 895, 30 S.E.2d 541 (1944), State v. Lohm, 97 W.Va. 652, 125 S.E. 758 (1924), and State v. Driver, 88 W.Va. 479, 107 S.E. 189 (1921), allow collateral sexual offenses to be admitted into evidence to show an improper or lustful disposition toward the victim, they are overruled."

Footnote: 3 In note 15, 183 W.Va. at 651, 398 S.E.2d at 133, the majority states:
"Jurisdictions have termed such uses in different manners but still have permitted this evidence to show an accused's 'emotional propensity for sexual aberration,' 'lewd disposition,' 'propensity to act out his sexual desires with young girls,' or 'moral disposition and perversity.' See State v. Phillips, 102 Ariz. 377, 379, 430 P.2d 139, 141 (1967); State v. Maestas, 224 N.W.2d 248, 251 (Iowa 1974); State v. Tarrell, 74 Wis.2d 647, 648, 247 N.W.2d 696, 703 (1976); State v. Shively, 172 Ohio St. 128, 131, 174 N.E.2d 104, 107 (1961)."

Footnote: 4 W. Va. R. Evid. 403 States:
“Exclusion of Relevant Evidence on Grounds of Prejudice, Confusion, or Waste of Time. Although relevant, evidence may be excluded if its probative value is substantially outweighed by the danger of unfair prejudice, confusion of the issues, or misleading the jury, or by considerations of undue delay, waste of time, or needless presentation of cumulative evidence.”

Footnote: 5 Syllabus Point 3 of Dolin states:

"Before a trial court can determine that evidence of collateral crimes is admissible under one of the exceptions, an in camera hearing is necessary to allow a trial court to carefully consider the admissibility of collateral crime evidence and to properly balance the probative value of such evidence against its prejudicial effect."

Footnote: 6 Syllabus Point 9 of Dolin provides:
"It is customary to give the jury a limiting instruction with regard to its consideration of a collateral crime. This instruction generally provides that the evidence of a collateral crime is not to be considered as proof of the defendant's guilt on the present charge, but may be considered in deciding whether a given issue or element relevant to the present charge has been proven. When a defendant requests this limiting instruction, it must be given."

Footnote: 7 Footnote 24 of the majority's opinion, 183 W.Va. at 658, 398 S.E.2d at 140, states: "We clarify this holding in that McCoy is limited to the facts of that case. Hence, a physician can testify that in his or her opinion, based on physical findings, a particular victim was raped."

Footnote: 8 The full text of Syllabus Point 2 of McCoy states:
"Qualified expert testimony regarding rape trauma syndrome is relevant and admissible in a prosecution for rape where the defense is consent. The expert may testify that the alleged victim exhibits behavior consistent with rape trauma syndrome, but the expert may not give an opinion, expressly or implicitly, as to whether or not the alleged victim was raped."

Footnote: 9 The complete text of Syllabus Point 7 is:
"Expert psychological testimony is permissible in cases involving incidents of child sexual abuse and an expert may state an opinion as to whether the child comports with the psychological and behavioral profile of a child sexual abuse victim, and may offer an opinion based on objective findings that the child has been sexually abused. Such an expert may not give an opinion as to whether he personally believes the child, nor an opinion as to whether the sexual assault was committed by the defendant, as these would improperly and prejudicially invade the province of the jury."

Footnote: 10 Syllabus Point 4 of Myers demonstrates this point:
"It is within the trial court's discretion to admit qualified expert testimony describing the psychological and emotional characteristics typically observed in sexually abused children and those observed in the complainant and giving other background data providing a relevant insight into the conduct and demeanor of the child complainant which the jury could not otherwise bring to its evaluation of her credibility."

Footnote: 11 In Syllabus Point 5 of Myers the Minnesota court stated: "Defendant opened the door to opinion testimony regarding the truthfulness of complainant's allegations by eliciting the opinion of complainant's mother about the truthfulness of her daughter's allegations."

Footnote: 12 The full text of W.Va.R.Evid. 608(a) is:
"Evidence of Character and Conduct of Witness. (a) Opinion and Reputation Evidence of Character.--The credibility of a witness may be attacked or supported by evidence in the form of opinion or reputation, but subject to these limitations: (1) the evidence may refer only to character for truthfulness or untruthfulness; and (2) evidence of truthful character is admissible only after the character of the witness for truthfulness has been attacked by opinion or reputation evidence or otherwise."

Footnote: 20 Syllabus Point 5 of State v. Smith states: "The language of Rule 804(b)(5) of the West Virginia Rules of Evidence and its counterpart in Rule 803(24) requires that five general factors must be met in order for hearsay evidence to be admissible under the rules. First and most important is the trustworthiness of the statement, which must be equivalent to the trustworthiness underlying the specific exceptions to the hearsay rule. Second, the statement must be offered to prove a material fact. Third, the statement must be shown to be more probative on the issue for which it is offered than any other evidence the proponent can reasonably procure. Fourth, admission of the statement must comport with the general purpose of the rules of evidence and the interest of justice. Fifth, adequate notice of the statement must be afforded the other party to provide that party a fair opportunity to meet the evidence."

Footnote: 21 We have the same provisions in our Rule 801(d) which provides that certain out-of-court statements are not hearsay. W.Va.R.Evid. 801(d) provides:
"(d) Statements Which are not Hearsay.--A statement is not hearsay if--
(1) Prior Statement by Witness.--The declarant testifies at the trial or hearing and is subject to cross-examination concerning the statement, and the statement is (A) inconsistent with his testimony, and was given under oath subject to the penalty of perjury at a trial, hearing, or other proceeding, or in a deposition, or (B) consistent with his testimony and is offered to rebut an express or implied charge against him of recent fabrication or improper influence or motive, or (C) one of identification of a person made after perceiving him; or (2) Admission by Party-Opponent.--The statement is offered against a party and is (A) his own statement, in either his individual or a representative capacity, or (B) a statement of which he has manifested his adoption or belief in its truth, or (C) a statement by a person authorized by him to make a statement concerning the subject, or (D) a statement by his agent or servant concerning a matter within the scope of his agency or employment, made during the existence of the relationship, or (E) a statement by a co- conspirator of a party during the course and in furtherance of the conspiracy."

Footnote: 23 The court reasoned in Clanton, 539 So.2d at 1028, as follows:
"These statements were hearsay. Ordinarily, under prerules decisions, they would have been inadmissible even if Clanton had testified, as an attempt to bolster his testimony.... This has been carried over into the Mississippi Rules of Evidence. Rule 613 recognizes that prior inconsistent statements may be used for impeachment purposes, but prior consistent statements cannot be used to bolster a witness.... And, when a witness testifies, prior consistent statements are likewise inadmissible, except in rare and special circumstances, none of which are present here." (Citations omitted.)

Footnote: 24 The Court's remarks in Mitchell were: "[On remand], it will be incumbent upon the trial judge from the court proceeding before him to first determine and find that the hearsay testimony is not otherwise admissible under M.R.E. 803, but could qualify under 803(24)." 539 So.2d at 1371. (Citations omitted).

Footnote: 25 From a technical standpoint, the trial court's finding that the child victim was incapable of testifying rendered the witness unavailable. In these circumstances, W.Va.R.Evid. 804(b)(5) would come into play. Both this rule and W.Va.R.Evid. 803(24), however, are identical as to the criteria that have to be met.

Footnote: 26 The child's story, as related by the mother, was:
"[H]e opened up and said daddy had put his georgie in his butt and it hurt, and daddy had put his finger in his butt and it hurt, daddy had played with my georgie, meaning [E.L.]'s georgie, until daddy's georgie peed white, I'm tryin to get on a five year level to see if there was any, maybe oral sex, so I asked him, well [E.L.], did at any time did daddy put his mouth on your georgie, and he said but mommy, I told him not to with that brown stuff in his mouth, well, Ed used snuff, and he cried, at this point, I lost it, my only concern at that time was my God, my son needs help."

Footnote: 27 Part of the problem with admitting such statements from adults is that their testimony about what the child victim told them is usually much more elaborate than the victim is able to actually testify about. This is demonstrated by the record in this case where both children answered most of the questions with either yes or no.

Footnote: 28 Syllabus Point 5 of the majority opinion states:
"The two-part test set for admitting hearsay statements pursuant to W.Va.R.Evid. 803(4) is (1) the declarant's motive in making the statements must be consistent with the purposes of promoting treatment, and (2) the content of the statement must be such as is reasonably relied upon by a physician in treatment or diagnosis."

Footnote: 29 The full text of W.Va.R.Evid. 803(4) is:
"The following are not excluded by the hearsay rule, even though the declarant is available as a witness:

* * * * * *

"(4) Statements for Purposes of Medical Diagnosis or Treatment. Statements made for purposes of medical diagnosis or treatment and describing medical history, or past or present symptoms, pain, or sensations, or the inception or general character of the cause or external source thereof insofar as reasonably pertinent to diagnosis or treatment."

Footnote: 30 Syllabus Point 8 of Sutherland states:
"It is a well recognized exception to the hearsay rule that a doctor who examines a patient for the purpose of treatment may testify as to his medical conclusions, which may be based on the history given to him by the patient with regard to subjective symptoms."

Footnote: 31 Syllabus Point 9 of Sutherland states:
"Where an examination by a doctor is not made within the doctor-patient relationship for the purpose of treatment but made solely for the purpose of using the doctor as a witness, the exception to the hearsay rule, that a doctor who examines a patient for purpose of treatment may testify as to his medical conclusions based on the history given to him by the patient with regard to subjective symptoms, disappears."

Footnote: 32 The Advisory Committee notes to Fed.R.Evid. 803(4) state in material part: "Conventional doctrine has excluded from the hearsay exception, as not within its guarantee of truthfulness, statements to a physician consulted only for the purpose of enabling him to testify. While these statements were not admissible as substantive evidence, the expert was allowed to state the basis of his opinion, including statements of this kind. The distinction thus called for was one most unlikely to be made by juries. The rule accordingly rejects the limitation. This position is consistent with the provision of Rule 703 that the facts on which expert testimony is based need not be admissible in evidence if of a kind ordinarily relied upon by experts in the field."

Footnote: 33 The courts' confusion in this area is discussed in R. Mosteller, supra at 274 n. 68:
"The error committed here of joining the two requirements is a relatively common one with courts, arising typically from the same mistake in two highly influential opinions from the United States Court of Appeals for the Eighth Circuit, United States v. Iron Shell, 633 F.2d 77 (8th Cir.1980), cert. denied, 450 U.S. 1001 [101 S.Ct. 1709, 68 L.Ed.2d 203] (1981), and United States v. Renville, 779 F.2d 430 (8th Cir.1985). See, e.g., Morgan v. Foretich, 846 F.2d 941, 949-50 (4th Cir.1988)."

Footnote: 34 Mr. Trainor's testimony was:
"[I]nitially, I, when, when we had a, when I had my first contact with the case, much of the story had been told to a, to a family friend and it was repeated to me by, by Mrs. [L.]. When we first got started, [E.L.] had a great deal of trouble talking about it, one thing that commonly happens in sexual abuse cases is after a disclosure, there is a suppression phase[.]"

Footnote: 35 The questioning was as follows:
"Q ... you made another, other statements to the officer in the course of the investigation, do you want to maintain now that everything you said in that report is accurate and true?
"A Yes, I haven't lied to nobody.
"Q Would you recall making a statement with respect to a dog?
"A Yes, I did.
"Q Uh-huh is that statement true?
"A I didn't see it, that's what my son told me.
"Q Wait a minute, you told the officer and I quote, 'she also indicated that he had sex with the poodle terrier in front of [E.L.] at some point in time,' is that statement true or false?

"A I stated that [E.L.] had told me that his daddy had let the dog, which was a poodle, her name was Mitzi, ride his georgie, and if he told mommy he would let the dog eat [E.L.]'s georgie off, I did not see that myself.
"Q Uh-huh, how old was this dog?
"A Maybe a year and a half, two years old.
"Q Uh-huh, how big is it? "A I haven't seen it, he's got it.
"Q Well, he had it when you lived in the house together, didn't you?
"A Oh, yeah, at that time, she was about this long, maybe stood about that high, (at this time, the witness showed the approximate length and height of the dog by showing with her hands).
"Q What sex was the dog?
"A Female.
"Q You sit there and you, you relay this statement that you, it's physically impossible for that to happen, isn't it?
"A I don't know, I wasn't there, I was just tellin you what my son told me."

Footnote: 36 The exchange from the record is as follows:
"Q [I]n the course of your discussions with Mr. Trainor, as in your discussions with the police officer, you made a number of statements regarding your, your husband's sexual behavior, and at one point, you stated that he pulled vasectomy stitches. "A I had company that came from the Auxiliary ... there visiting me and the children, we were sitting there talking and Ed hollered to ask if I could come in the bathroom with him, and when I did, he showed me where the stitches had been pulled loose, what am I supposed to do, I said I guess you'll have to go back up to the emergency room, you've pulled 'em loose, so he did, I think [a neighbor] went and got him and brought him home, and he said that Dr. Khurana had prescribed a couple prescriptions so that there wouldn't be any infections, and I made the comment that it's not gonna do a world of good if you didn't have handcuffs on the bottom of the prescription because it came from playing with himself."
"Q Now, are you going to maintain that that was the truth as seen by your own eyes?
"A I've seen him sit and pat the front of his pants more times than I would even want to try to estimate the amounts of time."

Footnote: 37 The full text of Syllabus Point 21 of Thomas states:
"Where a counsel's performance, attacked as ineffective, arises from occurrences involving strategy, tactics and arguable courses of action, his conduct will be deemed effectively assistive of his client's interests, unless no reasonably qualified defense attorney would have so acted in the defense of an accused."

The Opinion of the Court was delivered PER CURIAM.

SYLLABUS BY THE COURT

1. "Although conclusions of law reached by a circuit court are subject to de novo review, when an action, such as an abuse and neglect case, is tried upon the facts without a jury, the circuit court shall make a determination based upon the evidence and shall make findings of fact and conclusions of law as to whether such child is abused or neglected. These findings shall not be set aside by a reviewing court unless clearly erroneous. A finding is clearly erroneous when, although there is evidence to support the finding, the reviewing court on the entire evidence is left with the definite and firm conviction that a mistake has been committed. However, a reviewing court may not overturn a finding simply because it would have decided the case differently, and it must affirm a finding if the circuit court's account of the evidence is plausible in light of the record viewed in its entirety." 5. "There is a clear legislative directive that guardians ad litem and counsel for both sides be given an opportunity to advocate for their clients in child abuse or neglect proceedings. West Virginia Code § 49-6-5(a) (1995) states that the circuit court shall give both the petitioner and respondents an opportunity to be heard when proceeding to the

Per Curiam:

This Court has received two separate appeals by H. Beth Sears, guardian ad litem for Richard O., Jr., and Kimberly O.,[1] from two orders of the Circuit Court of Roane County dismissing abuse and neglect petitions based upon the lower court's conclusion that the allegations of sexual abuse were unfounded. This Court has consolidated the two appeals for consideration in this opinion. The guardian ad litem (hereinafter "Appellant") asserts that the lower court erred by failing to provide a full and adequate opportunity for the development of evidence in these matters. Having thoroughly reviewed the briefs of the parties, all matters of record, and applicable precedent, this Court is of the opinion that the lower court's dismissal of the Department of Health and Human Resources' (hereinafter "DHHR") abuse and neglect petitions was in error. Accordingly, we reverse the decisions of the lower court dismissing these matters and remand for further proceedings consistent with this opinion.

[1]We follow our traditional practice in cases involving sensitive facts and use initials to identify the last names of the parties. See In re Jeffrey R. L., 190 W.Va. 24, 435 S.E.2d 162 (1993).

I. Factual and Procedural History

The first abuse and neglect petition in the case was filed on December 10, 2002, with an amended petition filed December 13, 2002. In that first petition, allegations were raised concerning a sexually explicit letter allegedly written by Richard O. to his stepdaughter Elizabeth A., indicating that the two individuals had engaged in oral sexual activity. The petition asserted that Elizabeth A.'s mother, JoAnn, had found the letter and had obtained a domestic violence order, dated December 6, 2002, against Richard O.[2] The petition further alleged that Richard O. had engaged his stepdaughter, Elizabeth, and a cousin, Melody, in inappropriate sexual conversation while the three camped in a tent in the backyard of the family home. Richard allegedly brought pornographic magazines and beer to the tent and attempted to engage in sexual behavior with the girls. The mother later found a portion of a condom wrapper in the tent.

[2]JoAnn also apparently signed a protection plan with the DHHR, indicating that she would not drop the protective order and would ensure that Richard O. did not have contact with the children. On December 9, 2002, however, JoAnn asked that the domestic violence petition be dismissed.

Three children, including Elizabeth A., Richard O., Jr., and Kimberly O.,[3] were removed from the home pursuant to an emergency petition. The mother, JoAnn, thereafter asserted that she had found a second letter ostensibly authored by Elizabeth indicating that the first letter had been written by Elizabeth to falsely implicate Richard O. as a sexual abuser.[4]

The lower court held adjudicatory hearings on this first petition in March and May 2003. Testimony was received from JoAnn regarding the condom wrapper in the tent, as well as both letters. JoAnn testified that she did not believe that Richard would sexually abuse Elizabeth or Melody. Richard testified that he had not had engaged in sexual contact with either girl. Melody, the cousin involved in the alleged incident in the tent, indicated that Richard had exposed himself in the tent. She also testified that although Richard had touched her breast area on top of her clothing, no actual sexual intercourse occurred in the tent. Melody testified that she had no knowledge of either letter.

[3]Elizabeth A. was born on April 25, 1987, and was fifteen years of age at the time the first petition was filed in this case. She is currently eighteen years of age and will therefore not be directly affected by the outcome of this appeal. Richard O., Jr., was born on December 29, 1997, and is currently seven years of age. Kimberly O. was born on January 25, 2000, and is currently five years of age. Elizabeth A. is the step-daughter of Richard O. Kimberly and Richard O., Jr., are the biological children of Richard O.

[4]This second letter was printed from a computer that Richard and JoAnn immediately thereafter sold at a flea market for approximately one-half of its value. Although the computer had been used by the entire family, Richard allegedly used it to view pornography, and it was housed in Elizabeth's bedroom.

Elizabeth testified that Richard had given her the sexually explicit letter, telling her to read the letter and then burn it. She did not assert any knowledge concerning the basis for the assertions regarding oral sex that Richard made in the letter. She further testified that her mother had tried to convince her to protect Richard by claiming that she had written both letters. She also explained that she thought, based upon body positions, that Richard had sexual intercourse with Melody in the tent during the camping incident.

Janice Blake, a psychologist, testified that JoAnn had come to her office requesting assistance due to the sexually explicit letter she had found. Ms. Blake testified that JoAnn had informed her that she had spoken with Elizabeth about the letter and that Elizabeth had told her that Richard had sexually abused Melody in the tent. Ms. Blake then reported the situation to DHHR Child Protective Services.

On December 3, 2003, the lower court dismissed the first petition and ordered the children returned to their home. The lower court found that "[t]he testimony of two teenage girls was contradictory with one another [regarding whether Richard sexually assaulted Melody in the tent and] that this Court finds that the testimony is not worth [sic] of belief." The lower court further found that "[t]he petitioner has failed [to prove] by clear and convincing preponderance of evidence that the acts alleged in the petition occurred."[5] The lower court stayed that order pending an appeal to this Court by the Appellant.

While that first appeal was pending in this Court, additional allegations came to the attention of the DHHR, and thus, on April 5, 2004, the DHHR filed a second abuse and neglect petition. The second petition alleged that Richard had sexually abused Elizabeth in the summer of 2002 by forcing her to engage in oral sexual activity while Richard was teaching Elizabeth to drive. The Appellant explains that Elizabeth recalled these additional incidents with specificity by virtue of the fact that she was safely out of the abusive home and in counseling. Process Strategies psychologists David Clayman and Cherie Cowder interviewed Elizabeth regarding the allegations of abuse and also reviewed the letters. They found that Elizabeth's allegations were credible and that the two letters appeared to have been written by the same person, based upon grammatical errors and style.

A hearing was conducted by the lower court on April 12, 2004. Elizabeth testified that Richard had taken her on a country road to teach her to drive. When they stopped to urinate on the side of the road, Elizabeth contends that Richard forced her to lie down on the seat of the car and that Richard performed oral sex on her. Elizabeth explained that she had not informed the court about this incident of sexual abuse during the first abuse and neglect petition hearing "[b]ecause at the time I was in foster care and I was afraid I was going to go back home and if I did tell them nothing happened I'd go back home and I'd get hurt." Elizabeth stated that she was afraid Richard would beat her or do "something to Kimmy and Richard, II." Elizabeth further explained that she finally reported the abuse "[b]ecause when I told my foster mom about it I actually felt safe enough to where I could tell somebody and that I wouldn't, I knew that I wouldn't go back."

[5]This Court will assume that the lower court's finding regarding insufficiency of the evidence contained a typographical error. The appropriate standard is clear and convincing evidence, rather than "clear and convincing preponderance of evidence" as the lower court stated. See W. Va. Code § 49-6-2(c) (1996) (Repl. Vol. 2004) ("The findings must be based upon conditions existing at the time of the filing of the petition and proven by clear and convincing proof").

At the time of the April 12, 2004, hearing, the Appellant also filed a motion for a forensic maltreatment evaluation of Kimberly and Richard, Jr. The matter was continued to May 10, 2004, for further hearing. The hearing scheduled for May 10 did not occur, due to the lower court's decision to continue it.

On May 27, 2004, this Court granted the appeal of the dismissal of the first petition. The following assignments of error were submitted by the DHHR: (1) the lower court erred by dismissing the petition and ordering the return of the children to their home, and (2) the lower court erred by failing to terminate parental rights.

On July 22, 2004, the lower court dismissed the second DHHR abuse and neglect petition, finding that Elizabeth was not credible since she "forgot the event which gives rise to the allegations of sexual misconduct" by Richard. The lower court also denied "all pending motions herein as MOOT." On November 10, 2004, this Court granted the appeal of the dismissal of the second abuse and neglect petition. The Appellant asserts the following assignments of error in the second appeal: (1) the lower court erred by finding no probable cause and dismissing the second petition; (2) the lower court erred by denying the Appellant's motion for forensic child maltreatment evaluations for her clients without holding a hearing; (3) the lower court erred by finding that Elizabeth was not credible based upon her failure to articulate all abusive events in the first abuse and neglect proceeding; and (4) the lower court erred by failing to act in a timely fashion pursuant to Rules of Procedure for Abuse and Neglect Cases.

In syllabus point one of In re Tiffany Marie S., 196 W.Va. 223, 470 S.E.2d 177 (1996), this Court explained as follows:

> Although conclusions of law reached by a circuit court are subject to de novo review, when an action, such as an abuse and neglect case, is tried upon the facts without a jury, the circuit court shall make a determination based upon the evidence and shall make findings of fact and conclusions of law as to whether such child is abused or neglected. These findings shall not be set aside by a reviewing court unless clearly erroneous. A finding is clearly erroneous when, although there is evidence to support the finding, the reviewing court on the entire evidence is left with the definite and firm conviction that a mistake has been committed. However, a reviewing court may not overturn a finding simply because it would have decided the case differently, and it must affirm a finding if the circuit court's > account of the evidence is plausible in light of the record viewed in its entirety.

In In re Emily, 208 W.Va. 325, 540 S.E.2d 542 (2000), this Court explained that "[f]or appeals resulting from abuse and neglect proceedings, such as the case sub judice, we employ a compound standard of review: conclusions of law are subject to a de novo review, while findings of fact are weighed against a clearly erroneous standard." 208 W.Va. at 332, 540 S.E.2d at 549.

III. Discussion

Any evaluation pertaining to the rights of children must be guided by this Court's consistent recognition that a child's rights are paramount. As this Court stated in syllabus point three of In re Katie S., 198 W.Va. 79, 479 S.E.2d 589 (1996), "[a]lthough parents have substantial rights that must be protected, the primary goal in cases involving abuse and neglect, as in all family law matters, must be the health and welfare of the children." Within the abuse and neglect setting, this Court has also recognized the rights of children residing in the home, such as Kimberly and Richard, Jr., even where those children are not alleged to have been the direct victims of the abuse. In syllabus point two of In re Christina L., 194 W.Va. 446, 460 S.E.2d 692 (1995), this Court explained:

> Where there is clear and convincing evidence that a child has suffered physical and/or sexual abuse while in the custody of his or her parent(s), guardian, or custodian, another child residing in the home when the abuse took place who is not a > direct victim of the physical and/or sexual abuse but is at risk of being abused is an abused child under W.Va.Code, 49-1-3(a) (1994).

Implementing these guidelines designed to protect the crucial interests of children, "this Court, over a substantial period of time, has expressed an unwavering interest in providing comprehensive and fair procedures for the consideration of abuse and neglect cases." In re Edward B., 210 W.Va. 621, 632, 558 S.E.2d 620, 631 (2001). This Court emphasized as follows in Edward B.,

> As this most important area of the law has expanded, this Court has insisted that the directives of applicable rules and legislative enactments must be carefully identified, respected, and incorporated within our court system. The Rules of Procedure for Child Abuse and Neglect Proceedings and the related statutes detailing fair, prompt, and thorough procedures for child abuse and neglect cases are not mere general guidance; rather, they are stated in mandatory terms and vest carefully described and circumscribed discretion in our courts, intended to protect the due process rights of the parents as well as the rights of the innocent children.

Id., 558 S.E.2d at 631. In addressing the precise statutory requirements regarding the handling of abuse and neglect matters, this Court has explained that "[t]he statutory scheme applicable in child abuse and neglect proceedings provides for an essentially two phase process." In re Beth Ann B., 204 W.Va. 424, 427, 513 S.E.2d 472, 475 (1998). "The first phase culminates in an adjudication of abuse and/or neglect. See W.Va.Code § 49-6-2(c) (1996). The second phase is a dispositional one, undertaken to achieve the appropriate permanent placement of a child adjudged to be abused and/or neglected. See W.Va.Code § 49-6-5 (1996)." Id., 513 S.E.2d at 475 (footnote omitted).

During the proceedings in an abuse and neglect case, a guardian ad litem is charged with the duty to faithfully represent the interests of the child and effectively advocate on the child's behalf. In State v. Michael M., 202 W.Va. 350, 504 S.E.2d 177 (1998), this Court explained that "guardians ad litem have a duty to fully represent the interests of their child wards at all stages of the abuse and/or neglect proceedings, both in the circuit court and on appeal." 202 W.Va. at 356 n. 11, 504 S.E.2d at 183 n. 11. In syllabus point four of Christina L., this Court explained as follows:

> "Each child in an abuse and neglect case is entitled to effective representation of counsel. To further that goal, W.Va.Code, 49-6-2(a) [1992] mandates that a child has a right to be represented by counsel in every stage of abuse and neglect proceedings. Furthermore, Rule XIII of the West Virginia Rules for Trial Courts of Record provides that a guardian ad litem shall make a full and independent investigation of the facts involved in the proceeding, and shall make his or her recommendations known to the court. Rules 1.1 and 1.3 of the West Virginia Rules of Professional Conduct, respectively, require an attorney to provide competent representation to a client, and to act with reasonable diligence and promptness in representing a client." Syllabus Point 5, in part, In re Jeffrey R.L., 190 W.Va. 24, 435 S.E.2d 162 (1993).

194 W.Va. at 448, 460 S.E.2d at 694. The essential right to the opportunity to be heard is also expressed in West Virginia Code § 49-6-2(c) (1996) (Repl. Vol. 2004), which provides, in pertinent part, as follows:

> In any proceeding pursuant to the provisions of this article, the party or parties having custodial or other parental rights or responsibilities to the child shall be afforded a meaningful opportunity to be heard, including the opportunity to testify and to present and cross-examine witnesses.

This Court also observed as follows in syllabus point three of State ex rel. Amy M. v. Kaufman, 196 W.Va. 251, 470 S.E.2d 205 (1996):

> There is a clear legislative directive that guardians ad litem and counsel for both sides be given an opportunity to advocate for their clients in child abuse or neglect proceedings. West Virginia Code § 49-6-5(a) (1995) states that the circuit court shall give both the petitioner and respondents an opportunity to be heard when proceeding to the disposition of the case. This right must be understood to mean that the circuit court may not impose unreasonable limitations upon the function of guardians ad litem in representing their clients in accord with the traditions of the adversarial fact-finding process.

See also W. Va. Code § 49-6-5(a) (2002) (Repl. Vol. 2004) ("The court shall forthwith proceed to disposition giving both the petitioner and respondents an opportunity to be heard").

Thus, both statutory pronouncements and the precedents of this Court have directed that guardians ad litem must be afforded a meaningful opportunity to fully represent the children. Moreover, both statutory and case law have instructed trial courts that certain procedures, as outlined above, must be followed when progressing through an abuse and neglect case. Where such procedures are not followed, the resulting order is to be vacated, as syllabus point five of Edward B. instructs:

> Where it appears from the record that the process established by the Rules of Procedure for Child Abuse and Neglect Proceedings and related statutes for the disposition of cases involving children adjudicated to be abused or neglected has been substantially disregarded or frustrated, the resulting order of disposition will be vacated and the case remanded for compliance with that process and entry of an appropriate dispositional order.

In this Court's review of the lower court's actions in the present case, we discern specific deficiencies in the lower court's evaluation and resolution which require reversal. The lower court conducted an abbreviated hearing[6] and thereafter dismissed the second petition without additional hearing and denied the Appellant's motion for evaluation of Kimberly and Richard, Jr. It does not appear that a probable cause hearing was necessary in this case since the children had already been removed from the home, had been placed in foster care, and were not in immediate danger. This matter should have proceeded to a full adjudicatory hearing, and the lower court should have provided all parties with an opportunity to be heard. As the guardian ad litem empathizes in her brief, the lower court "ruled and dismissed the matter prior to the completion of the preliminary hearing." A complete evidentiary hearing on the allegations of sexual abuse, as raised in the second petition, was not provided.

[6]In the July 22, 2004, order dismissing the second petition, the lower court characterized the April 12, 2004, hearing as a preliminary hearing and concluded as follows: "The Court, being of the opinion to and having considered the evidence and the testimony taken at the Preliminary Hearing, does hereby find NO PROBABLE CAUSE and ORDERS that this case be DISMISSED and stricken from the docket of this Court."

Indeed, Elizabeth is now eighteen years of age and has apparently chosen not to reoccupy the family home. The two youngest children, however, would be returned to the family home if this Court affirms the lower court action. As the guardian ad litem asserts, the confines of the abbreviated hearing held by the lower court on April 12, 2004, did not provide the Appellant with the opportunity to effectively litigate the matters asserted in the second petition, to obtain an evaluation of the children whom she served, or to fully articulate matters regarding their welfare.

In Christina L., this Court stated that "[e]rror of substantial proportion was committed when the guardian ad litem was not provided the opportunity to orally articulate his client's best interests." 194 W.Va. at 454, 460 S.E.2d at 700. In the present case, the error is compounded by the fact that the lower court denied the guardian ad litem the opportunity to obtain evaluations which would have been essential in determining the appropriate course of action for these children. Kimberly and Richard, Jr., are too young to articulate what had or had not occurred in their home, prior to their initial removal and placement in foster care in December 2002. Their guardian ad litem asserted that they should have been evaluated by a professional, with primary focus placed upon the safety and welfare of those two children. "When, as in the case before us, there is credible evidence of sexual abuse, the risk of harm to the child weighs heavily in this balance, and courts should err on the side of caution if necessary to protect children at risk of possible abuse." Mary Ann P. v. William R.P., Jr., 197 W.Va. 1, 10, 475 S.E.2d 1, 10 (1996) (emphasis supplied).

Thus, whether the April 12, 2004, hearing is characterized as a preliminary hearing or an adjudicatory hearing, we find that it provided an insufficient means of resolving the issues raised in the second abuse and neglect petition and failed to adequately protect the rights of Kimberly and Richard, Jr. The guardian ad litem and DHHR were not given a meaningful opportunity to introduce substantive evidence or obtain additional testing necessary to determine the best interests of the two children whom the guardian ad litem was appointed to serve.[7] As this Court determined in George Glen B.,

> The parties to an abuse and neglect proceeding must be given a meaningful opportunity to introduce substantive evidence in

[7]As recognized by the California court in Blanca P. v. Superior Court, 53 Cal.Rptr.2d 687 (1996):

> The hearing on a contested petition alleging child sexual abuse is thus, to repeat, extraordinarily important. It is not the sort of thing to be rushed, or taken routinely. Allegations of child molestation are serious; they merit more than a rubber stamp. With the exception of death penalty cases, it is hard to imagine an area of the law where there is a greater need for reliable findings by the trier of fact. The consequences of being wrong – on either side – are too great.

53 Cal. Rptr. 2d at 697.

> support of their respective positions, before a circuit court makes its final dispositional decision, and the guiding force behind such decision must be what was in the best interests of the child.

205 W.Va. at 444, 518 S.E.2d at 872. Further, the George Glen B. Court concluded:

> It is clear from the minuscule record in this case that the lower court's consideration of the abuse and neglect proceeding was inadequate. Mandated hearings did not occur, evidence was not taken, yet a determination to dismiss the petition and return custody to the Appellee mother was made. Thus, the lower court's action in this case was not in compliance with pertinent statutes, rules, and case law.

Id., 518 S.E.2d at 872.

We are also compelled to comment upon another aspect of the unusual circumstances presented herein. This case was initiated with the first abuse and neglect petition. The precise events alleged in the second petition, regarding the sexual activity allegedly occurring during a driving lesson, were not included in the first petition. They were arguably alluded to in the first petition by the very existence of the letter referencing oral sex, but they were not alleged with particularity in that first petition.

Consequently, this Court does not believe that Elizabeth's initial failure to testify regarding those driving lesson events, whether characterized as fear or forgetfulness, is fatal to the second petition. Such failure does not render her testimony inherently incredible, and it should not have been the sole basis, as appears from the record, for the lower court's decision to dismiss the second petition. It may have provided the court with a legitimate basis for more rigorous investigation of the allegations, but Elizabeth's credibility, as an alleged child sexual assault victim, should not have been totally devalued by her failure to assert all abusive events during the initial hearing.

IV. Conclusion

The decisive issue in this case is whether the lower court erred by dismissing the abuse and neglect petitions filed against Richard O. The guardian ad litem contends that the dismissals were improper because the lower court failed to provide an adequate hearing. Based upon the foregoing evaluation of this matter, we conclude that the lower court erroneously dismissed the petitions for abuse and neglect. We further conclude that this case should be remanded to the lower court for a complete evidentiary hearing. Upon remand, the lower court should permit the DHHR to promptly file an amended petition, incorporating all allegations from the first and second petitions which are to be addressed.

This matter has lingered in the court system for two and one-half years. While the resolution of this case will no longer impact Elizabeth's residential situation, based upon the fact that she is now eighteen, it is certainly in the best interests of the two younger children to have these allegations properly and thoroughly presented and evaluated by the lower court. Upon remand, the lower court should consider the DHHR's combined petition, as well as all briefs, arguments, and evidence presented by all parties. The court should proceed as expeditiously as possible through all procedures enunciated by the applicable child abuse and neglect statutes, as well as the Rules of Procedure for Abuse and Neglect Cases.

The dismissal orders of the Circuit Court of Roane County of December 3, 2003, and July 22, 2004, are reversed. We direct the lower court to reinstate this abuse and neglect matter for consolidated further proceedings consistent with this opinion.

The Opinion of the Court was delivered PER CURIAM.

SYLLABUS BY THE COURT

1. "Although conclusions of law reached by a circuit court are subject to de novo review, when an action, such as an abuse and neglect case, is tried upon the facts without a jury, the circuit court shall make a determination based upon the evidence and shall make findings of fact and conclusions of law as to whether such child is abused or neglected. These findings shall not be set aside by a reviewing court unless clearly erroneous. A finding is clearly erroneous when, although there is evidence to support the finding, the reviewing court on the entire evidence is left with the definite and firm conviction that a mistake has been committed. However, a reviewing court may not overturn a finding simply because it would have decided the case differently, and it must affirm a finding if the circuit court's account of the evidence is plausible in light of the record viewed in its entirety." Syllabus point 1, In the Interest of Tiffany Marie S., 196 W. Va. 223, 470 S.E.2d 177 (1996).

2. "West Virginia Code § 49-3-1(a)[(3)] provides for grandparent preference in determining adoptive placement for a child where parental rights have been terminated and also incorporates a best interests analysis within that determination by including the requirements that the DHHR find that the grandparents would be suitable adoptive parents prior to granting custody to the grandparents. The statute contemplates that placement with grandparents is presumptively in the best interests of the child, and the preference for grandparent placement may be overcome only where the record reviewed in its entirety establishes that such placement is not in the best interests of the child." 3. "By specifying in West Virginia Code § 49-3-1(a)(3) that the home study must show that the grandparents 'would be suitable adoptive parents,' the Legislature has implicitly included the requirement for an analysis by the Department of Health and Human Resources and circuit courts of the best interests of the child, given all circumstances of the case." 4. "Once a court exercising proper jurisdiction has made a determination upon sufficient proof that a child has been neglected and his natural parents were so derelict in their duties as to be unfit, the welfare of the infant is the polar star by which the discretion of the court is to be guided in making its award of legal custody." child's development, stability and security." Syllabus point 1, in part, In the Interest of Carlita B., 185 W. Va. 613, 408 S.E.2d 365 (1991).

Per Curiam:

The instant proceeding involves the grandparent preference for adoptive placement recognized by the Legislature in W. Va. Code § 49-3-1(a)(3) (2001) (Repl. Vol. 2009)[1] and reiterated by this Court in Syllabus points 4 and 5 of Napoleon S. v. Walker, 217 W. Va. 254, 617 S.E.2d 801 (2005).[2] By order entered October 9, 2009, the Circuit Court of Nicholas County concluded that the grandparent preference mandated that the permanent placement of the four minor children at issue herein be with their maternal grandparents. On appeal to this Court, the guardians ad litem for the children and the West Virginia Department of Health and Human Resources argue that the circuit court's decided placement is not in the children's best interests. Upon a review of the parties' arguments, the record presented for appellate consideration and the supplements thereto,[3] and the pertinent authorities, we reverse the decision of the Nicholas County Circuit Court and remand this case for further proceedings consistent with this opinion.

I.

FACTUAL AND PROCEDURAL HISTORY

Janice and James ("Hollie") B.[4] are the maternal grandparents of the four minor children involved in this case: James M.,[5] Elizabeth F.,[6] Kyia F.,[7] and Jebadiah F.[8] Following the termination of the parental rights of the children's mother, Mary,[9] who is Janice's daughter, and of the children's fathers,[10] Janice and James sought to adopt the children and were granted intervenor status in such proceedings. The West Virginia Department of Health and Human Resources (hereinafter referred to as "the DHHR") thereafter conducted a foster care home study of Janice and James' home, and, by report dated May 6, 2009, determined that their home could be considered "a placement resource" for these grandchildren.

[4]Consistent with our practice in similar cases involving sensitive facts, we will refer to the parties by their last initials rather than by their full names. See, e.g., In re Cesar L., 221 W. Va. 249, 252 n.1, 654 S.E.2d 373, 376 n.1 (2007); In re Randy H., 220 W. Va. 122, 125 n.1, 640 S.E.2d 185, 188 n.1 (2006); In re Clifford K., 217 W. Va. 625, 630 n.1, 619 S.E.2d 138, 143 n.1 (2005).

[5]James was born on April 23, 2003.

[6]Elizabeth's date of birth is October 24, 2005.

[7]Kyia was born on September 1, 2007.

[8]Jebadiah's date of birth is November 2, 2008.

[9]Mary's parental rights to the subject children were terminated following her voluntary relinquishment of her parental rights on February 13, 2009.

[10]The children's fathers' parental rights were terminated following their voluntary relinquishment thereof between April 2009 and July 2009.

The circuit court then considered the children's permanent placement. By order entered October 9, 2009, the circuit court found that the DHHR had determined Janice and James to be an appropriate home with sufficient income; there are no psychological impediments to Janice's ability to "adequately protect the children"; Janice has reported her adult children's drug use to Child Protective Services (hereinafter referred to as "CPS"), which reporting resulted in CPS investigations thereof; and the four adoptive minor children currently in the home[11] are "doing well" and were placed there upon the recommendation of the DHHR that Janice and James' home was a suitable adoptive placement. Based upon these findings, the court concluded that

> In order to rebut the presumption, the State and guardians ad litem must show by clear and convincing evidence that it would be in the best interest of the children to prevent the placement of the children with the grandmother.
>
> The State did show concerns, but there is no clear and convincing evidence to prevent placing the children with the maternal grandmother and step-grandfather Janice and [James] Holly [sic] B[.]
> The Court believes that based upon Napoleon v. Walker, [217 W. Va. 254, 617 S.E.2d 801 (2005),] the Court has no other alternative than to place the children with the maternal grandmother and step-grandfather, Janice and [James] Holly

[11]Apart from the four children at issue in this appeal, Janice and James previously have adopted two of Janice's grandchildren and two additional, unrelated children. All four of these adoptive children currently live with Janice and James.

> [sic] B[.], as their home has been found to be appropriate and there is no clear and convincing evidence to indicate that they will not protect the children. Absent the grandparent preference, the Court doubts that his decision would be the same.
>
> The Court further concludes that the age of the grandparents and the number of children in the home are not an impediment to the placement in this case.
> There will be a requirement in the adoption proceeding that the B[.s] must keep certain individuals away from the children.

(Emphasis added). From these rulings, the Guardian ad Litem for Elizabeth and Kyia appeals to this Court. The Guardian ad Litem for James and Jebadiah and the DHHR join in the request for relief from this Court.

II.

STANDARD OF REVIEW

The sole issue presented by the instant appeal concerns the preference accorded to grandparents to adopt their minor grandchildren after the parental rights of the grandchildren's parents have been terminated through abuse and/or neglect proceedings. We previously have explained the standard of review that governs appeals in abuse and neglect cases as follows:

> Although conclusions of law reached by a circuit court are subject to de novo review, when an action, such as an abuse and neglect case, is tried upon the facts without a jury, the circuit court shall make a determination based upon the evidence and shall make findings of fact and conclusions of > law as to whether such child is abused or neglected. These findings shall not be set aside by a reviewing court unless clearly erroneous. A finding is clearly erroneous when, although there is evidence to support the finding, the reviewing court on the entire evidence is left with the definite and firm conviction that a mistake has been committed. However, a reviewing court may not overturn a finding simply because it would have decided the case differently, and it must affirm a finding if the circuit court's account of the evidence is plausible in light of the record viewed in its entirety.

Syl. pt. 1, In the Interest of Tiffany Marie S., 196 W. Va. 223, 470 S.E.2d 177 (1996). In accordance with these guidelines, we proceed to consider the errors assigned by the parties.

III.

DISCUSSION

On appeal to this Court, the two Guardians ad Litem and the DHHR contend that the circuit court erred by placing the four children at issue herein with Janice and James in accordance with the statutory grandparent preference for adoptive placements despite the fact that such placement does not serve the children's best interests. In support of their objections to the circuit court's ruling, the Guardians and the DHHR state that the circuit court should not have preferred the grandparents as an adoptive placement in this case because such placement does not promote the children's best interests and that, despite the stated preference, such placement also must be in the subject children's best interests.

The Guardians and the DHHR claim, before this Court, that the home of Janice and James is not a suitable placement for the children because these grandparents cannot adequately protect the children from the negative influences and criminal tendencies of Janice's adult children. In this regard, they represent that Janice has continued to permit her adult children to be around her adoptive minor children, including allowing the children's mother, Mary, to live in her home while she was using and abusing drugs. Additionally, they contend that Janice allowed her adult son and his wife to live in the trailer behind her house, and requested them to move only after the DHHR indicated that she would not be approved as a foster home while they continued to live there due to her son's numerous CPS referrals. Moreover, the Guardians and the DHHR submit that Janice has not seemed willing to curtail the influence of her adult children on her adoptive minor children until the circuit court cautioned her to cease such interaction during the proceedings underlying this appeal, but even then she has since hosted a family dinner for both her adult and adoptive minor children. Furthermore, since the circuit court's hearing in this matter indicating its concern over such interactions, they represent that Janice has posted bond for her adult son, who has used Janice's address as his own address in the paperwork related to his felony delivery of a controlled substance (methamphetamine) charge.

By contrast, the intervenor grandparents, Janice and James B., argue that the circuit court correctly preferred them as the children's adoptive placement as required by W. Va. Code § 49-3-1(a)(3). In support of their argument, the grandparents assert that the DHHR approved their home as an appropriate placement for the children on May 6, 2009, and that, during the circuit court's hearing, evidence was presented demonstrating their financial ability to care for four additional children and the suitability of their home to accommodate such children. The expert witnesses further indicated that they believed that Janice and James would be capable of caring for and adequately protecting the subject children. Thus, the grandparents argue that the concerns expressed by the Guardians and the DHHR are unfounded and that the circuit court correctly preferred them as an adoptive placement, consistent with the statutory mandate to do so.

During its consideration of the record evidence below, the circuit court ultimately determined that the four subject children should be placed with Janice and James. However, in reaching this decision, the circuit court opined, "[a]bsent the grandparent preference, the Court doubts that his decision would be the same." In light of this commentary, we feel compelled to revisit the grandparent preference to explain the parameters for its application to the facts of a particular case.

The Legislature adopted the so-called "grandparent preference" to govern the adoption of children whose parents' parental rights have been terminated through abuse and neglect proceedings. Pursuant to W. Va. Code § 49-3-1(a)(3) (2001) (Repl. Vol. 2009), > [f]or purposes of any placement of a child for adoption by the department, the department shall first consider the suitability and willingness of any known grandparent or grandparents to adopt the child. Once any such grandparents who are interested in adopting the child have been identified, the department shall conduct a home study evaluation, including home visits and individual interviews by a licensed social worker. If the department determines, based on the home study evaluation, that the grandparents would be suitable adoptive parents, it shall assure that the grandparents are offered the placement of the child prior to the consideration of any other prospective adoptive parents.

Following the promulgation of this statute, this Court reiterated the preference accorded to grandparents in the adoption of their grandchildren and explained its application in Syllabus points 4 and 5 of Napoleon S. v. Walker, 217 W. Va. 254, 617 S.E.2d 801 (2005):

> West Virginia Code § 49-3-1(a)[(3)] provides for grandparent preference in determining adoptive placement for a child where parental rights have been terminated and also incorporates a best interests analysis within that determination by including the requirements that the DHHR find that the grandparents would be suitable adoptive parents prior to granting custody to the grandparents. The statute contemplates that placement with grandparents is presumptively in the best interests of the child, and the preference for grandparent placement may be overcome only where the record reviewed in its entirety establishes that such placement is not in the best interests of the child.
> By specifying in West Virginia Code § 49-3-1(a)(3) that the home study must show that the grandparents "would be > suitable adoptive parents," the Legislature has implicitly included the requirement for an analysis by the Department of Health and Human Resources and circuit courts of the best interests of the child, given all circumstances of the case.

(Emphasis added). Our prior holdings in Napoleon are critically important insofar as we explicitly recognized that a crucial component of the grandparent preference is that the adoptive placement of the subject child with his/her grandparents must serve the child's best interests. Absent such a finding, adoptive placement with the child's grandparents is not proper.

In the case sub judice, the circuit court, while preferring the grandparents, Janice and James, as the children's permanent adoptive placement, expressed concern by commenting that, "[a]bsent the grandparent preference, the Court doubts that his decision would be the same." From this musing, this Court can surmise only that the circuit court believed the grandparent preference to be an absolute directive to place children with their grandparents in all circumstances. Such is not the case, however, as an integral part of the implementation of the grandparent preference, as with all decisions concerning minor children, is the best interests of the child.

> Once a court exercising proper jurisdiction has made a determination upon sufficient proof that a child has been neglected and his natural parents were so derelict in their duties as to be unfit, the welfare of the infant is the polar star by which the discretion of the court is to be guided in making its award of legal custody.

Syl. pt. 8, in part, In re Willis, 157 W. Va. 225, 207 S.E.2d 129 (1973). Accord Syl. pt. 3, in part, In re Katie S., 198 W. Va. 79, 479 S.E.2d 589 (1996) ("[T]he primary goal in cases involving abuse and neglect . . . must be the health and welfare of the children."); Syl. pt. 5, in part, Carter v. Carter, 196 W. Va. 239, 470 S.E.2d 193 (1996) ("In . . . custody matters, we have traditionally held paramount the best interests of the child."). Thus, adoption by a child's grandparents is permitted only if such adoptive placement serves the child's best interests. If, upon a thorough review of the entire record, the circuit court believes that a grandparental adoption is not in the subject child's best interests, it is not obligated to prefer the grandparents over another, alternative placement that does serve the child's best interests. See Syl. pts. 4 & 5, Napoleon S. v. Walker, 217 W. Va. 254, 617 S.E.2d 801. Because the circuit court accorded the grandparents an absolute preference in this case despite its expressed concerns about the propriety of such a placement, we reverse the circuit court's decision.

Furthermore, we find it necessary to remand this case for the circuit court to reconsider the record evidence, as supplemented, in determining whether adoptive placement of the subject children with their maternal grandparents, Janice and James, serves their best interests. Based upon our review of the record in this case, we share the circuit court's concerns as to whether permitting Janice and James to adopt their grandchildren serves the children's best interests. However, in addition to the record initially presented for this Court's review, upon which the circuit court based its decision, the Guardian ad Litem for Elizabeth and Kyia twice moved to supplement the record during the pendency of the case before this Court. The first motion to supplement presented evidence of numerous warrants for James' arrest resulting from worthless check charges in several different counties. We granted this motion to supplement the record and find this information to be instructive as to the grandparents' financial ability to care and provide for eight minor children, i.e., the four adoptive children who currently reside with them and the four grandchildren they seek to adopt in the case sub judice. To the extent that the DHHR's May 6, 2009, home study of Janice and James considered their "financial stability," the various worthless check charges should be evaluated to determine the extent to which, if any, such charges impact the grandparents' current financial status. Therefore, we remand this case to the circuit court so that it may consider this supplemental evidence.

The second motion to supplement the record filed by Elizabeth and Kyia's Guardian ad Litem indicates that the DHHR has revoked its prior approval of Janice and James' home as a "Relative Foster/Adoptive home." We also granted this motion. In support of her motion, the Guardian proffered a March 28, 2010, letter from the DHHR informing the grandparents of its decision. Although the letter conveying this information does not explain in great detail the exact reasons relied upon by the DHHR in reaching this decision, it does reference James' "criminal charges" and indicates that "[t]hese charges appear to reflect your financial instability." Insofar as the Legislature has identified a favorable home study of the prospective adoptive grandparents as an indicator of their suitability as an adoptive placement for their grandchildren, see W. Va. Code § 49-3-1(a)(3); Syl. pt. 5, Napoleon S. v. Walker, 217 W. Va. 254, 617 S.E.2d 801, a change of circumstances that results in an unfavorable recommendation by the DHHR suggests an even more pressing need to consider not only the grandparent preference but also whether adoption by the children's grandparents would serve the children's best interests. To the extent that the March 28, 2010, letter alters the home study upon which the circuit court relied in finding the grandparents to be a suitable adoptive placement for the subject children, it is imperative that the circuit court reconsider its decision in light of this new evidence. Accordingly, we remand this case to the circuit court to permit it to additionally consider the supplemental evidence presented by the Guardian's second motion.

As a final matter, this Court is gravely concerned about the length of time that the four young children at issue in this case, namely, James, Elizabeth, Kyia, and Jebadiah, have been permitted to languish in foster care without a permanent placement. We previously have counseled that "[c]hild abuse and neglect cases must be recognized as being among the highest priority for the courts' attention. Unjustified procedural delays wreak havoc on a child's development, stability and security." Syl. pt. 1, in part, In the Interest of Carlita B., 185 W. Va. 613, 408 S.E.2d 365 (1991). Accord Syl. pt. 5, In the Interest of Carlita B., 185 W. Va. 613, 408 S.E.2d 365 ("The clear import of the statute [West Virginia Code § 49-6-2(d)] is that matters involving the abuse and neglect of children shall take precedence over almost every other matter with which a court deals on a daily basis, and it clearly reflects the goal that such proceedings must be resolved as expeditiously as possible."). In this vein, we urge the circuit court, as well as all of the parties to the instant proceeding, to conclude the children's permanency planning and ultimate placement as quickly and expeditiously as possible. To facilitate the commencement and conclusion of the remand proceedings, we issue the mandate of the Court contemporaneously with the issuance of this opinion.

IV.

CONCLUSION

For the foregoing reasons, the October 9, 2009, order of the Circuit Court of Nicholas County is hereby reversed, and this case is remanded for further proceedings consistent with this opinion. The mandate of the Court shall issue forthwith.

Per Curiam:
The West Virginia Department of Health and Human Resources (Department), the petitioner below and appellant, appeals a final order entered August 2, 1993, by the Circuit Court of Wood County. The circuit court dismissed the Department's petition which alleged that Elizabeth Jo "Beth," Debra Kay "Debbie," and Robert Lee "Robbie" H. See footnote 1 were neglected and/or abused children. The Department asserts on appeal that the circuit court erred because the evidence established that the children were emotionally and physically abused by their parents and neglected by their parents' failure to provide them with necessary shelter and supervision.

In June of 1993, Joan George, a Child Protective Services worker with the Department, filed a petition pursuant to W. Va. Code, 49-6-1 (1992), See footnote 2 alleging that nine-year-old Elizabeth, eight-year-old Debra, and six-year-old Robert were neglected and/or abused children according to W. Va. Code, 49-1-3 (1992). See footnote 3 More specifically, the petition alleged that their parents, Benita K.H. and Robert L.H., did not adequately supervise the children and abused the children emotionally and physically. Furthermore, it was alleged that their living conditions were unfit.

After receipt of the petition, the circuit court determined that the children were in imminent danger and ordered that the children be placed with their maternal grandmother. See footnote 4

At the adjudicatory hearing See footnote 5 held on July 30, 1993, the Department called the following persons to testify: two counselors employed by the Western District Guidance Center, a counselor from Action Youth Care, Elizabeth's teacher, and Joan George. The parents did not testify nor did they call witnesses on their behalf. The uncontroverted evidence showed that this family had been long-time recipients of social services and outside intervention, in part, to help them deal with Elizabeth's medical problems. See footnote 6 The parents sporadically complied with the instructions from the various services, and the condition of the home and their attitude and approach to parenting did not improve.

Elizabeth would frequently run away from home and wander around Parkersburg. On several occasions, the police returned her to the home. Likewise, Robert ran away from home and was returned by the police. When Debra ran away from home, her parents did not know of her whereabouts for an entire weekend. The record reflects that the mother suspected that Debra was sexually abused during that weekend.

The Department also established that the lack of supervision had resulted in injury to the children. Debra was burned by the stove when she was cooking dinner while her mother was sleeping. When Robert climbed into the family's truck and knocked it out of gear, the truck rolled over Elizabeth, causing a head injury which required stitches. Elizabeth and Robert had been known to consume beer while being unsupervised for several hours. Elizabeth told a counselor, in explicit detail, that she had had sexual relations with a boy.

The Department described the family home as "deplorable." The family had several cats and dogs, and feces were found throughout the house. The children slept on urine-stained mattresses. Elizabeth reported that a rat was found in her bed. All three children bathed in the same water. Generally, the house was unkept and had a foul odor.

There was some evidence that Elizabeth had been physically abused. She went to school on one occasion with a bloody nose and claimed that her father hit her. There was also some evidence of sexual abuse. During a family counseling session, Elizabeth kissed her father with an open mouth. At another session, she rubbed the upper part of his thigh in an inappropriate manner. On at least one occasion, Elizabeth washed her father's back while he was in the bathtub.

After hearing the foregoing evidence, the circuit court found that the Department failed to meet its burden of proof and dismissed the case. Furthermore, the Department's motion for a stay of the proceeding pending appeal was denied. However, this Court granted a stay of the proceedings. Therefore, the children remain in the custody of their grandmother.

The issue on appeal concerns the circuit court's dismissal of this action in light of the foregoing evidence. In Syllabus Point 1 of West Virginia Department of Human Services v. Peggy F., 184 W. Va. 60, 399 S.E.2d 460 (1990), we set forth the Department's burden of proof in these matters:

> "'W. Va. Code, 49- 6-2(c) [1980], requires the State D epartment of Welfare [now t he Department of Human Services], in a child abuse or neglect case, to prove "conditions existing at the time of the filing of the peti tion . . . by clear a nd convi ncing proof." Syllabus Poi nt 1, In Interest of S.C. , 168 W. Va. 366, 284 S.E.2d 867 (1981)."

Consistent with our cases in other areas, we give appropriate deference to findings of the circuit court. In this regard, the circuit court has a superior sense of what actually transpired during an incident, by virtue of its ability to see and hear the witnesses who have firsthand knowledge of the events. Appellate oversight is therefore deferential, and we should review the circuit court's findings of fact following an evidentiary hearing under the clearly erroneous standard. If the circuit court makes no findings or applies the wrong legal standard, however, no deference attaches to such an application. Of course, if the circuit court's findings of fact are not clearly erroneous and the correct legal standard is applied, the circuit court's ultimate ruling will be affirmed as a matter of law.

In this case, the circuit court entered a fairly cursory order, concluding as a matter of law that the State failed to sustain its burden of proof. A review of the circuit court's remarks at the time it made its ruling indicates that it found the petition "frivolous" and found there to be no evidence of abuse or neglect. After reviewing the record, we find that the Department presented sufficient evidence to prove, by clear and convincing evidence, that Elizabeth, Debra, and Robert H. are neglected children as defined by W. Va. Code, 49-1-3(g)(1).

The unsanitary condition of the home, as described by the Department's witnesses, was similar to the conditions described in State v. Carl B., 171 W. Va. 774, 301 S.E.2d 864 (1983). In Carl B., the house was very filthy with dirty dishes, roaches, no sheets or blankets on the beds, and dog feces on the floor. We found the evidence sufficient to establish by clear and convincing evidence that Carl B. was neglected. Similarly, the Department in this case attempted to work with Benita K.H. and Robert L.H., but the condition of the home did not consistently improve. In Carl B., the additional factor of a lack of food at the end of the month existed, which was not in the record in the case at bar. However, in this case the additional factor of the lack of supervision of the children exists.

Far more significant than the filth, however, is the fact that at least one of these children is deeply emotionally disturbed and in desperate need of consistent, caring parenting.

All the children have run away from home for significant periods of time while being unsupervised. Obviously, the parents failed to provide the necessary supervision to keep these children safely at home and off the streets of Parkersburg. We understand that Elizabeth's emotional problems may have contributed to her habit of running away. However, the lack of any meaningful supervision would have to be considered as a causative, as well as aggravating, factor with regard to emotional problems so severe that a young child would attempt suicide.

We, therefore, reverse the decision of the circuit court and remand this case for further proceedings. We specifically direct the circuit court to allow the parents the opportunity to move for an improvement period pursuant to W. Va. Code, 49-6-2(b) (1992). Syllabus Points 3 and 4 of In the Interest of Carlita B., 185 W. Va. 613, 408 S.E.2d 365 (1991), state:

> "3. 'Under W. Va. Code, 49-6-2(b) (1984), when an improvement period is authorized, then the court by order shall require the Department of Human Services to prepare a family case plan pursuant to W. Va. Code, 49-6D-3 (1984).' Syl. Pt. 3, State ex rel. West Virginia Dept. of Human Serv. v. Cheryl M., 177 W. Va. 688, 356 S.E.2d 181 (1987).
> "4. In formulating the improvement period and family case plans, courts and social service workers should cooperate to provide a workable approach for the resolution of family problems which have prevented the child or children from receiving appropriate care from their parents. The formulation of the improvement period and family case plans should therefore be a consolidated, multi-disciplinary effort among the court system, the parents, attorneys, social service agencies, and any other helping personnel involved in assisting the family."

For the foregoing reasons, the order of the Circuit Court of Wood County dismissing the petition is reversed and this case is remanded for further proceedings consistent with this opinion.

Reversed and remanded.

Footnote: 2 W. Va. Code, 49-6-1(a), states, in part:
"If the state department or a reputable person believes that a child is neglected or abused, the department or the person may present a petition setting forth the facts to the circuit court in the county in which the child resides, or to the judge of such court in vacation. The petition shall be verified by the oath of some credible person having knowledge of the facts. The petition shall allege specific conduct including time and place, how such conduct comes within the statutory definition of neglect or abuse with references thereto, any supportive services provided by the state department to remedy the alleged circumstances and the relief sought. Upon filing of the petition, the court shall set a time and place for a hearing and shall appoint counsel for the child."

Footnote: 3 W.Va. Code, 49-1-3(a), defines an "abused child":
"(a) 'Abused child' means a child whose health or welfare is harmed or threatened by:
"(1) A parent, guardian or custodian who knowingly or intentionally inflicts, attempts to inflict, or knowingly allows another person to inflict, physical injury, or mental or emotional injury, upon the child or another child in the home; or
"(2) Sexual abuse or sexual exploitation; or
"(3) The sale or attempted sale of a child by a parent, guardian, or custodian[.]"
W.Va. Code, 49-1-3(g)(1), defines a "neglected child":
"(g)(1) 'Neglected child' means a child:
"(A) Whose physical or mental health is harmed or threatened by a present refusal, failure or inability of the child's parent, guardian or custodian to supply the child with necessary food, clothing, shelter, supervision, medical care or education, when such refusal, failure or inability is not due primarily to a lack of financial means on the part of the parent, guardian or custodian; or
"(B) Who is presently without necessary food, clothing, shelter, medical care, education or supervision because of the disappearance or absence of the child's parent or custodian[.]"
The statute was amended in 1994. The minor changes do not affect our determination of this case.

Footnote: 4 See W. Va. Code, 49-6-3 (1992), which states, in part:
"(a) Upon the filing of a petition, the court may order that the child alleged to be an abused or neglected child be delivered for not more than ten days into the custody of the state department or a responsible relative, which may include any parent, guardian or other custodian pending a preliminary hearing, if it finds that: (1) There exists imminent danger to the physical well-being of the child, and (2) there are no reasonably available alternatives to removal of the child[.]"

Footnote: 5 The parents waived the preliminary hearing.

Footnote: 6 Elizabeth has been diagnosed as suffering from enuresis (bedwetting), attention deficit hyperactivity disorder, oppositional defiant disorder, parent child problems, a seizure disorder, and organic mental disturbance. It is undisputed that due to her health problems, she is a difficult child to deal with and requires special attention. In May of 1993, Elizabeth attempted suicide.

Workman, Justice, concurring:
I concur with the majority in order to expand upon their enunciation of the lower court's duty to fashion an improvement period, and to emphasize how vital it is not to permit this case and these children (and future cases involving other children) to get lost in some procedural shuffle.

First, the procedural shuffle: In 1991, we pointed out that West Virginia Code § 49-6-2(d) "clearly reflects the goal that such [abuse and neglect] proceedings must be resolved as expeditiously as possible. Syl. Pt. 5, in part, In re Carlita B., 185 W. Va. 613, 408 S.E.2d 365 (1991). After setting forth the long and tattered procedural history of Carlita B., and directing that child abuse and neglect cases be recognized as among the highest priority, we pointed out:

> protracted procedural histories are far too common a phenomenon in child abuse and neglect cases, as well as other child custody matters. Several cases with which we have dealt have involved similar extended periods of time without any real resolution for the child.
> Certainly many delays are occasioned by the fact that troubled human relationships and aggravated parenting problems are not remedied over night. The law properly recognizes that rights of natural parents enjoy a great deal of protection and that one of the primary goals of the social services network and the courts is to give aid to parents and children in an effort to reunite them.
> The bulk of the most aggravated procedural delays, however, are occasioned less by the complexities of mending broken people and relationships than by the tendency of these types of cases to fall through the cracks in the system. The long procedural delays in this and most other abuse and neglect cases considered by this Court in the last decade indicate that neither the lawyers nor the courts are doing an adequate job of assuring that children--the most voiceless segment of our society--aren't left to languish in a limbo-like state during a time most crucial to their human development.

Id. at 622-23, 408 S.E.2d at 374-75.

The dissent is misguided in advocating remand for the preparation of an order more fully justifying its decision. The court below made it perfectly clear that it did not find the circumstances that these children were living in, as set forth by the unrefuted evidence, to constitute abuse or neglect. See footnote 1 There were no credibility issues. The judge basically classified as de minimus See footnote 2evidence of very small children constantly running away from home, living amongst animal feces, being subject to a level of neglect so aggravated that the parents sometimes didn't even notify authorities when they disappeared for lengthy periods of time (in one case, an entire weekend), and having emotional problems so aggravated that an eight-year-old attempted suicide. Instead of making further inquiry into why these children are experiencing such problems, the court castigated the nine-year-old for all her problematic behaviors. See footnote 3

The practical effect of a remand for the development of a more extensive order would be (1) to delay for probably a year what this family desperately needs now: a meaningful improvement period, including interventive services for the whole family; and (2) to add further delay to any real resolution of a case that will probably take a long time to resolve in any permanent manner anyway. The last thing we need is another hoop to jump through before these children get the kind of focused attention owed to them by the legal and child protective services.

Beth, Debbie and Robbie have waited long enough for help from a child protective services system that had already done too little for too long. According to the record, this family has been involved in the system since 1988, when the children were four, three, and one. We, as a system, have let their most crucial formative years go by without ever really addressing their problems.

The circuit court was absolutely correct that adult individuals may live amongst animal feces, emotional chaos, and total non-structure. That is their choice. But the court was clearly wrong as a matter of law in suggesting that evidence of children living in this fashion is insufficient to constitute abuse and neglect, once such conditions are brought to the attention of the system whose mission it is to protect them.

Upon remand, the circuit court should review carefully the case of In re Carlita B. in the event the parents move for an improvement period. See 185 W. Va. 613, 408 S.E.2d 365. As we directed in Carlita B.,

> In formulating the improvement period and family case plans, courts and social service workers should cooperate to provide a workable approach for the resolution of family problems which have prevented the child or children from receiving appropriate care from their parents. The formulation of the improvement period and family case plans should therefore be a consolidated, multidisciplinary effort among the court system, the parents, attorneys, social service agencies, and any other helping personnel involved in assisting the family. The goal should be the development of a program designed to assist the parent(s) in dealing with any problems which interfere with his ability to be an effective parent and to foster an improved relationship between parent and > child with an event ual restoration of full parental rights a hope d-for result. The im provement period a nd fa mily case plans m ust establish specific measures for the achievement of these goals, as an improvement period must be more than a mere passage of time. It is a period in which the D.H.S. and the court should attempt to facilitate the parent's success, but wherein the parent must understand that he bears a respon sibility to demonstrate sufficient progress and improvement to justify return to him of the child.

Id. at 625, 408 S.E.2d at 377.

Following the form ulation of any im provement plan, "it is imperative that the progress of the parent(s) toward the achievement of e numerated goals be monitored closely." Id. As we emphasized in Carlita B.,

> The clear im port of t he statute is that m atters invol ving t he abuse and neglec t of childr en shall take precede nce over a lmost every other matter with w hich a court deals on a daily basis, and it clearly reflects the goal that such proc eedings m ust be resolved as expeditiously as possible.

Id.

The improvement period should be carefully crafted and closely monitored on at least a monthly basis. This circuit judge must recognize that these children are not throwaway human beings; and further, that the way this case is handled may be the last best chance for effective intervention in their lives.

Footnote: 1 The court's order stated only that, "Based upon the evidence before the Court, the Court FINDS that the Petitioner has failed to sustain its burden of proof, and accordingly ORDERS that this matter be dismissed and stricken from the docket of this Court." The dissent is correct in that this essentially one-sentence order indicates that the court below, as appears to be the case with many other circuit courts, gave only cursory attention to the formulation of an order in this matter. This clearly flies in the face of this Court's admonitions in Carlita B. that these cases are both high priority and deserving of immediate and careful attention. See 185 W. Va. 613, 408 S.E.2d 365.

Footnote: 2 The record reflects that the judge, upon hearing the evidence regarding the petition, stated, "This is just diminimus [sic] stuff, all of it."

Footnote: 3 When evidence is presented which identifies developmental and emotional problems to the extent experienced by the children in this case, it should be a signal to the court that immediate attention is necessary, both from the standpoint of ascertaining underlying problems in the home and implementing interventive services to the children and their family.

Cleckley, Justice, dissenting:

I must dissent from the majority because their decision is contrary to the explicit legislative directives. Because of the vital importance of children's welfare in West Virginia, see In Interest of Carlita B., 185 W. Va. 613, 408 S.E.2d 365 (1991) (child abuse cases must be recognized as being among the highest priority for the court's attention), the legislature has made some procedural requirements mandatory. One such mandatory procedure is the requirement that the circuit court make specific findings of fact and conclusions of law to support its decision. Specifically, at the close of the adjudicatory hearing in an abuse and neglect case, the circuit court is required under W. Va. Code, 49-6-2(c) (1992), to "make findings of fact and conclusions of law as to whether such child is abused or neglected." See footnote 1 See State v. T.C., 172 W. Va. 47, 303 S.E.2d 685 (1983). The circuit court failed to do so in this case. The order merely states that "the Petitioner has failed to sustain its burden of proof, and accordingly . . . this matter [is] dismissed and stricken from the docket[.]" In Syllabus Point 1 of State v. T.C., supra, we state:

> "In a child abuse and neglect hearing, before a court can begin to make any of the dispositional alternatives under W. Va. Code, 49-6-5, it must hold a hearing under W. Va. Code, 49-6-2, and determine 'whether such child is abused or neglected.' Such a finding is a prerequisite to further continuation of the case."

At this juncture, the only error committed by the circuit court was dismissing this case without making a proper determination of the evidence of abuse and neglect.

In our earlier case of State v. Clark, 171 W. Va. 74, 79, 297 S.E.2d 849, 854 (1982), we offered the following explanation as to why compliance with a similar procedure was important:

> "Basing its decision on the preponderance standard, the trial court must make findings of fact and conclusions of law regarding the admissibility of the evidence. When credibility of the witnesses is determinative on the issue of whether to admit or exclude evidence, the trial court must clearly indicate why it chose to believe one witness more than another. Such findings and conclusions are necessary so that this Court may properly fulfill its appellate review obligations by ensuring that the state did or did not meet its burden of proof."

In the case at bar, it is virtually impossible to review the conclusion made below without the assistance of the circuit court's specific findings and some evaluation as to how the evidence of the State was deficient. The sincerity and credibility of the State's witnesses is impossible to gather from the record before us. We need to know why the circuit court dismissed this case. The credibility of the witnesses and the weight accorded their testimony are matters solely within the discretion of the circuit court. Accordingly, I would remand this case with directions to comply with W. Va. Code, 49-6-2(c), giving the circuit court a reasonable chance to justify its decision.

Footnote: 1 W.Va. Code, 49-6-2(c), states, in pertinent part:

"At the conclusion of the hearing the court shall make a determination based upon the evidence and shall make findings of fact and conclusions of law as to whether such child is abused or neglected, which shall be incorporated into the order of the court. The findings must be based upon conditions existing at the time of the filing of the petition and proven by clear and convincing proof."

IN THE SUPREME COURT OF APPEALS OF WEST VIRGINIA

ELMER JIMMY S. AND WILMA JEAN S., Plaintiffs Below, Appellants

v.

KENNETH B. AND PHYLLIS B., Defendants Below, Appellees

No. 23786
Submitted: January 28, 1997
Filed: February 28, 1997

SYLLABUS BY THE COURT

1. "Where the issue on an appeal from the circuit court is clearly a question of law or involving an interpretation of a statute, we apply a de novo standard of review." Syllabus point 1, Chrystal R.M. v. Charlie A.L., 194 W. Va. 138, 459 S.E.2d 415 (1995).

2. W. Va. Code 48-2B-1 et seq. affords circuit courts jurisdiction to consider grandparent visitation under the limited circumstances provided therein, even though the parental rights of the parent through whom the grandparent is related to the grandchild or grandchildren have been terminated. Generally, those circumstances are: (1) where divorce or separate maintenance is ordered and the parent has not appeared, etc.; (2) upon abandonment or abrogation of visitation rights by the grandchild's parent or judicial preclusion of such visitation; (3) when the parent through whom the grandparent is related is deceased; (4) when the minor child has resided with the grandparent for six consecutive months or more within the past two years; and (5) under certain circumstances when the parents of the child are unwed, as contemplated by W. Va. Code 48-2B-2 to -6 (1992) (Repl. Vol. 1996).

JUSTICE DAVIS delivered the Opinion of the Court.

JUSTICE MAYNARD, deeming himself disqualified, did not participate in the decision of this case.

Davis, Justice:

The appellants, Elmer and Wilma S., See footnote 1 plaintiffs below, appeal from an order of the Circuit Court of Mingo County denying their petition for visitation with their natural grandson. The circuit court found that Elmer and Wilma did not have standing to petition the court for visitation due to the previous termination of the parental rights of their son, the child's father. The appellants argue that they are entitled to visitation under the provisions of W. Va. Code 48-2B-1 et seq. We disagree. We hold that W. Va. Code 48-2B-1 et seq. affords circuit courts jurisdiction to consider grandparent visitation under the limited circumstances provided therein, even though the parental rights of the parent through whom the grandparent is related to the grandchild or grandchildren have been terminated. We conclude that, under the particular circumstances of this case, the circuit court was without jurisdiction under W. Va. Code 48-2B-1 et seq. to consider the appellants' request for visitation.

I. FACTS

The child with whom visitation is sought was born on March 12, 1986. On March 16, 1988, the child's father was convicted of murder, in the second degree, of the child's mother. The murder apparently occurred in February of 1987. Thereafter, the child resided with the appellants, his paternal grandparents, from February, 1987, until October, 1988, during which time Wilma S. became his primary caretaker. The child's father also lived in the appellants' household prior to his incarceration and conviction.

Despite the fact that the appellees, the child's maternal grandparents Kenneth and Phyllis B., were awarded visitation with the child in January, 1988, no visitation occurred until they brought contempt proceedings. Thereafter, Kenneth and Phyllis B. petitioned the circuit court for custody of the child and for termination of the father's parental rights. By order entered November 3, 1988, the circuit court awarded custody of the child to the maternal grandparents and terminated the father's parental rights. In addition, the court granted visitation rights to the appellants, the child's paternal grandparents.

Subsequently, the circuit court sua sponte directed the parties to work out a joint custody arrangement. Joint custody was awarded by order entered June 16, 1989. The maternal grandparents appealed the order to this Court, where we reversed and remanded the case for a determination of proper custody considering the best interests of the child. See footnote 2 Thereafter, by order entered March 21, 1991, the circuit court granted sole custody of the child to the appellees, the maternal grandparents, and granted visitation to the paternal grandparents.

Although the record is somewhat unclear, it appears that sometime after the March 21, 1991, order a dispute arose between the parties regarding visitation. On October 10, 1993, the paternal grandparents filed a complaint in the Circuit Court of Mingo County seeking visitation with their grandson. The case was referred to a Family Law Master who, after conducting a hearing, recommended that the paternal grandparents' request for visitation be denied. The Family Law Master suggested that the paternal grandparents lacked standing to assert visitation rights due to the termination of the parental rights of their son, the child's natural father. Thereafter, by order entered November 7, 1995, the Circuit Court of Mingo County denied the paternal grandparents' request for visitation. It is from this order that the appellants now appeal.

II. STANDARD OF REVIEW

We are asked to determine whether grandparents may assert the right to visitation with their grandchild when the parental rights of the grandparent's child, with regard to such grandchild, have been terminated. Our review of this legal question is de novo. "Where the issue on an appeal from the circuit court is clearly a question of law or involving an interpretation of a statute, we apply a de novo standard of review." Syl. pt. 1, Chrystal R.M. v. Charlie A.L., 194 W. Va. 138, 459 S.E.2d 415 (1995).

III. DISCUSSION

The appellants, the paternal grandparents of the child with whom visitation is sought, argue that they are entitled to visitation with their grandson under W. Va. Code 48-2B-1 et seq, which provides for grandparent visitation. The appellants further contend that the child's best interests were not considered when the court denied their request for visitation. See footnote 3

At common law, "grandparents possessed no legal right to custody or visitation of a grandchild over the parent's objection. Syl. pt. 1, Brotherton v. Boothe, 161 W. Va. 691, 250 S.E.2d 36 (1978); Jeffries v. Jeffries, 162 W. Va. 905, 907, 253 S.E.2d 689, 691 (1979)." Petition of Nearhoof, 178 W. Va. 359, 361-62, 359 S.E.2d 587, 589-90 (1987) (footnote omitted). However, the enactment of W. Va. Code 48-2B-1 in 1980, which provided for grandparent visitation with the child of a deceased child of such grandparent, "change[d] the common law rule in West Virginia as to the right of grandparents' visitation." Id. at 362, 359 S.E.2d 590.

In Nearhoof, the only case interpreting the 1980 version of W. Va. Code 48-2B-1 (1980) (1986 Repl. Vol.), grandparents sought a declaration that the adoption of their deceased daughter's child by the spouse of their daughter's former husband would not terminate their visitation rights. At the time Nearhoof was decided, W. Va. Code 48-2B-1 provided for grandparent visitation only when the grandparent's child (a parent of the grandchild) was deceased. Because the statute was silent as to the effect of an adoption upon such visitation, the Court addressed what appeared to be conflicting visitation policies embodied in the statutes pertaining to adoption See footnote 4 and grandparent visitation. See footnote 5 The Court concluded that the policies embodied in these statutes were not conflicting and held that the grandparents had a right to visitation as provided for in W. Va. Code 48-2B-1. In concluding that the statutes were not conflicting, the Court commented that "had the legislature intended the adoption statute to limit the statute providing for grandparents' visitation, the statutes could have reflected that intention." Nearhoof, 178 W. Va. at 364, 359 S.E.2d at 592 (citation omitted). See footnote 6

In 1992, West Virginia Code 48-2B-1 et seq., was substantially amended and reinacted. The new Article 2B begins by stating:

> (a) The Legislature finds that circumstances may arise where it is appropriate for circuit courts of this state to have jurisdiction to grant to the grandparents of minor children a right of visitation to enhance the best interests of the minor child or children as well as the grandparent. The Legislature further finds that in such situations, as in all situations involving children, the best interests of children must be the paramount consideration. It is the express intent of the Legislature that the provisions for grandparent visitation set forth in this article shall be exclusive and under all circumstances the interests of the child or children involved shall be the court's first and paramount consideration.

W. Va. Code 48-2B-1(a) (1994) (Repl. Vol. 1996) (emphasis added). See footnote 7 The next five sections of the statute enumerate five circumstances in which the Legislature has deemed it appropriate for circuit courts to have jurisdiction to consider grandparent visitation, when it is also in the best interest of the child. See footnote 8

While W. Va. Code 48-2B-1 et seq. is designated as the exclusive provision for grandparent visitation, it is silent with regard to grandparent visitation when the parental rights of the grandparent's child (the parent of the grandchild) have been terminated. In addition, we are not aware of any statute expressly prohibiting grandparent visitation under such circumstances. Thus, following the Court's reasoning in Nearhoof, we believe that had the legislature intended the termination of parental rights to affect the visitation rights of the corresponding grandparent, the statute could have reflected that intention. Cf. Nearhoof, 178 W. Va. at 364, 359 S.E.2d at 587. Consequently, we hold that W. Va. Code 48-2B-1 et seq. affords circuit courts jurisdiction to consider grandparent visitation under the limited circumstances provided therein, even though the parental rights of the parent through whom the grandparent is related to the grandchild or grandchildren have been terminated. See footnote 9 Generally, those circumstances are: (1) where divorce or separate maintenance is ordered and the parent has not appeared, etc.; (2) upon abandonment or abrogation of visitation rights by the grandchild's parent or judicial preclusion of such visitation; (3) when the parent through whom the grandparent is related is deceased; (4) when the minor child has resided with the grandparent for six consecutive months or more within the past two years; and (5) under certain circumstances when the parents of the child are unwed, as contemplated by W. Va. Code 48-2B-2 to -6 (1992) (Repl. Vol. 1996). See footnote 10

However, we find that under the particular circumstances of the case sub judice, the circuit court was without jurisdiction to consider the appellants' request for visitation under the grandparents rights statute. See footnote 11

The appellants argue that they are entitled to visitation with their grandchild under the provisions of W. Va. Code 48-2B-3 (1992) (Repl. Vol. 1996). See footnote 12 We disagree. The appellants' analysis ignores paragraph (a) of that section, which requires first that the grandparent's petition be filed with the circuit court that "entered a final order of divorce or annulment or has granted a decree of separate maintenance." W. Va. Code 48-2B-3(a). No such final order or decree was entered in this case. Next, W. Va. Code 48-2B-3(a)(1) requires that the parent through whom the grandparent is related to the grandchild be deemed the "noncustodial parent." In this case the parental rights of the appellants' son, through whom they are related to their grandchild, were terminated. When an individual's parental rights have been terminated the law no longer recognizes such individual as a "parent" with regard to the child or children involved in the particular termination proceeding. Implicit in the term "noncustodial parent," as used in W. Va. Code 48-2B-3(a)(1), is the fact that such person is a "parent" to the child in question. Thus, the non-parent whose parental rights have been terminated could not then be deemed a "noncustodial parent." Furthermore, the criteria of subsections (1), (2) and (3) of W. Va. Code 48-2B-3(a) must all be met before a grandparent may petition a circuit court for visitation. Because the appellants do not meet the requirements of subsection (1), we need not address subsections (2) and (3).

The appellants also argue that their request for visitation should be considered under W. Va. Code 48-2B-5 (1992) (Repl. Vol. 1996), See footnote 13 by virtue of the fact that the child resided with them from February of 1987 through October of 1988 without interruption. W. Va. Code 48-2B-5(1) requires, in part, that the minor grandchild resided without significant interruption with the grandparent for a period of six consecutive months or more within the past two years. Although the child lived with the appellants for a period greater than six months, he has not lived with them since October, 1988. W. Va. Code 48-2B-5 did not become effective until May, 1992, more than three years after the child left the appellants' residence. Moreover, the appellants did not petition the court for visitation until October, 1993, five years after the child stopped residing with them. Because the appellants could not have brought their petition for visitation within two years of the time the child stopped residing with them, we find the court correctly denied the appellants' request for visitation based upon W. Va. Code 48-2B-5 (1992) (Repl. Vol. 1996).

For the reasons herein stated, we find that the circuit court correctly denied the appellants' request for grandparent visitation under the statute. Therefore, the November 7, 1995, order of the Circuit Court of Mingo County is affirmed.

Affirmed.

Footnote: 1 We follow our past practice in domestic and juvenile cases involving sensitive facts and do not use the last names of the parties. See, e.g., State ex rel. Amy M. v. Kaufman, 196 W. Va. 251, 470 S.E.2d 205 (1996).

Footnote: 2 This Court's earlier decision was reported in Kenneth B. v. Elmer Jimmy S., 184 W. Va. 49, 399 S.E.2d 192 (1990). In that decision, we also affirmed the termination of the father's parental rights.

Footnote: 3 The appellees respond that the "court found specifically" that the minor child involved in this case should not have contact with his paternal grandparents. The appellees also asserts that the best interests of the child were clearly "considered and given great weight by the court." We have thoroughly reviewed the record, as submitted to this Court, and find nothing to support these contentions. The circuit court apparently found it unnecessary to proceed to a consideration of the best interests of the child, after having concluded that the grandparents lacked standing to request visitation.

Footnote: 4 W. Va. Code 48-4-1, et seq.

Footnote: 5 At that time, there were two statutes related to grandparent visitation. W. Va. Code 48-2B-1 (1980) (1986 Repl. Vol.), which provided for grandparent visitation when the child's parent was deceased, and W. Va. Code 48-2-15(b)(1) (1986) (1986 Repl. Vol.), which provided for grandparent visitation under certain circumstances when the parents of the child were divorced.

Footnote: 6 However, the Nearhoof decision was limited, under the provisions of W. Va. Code 48-2B-1 as they existed at that time, to grandparent visitation with the child of a deceased child of the grandparent. Grandparents otherwise had no right of visitation with a grandchild who had been adopted.

Footnote: 7 This section was amended in 1994 by the addition of paragraph (b), which defines the term "grandparent" and is not relevant to the issues herein addressed.

Footnote: 8 Generally, those circumstances are: (1) where divorce or separate maintenance is ordered and the parent has not appeared, etc.; (2) upon abandonment or abrogation of visitation rights by the grandchild's parent or judicial preclusion of such visitation; (3) when the parent through whom the grandparent is related is deceased; (4) when the minor child has resided with the grandparent for six consecutive months or more within the past two years; and (5) under certain circumstances when the parents of the child are unwed, as contemplated by W. Va. Code 48-2B-2 to -6 (1992) (Repl. Vol. 1996).

Footnote: 9 However, a court ordering termination of the rights of a parent for abuse or neglect may preclude continued contact with a grandparent if such continued contact might create a danger of further abuse or neglect.

Footnote: 10 Our opinion in no way erodes this Court's position that a child has a right to continued association with individuals with whom he or she has formed a close emotional bond. Syl. pt. 11, In re: Jonathan G., ___ W. Va. ___, ___ S.E.2d ___ (No. 23465, Dec. l8, l996). See also Honaker v. Burnside, 182 W. Va. 448, 388 S.E.2d 322 (1989), wherein we held that a child had a continued right of association with a step-father (husband of deceased mother) and half-sibling upon a showing that an emotional bond existed and that such continued association was in the child's best interests.

Footnote: 11 While not applicable to the case at bar, we note that this Court recently approved Rules of Procedure For Child Abuse and Neglect Proceedings, which became effective on January 1, 1997. Rule 15 of those rules provides for the circuit court's consideration of visitation, and states in part:

The effect of entry of an order of termination of parental rights shall be, inter alia, to prohibit all contact and visitation between the child who is the subject of the petition and the parent who is the subject of the order and the respective grandparents, unless the court finds the child consents and it is in the best interest of the child to retain a right of visitation.

A footnote to this rule states that it "is intended to neither increase nor decrease any rights of the grandparents as set forth in W. Va. Code 49-6-1 et seq. and 48-2B-1 et seq." In light of this footnote, and the Legislature's finding that "circumstances may arise where it is appropriate to grant grandparent visitation to enhance the best interests of the child," W. Va. Code 48-2B-1 (1994) (Repl. Vol. 1996), we believe Rule 15 is in accord with our holding today.

Footnote: 12 W. Va. Code 48-2B-3 (1992) (Repl. Vol. 1996) states:

(a) A grandparent may petition a circuit court, which has entered a final order of divorce or annulment or has granted a decree of separate maintenance, for an order granting visitation rights with a minor grandchild where:
(1) The parent through whom the grandparent is related to the minor grandchild is deemed the noncustodial parent of the minor child by virtue of the court's order regarding custody of the minor child;
(2) The parent through whom the grandparent is related to the minor child having been granted visitation rights with the minor child refuses, fails or is unable to avail himself or herself of the right of visitation for a period of six months or more or has been precluded visitation rights by court order or is an active duty member of the armed forces of the United States whose permanent duty station is located more than one hundred miles from the border of this state; and
(3) The petitioning grandparent has been refused visitation with a minor grandchild by the custodial parent for a period of six months or more.
(b) In determining the appropriateness of granting visitation rights to a grandparent pursuant to this section, the court shall consider the amount of personal contact between the grandparent and minor child prior to the filing of the petition, whether or not the granting of visitation would interfere with the parent-child relationship and the overall effect of such visitation on the minor child's best interest.

Footnote: 13 W. Va. Code 48-2B-5 (1992) (Repl. Vol. 1996), states:

(a) Notwithstanding any provision of this code to the contrary, a grandparent may petition the circuit court of the county in which he or she resides for an order granting said grandparent reasonable visitation rights where:
(1) Said minor grandchild has resided without significant interruption with the grandparent with the parents residing elsewhere for a period of six consecutive months or more within the past two years; S
(2) The minor grandchild is subsequently removed from the home by a parent or parents; and
(3) The removing parent or parents have refused to allow the petitioning grandparent visitation with the minor child who formerly resided in the grandparent's home.
(b) If the circuit court determines that the requirements set forth in subsection (a) of this section have been shown, it shall grant such reasonable visitation rights to the petitioning grandparent as may be consistent with the minor child's best interests.

SYLLABUS BY THE COURT

Davis, Justice:

The appellant herein and petitioner below, the West Virginia Department of Health and Human Resources [hereinafter "DHHR"], appeals the September 15, 1999, dispositional order entered by the Circuit Court of Mercer County regarding the minor children Emily B.[1] [hereinafter "Emily"] and her brother Amos B. (son) [hereinafter "A.J."]. In that order, the circuit court denied the DHHR's motion to terminate the parental rights of the children's parents, the appellees herein and respondents below, Tracy B. [hereinafter "Tracy"] and Amos B. (father) [hereinafter "Amos"],[2] and granted each of the parents a one-year improvement period to commence upon Tracy's successful completion of an inpatient substance abuse treatment program and Amos' release from federal incarceration. On appeal to this Court, the DHHR contends that the circuit court erroneously granted a delayed improvement period and improperly denied its motion to terminate Tracy's and Amos' parental rights. Upon a review of the parties' arguments, the appellate record, and the pertinent authorities, we reverse the decision of the Circuit Court of Mercer County granting the parents a delayed improvement period. We order reversal in this instance because such an improvement period is not permitted by the relevant statutes governing abuse and neglect matters. See W. Va. Code § 49-6-1, et seq. Furthermore, as a result of this ruling, we vacate the circuit court's order denying the DHHR's motion to terminate the respondent parents' parental rights, and remand this case to permit the lower court to reconsider the matter and to conduct further proceedings consistent with this opinion.

I.

FACTUAL AND PROCEDURAL HISTORY

On November 5, 1998, the DHHR filed in the Circuit Court of Mercer County a petition for the emergency custody of then five-year-old Emily[3] and then three-year-old A.J.[4] based upon Tracy's, their mother's, failure to retrieve the children from their day care provider,[5] and Amos', their father's, present inability to care for them as a result of his incarceration.[6] The events underlying this petition are as follows. On or about October 30, 1998, Tracy arranged for the children to spend the night with their day care provider, Patsy H. [hereinafter "Patsy"], presumably with the understanding that Tracy would retrieve the children the following day. However, Tracy did not return to Patsy's house the next day to pick up Emily and A.J. Additionally, she neither called nor checked on the children. Neither did she provide them with changes of clothing, food, medication, or a consent form giving Patsy permission to obtain medical care

[3]Emily's date of birth is August 31, 1993.

[4]A.J. was born on September 20, 1995.

[5]The DHHR also based its allegations of abuse and neglect upon Tracy's history of substance abuse and prior police reports of her failure to supervise the children.

[6]During the events underlying this appeal, Amos has been incarcerated in the Federal Correctional Institution--Beckley, located in Beaver, West Virginia, where he is serving a fifty-one month sentence for the robbery of a bank and a convenience store. He is expected to be released from custody upon the completion of his sentence in March, 2001, but he may be released as early as October, 2000, to a "half-way house" in Dunbar, West Virginia, or on home confinement, as a result of good time credit.

for them.[7] After the youngsters had stayed with their day care provider for three days, Tracy called to inquire about them and requested Patsy to bring the children to her. When Patsy refused to do so, Tracy indicated that she could not pick up the children herself. Ultimately, on the fifth day of the children's stay with Patsy, on November 3, 1998, their grandmother and Tracy's mother, Aletha M., picked up Emily and A.J.

By order entered November 5, 1998, the circuit court determined Emily and A.J. to be in imminent danger,[8] with no alternative but to temporarily remove them from their mother's care. See

[7]Patsy reported that, when Tracy left Emily and A.J. in her care, both children were ill with colds, and one child had a fever. When Pasty mentioned the children's medical conditions to Tracy and inquired about medication for them, Tracy did not respond.

[8]"Imminent danger," requisite to the removal of a child from the home of his/her parent or guardian at the behest of a petition to do so, see W. Va. Code § 49-6-3(a)(1) (1998) (Repl. Vol. 1999), is defined as follows:

> "Imminent danger to the physical well-being of the child" means an emergency situation in which the welfare or the life of the child is threatened. Such emergency situation exists when there is . . . reasonable cause to believe that the following conditions threaten the health or life of any child in the home:
> . . . .
> (4) Abandonment by the parent, guardian or custodian[.]

W. Va. Code § 49-1-3(e) (1998) (Repl. Vol. 1998). See also W. Va. Code § 49-1-3(e) (1999) (Repl. Vol. 1999) (same). In presenting its abuse and neglect petition to the circuit court, the DHHR relied upon the statutory definitions of "child neglect" and "neglected child" to demonstrate the children's imminent danger, as illustrated by the facts alleged in its petition. See W. Va. Code § 49-1-3(c) (1998) (defining "[c]hild abuse and[/or] neglect" as including "physical injury, mental or emotional injury, . . . or negligent treatment or maltreatment of a child by a parent, guardian or custodian who is responsible for the child's

W. Va. Code § 49-6-3(a) (1998) (Repl. Vol. 1999). In so ruling, the court also awarded legal and physical custody of the children to the DHHR. The DHHR, in turn, placed the children with their maternal grandmother, Aletha M., with whom they had been residing since November 3rd. Thereafter, a preliminary hearing was held on November 16, 1998. At that time, the circuit court found Emily and A.J. continued to be in imminent danger so as to preclude their return to Tracy's care, and continued their legal and physical custody with the DHHR. The court further ordered supervised visitation between Tracy and the children, and allowed the DHHR discretion as to whether to permit visitation with Amos.

Following these proceedings, the parties developed a family case plan whereby Tracy would complete extensive detoxification and substance abuse treatment programs, submit to random drug screens by the DHHR, and create a safe and stable home environment for Emily and A.J., including securing employment and maintaining a drug-free atmosphere. No family case plan was devised for Amos, however, presumably because the parties believed his incarceration would preclude his achievement of such goals.

welfare, under circumstances which harm or threaten the health and welfare of the child"); W. Va. Code § 49-1-3(h)(1) (1998) (construing term "[n]eglected child" as a child "(A) [w]hose physical or mental health is harmed or threatened by a present refusal, failure or inability of the child's parent, guardian or custodian to supply the child with necessary food, clothing, shelter, supervision, medical care or education, when such refusal, failure or inability is not due primarily to a lack of financial means on the part of the parent, guardian or custodian; or (B) [w]ho is presently without necessary food, clothing, shelter, medical care, education or supervision because of the disappearance or absence of the child's parent or custodian"). See also W. Va. Code § 49-1-3(c,h(1)) (1999) (same).

The adjudicatory hearing scheduled for January 13, 1999,[9] was continued to March 31, 1999, at the request of Tracy's counsel, as a result of Tracy's enrollment in an inpatient substance abuse treatment program pursuant to the terms of her family case plan. On March 31, 1999, the court determined that Tracy had abandoned Emily and A.J. and that Amos had, by virtue of his incarceration, "technically abandoned" the children. Accordingly, the court adjudicated the children to be abused and/or neglected.

On April 28, 1999, the DHHR moved to terminate both parent's parental rights based upon the circuit court's findings of abandonment and its statutory obligation to seek termination of parental rights in cases involving abandonment.[10] See W. Va. Code § 49-6-5b(a)(2) (1998) (Repl. Vol. 1999) (directing that the DHHR "shall file or join in a petition or otherwise seek a ruling in any pending proceeding to terminate parental rights . . . [i]f a court has determined the child is abandoned"). Finally, on September 15, 1999, the circuit court conducted a dispositional hearing in this case.[11] Upon the evidence presented

[9]In its preliminary order, the court noted that the parties had waived the statutory time constraints for the adjudicatory hearing due to the Christmas and New Year's holidays. See W. Va. Code § 49-6-1(a) (1998) (Repl. Vol. 1999) (requiring, in abuse and neglect cases in which temporary custody of child has been awarded to DHHR, adjudicatory hearing to be held "within thirty days of such order [awarding temporary custody], unless a continuance for a reasonable time is granted to a date certain, for good cause shown"); W. Va. R. P. for Child Abuse & Neglect Proceed. 25 (same).

[10]The DHHR also alleged in its motion that, since her departure from her inpatient treatment program, Tracy's whereabouts had been unknown, and that, as a result of her absence, it had been unable to conduct random drug screens as permitted by an earlier order of the circuit court.

[11]The dispositional hearing, initially scheduled for May 19, 1999, was continued on numerous occasions due to the unavailability of the psychologist who evaluated Emily and A.J. and as a result of various difficulties in securing Amos' transport from federal prison to the circuit court proceedings. For further treatment of an incarcerated parent's right to attend a dispositional hearing concerning the possible termination of his/her parental rights, see Syl. pts. 10 and 11, State ex rel. Jeanette H. v.

for its consideration, the court rendered the following findings and conclusions:

> The Court FINDS that these infant children have a close and continuing relationship and strong bond with the respondent father,[12] that it appears the respondent mother was probably the primary caretaker prior to the initiation of this action, and the Court suspects there is a strong bond between the respondent mother and the infants. The Court FINDS that when a reunification plan is adopted as to one parent, termination of the other parent's parental rights normally serves no purpose. This Court has difficulty terminating the respondent mother's rights, because this Court FINDS it very difficult to terminate the rights of the respondent father under the facts before the Court. The Court FINDS that the respondent father has recently resided in a structured environment as a result of his conviction for bank robbery, that he is participating and complying with all services provided by the Federal Correction Facility, such as visitation, drug and alcohol counseling, and parenting programs. On the other hand, the respondent mother is in an unstructured environment, and has failed to comply with any services provided her, and suffers from an apparent drug addiction. The Court FINDS that this case is one of those rare exceptions to delay the implementation of a permanency plan; as the respondent father is due to be released from incarceration between October 2000 and March 2001; specifically that this is not a case where a limited six month improvement period will be appropriate. The Court FINDS that an extended improvement period, or delay in implementing the same, will not unduly prejudice the infants because the infants are doing well in their current foster placement with the visitation available, that it is in the best interest of the infants to currently maintain the existing bond with their parents, and although the Department of Health and Human Resources has identified adoption as the permanency plan for these infants, the Department has not secured a permanent placement as of this date.
> This Court will defer further disposition in this matter, and it is the ORDER and DECREE of this Court that the State's Motion to [12]The parties represent that Amos has been visiting with Emily and A.J. approximately twice a month since his transfer to the federal correctional facility in Beaver, in March, 1998.

> Terminate Parental Rights be denied as to both respondent parents. It is the ORDER and DECREE of this Court that both respondent parents be granted a one (1) year post-adjudicatory improvement period,[13] that the formal implementation of the respondent father's six (6) month statutory improvement period be delayed until his release from incarceration, and that the formal implementation of the respondent mother's six (6) month statutory improvement period be delayed until she has successfully completed a long-term inpatient substance abuse treatment. . . .[14]

(Footnotes added). From this order of the circuit court, the DHHR appeals.

[13]In its dispositional order, the circuit court refers to the improvement periods granted to the respondent parents as "post-adjudicatory improvement period[s]." Because this relief was granted in the context of the dispositional hearing, rather than during the adjudicatory hearing, which occurred some six months earlier, it seems that the improvement periods awarded are more aptly denominated "dispositional improvement periods," as they were, in fact, granted as a type of alternative disposition in this case. Compare W. Va. Code § 49-6-2(b) (1996) (Repl. Vol. 1999); W. Va. Code § 49-6-12(b) (1996) (Repl. Vol. 1999); and W. Va. R. P. for Child Abuse & Neglect Proceed. 37 (pertaining to post-adjudicatory improvement periods) with W. Va. Code § 49-6-5(c) (1998) (Repl. Vol. 1999); W. Va. Code § 49-6-12(c); and W. Va. R. P. for Child Abuse & Neglect Proceed. 38 (discussing alternative disposition improvement periods). Accordingly, we will henceforth refer to the relief granted by the circuit court to the respondent parents as dispositional improvement periods.

[14]In this regard, the circuit court further instructed the parties as to the conduct expected of them at this time:

> The Court FINDS that the reunification plan previously developed by the Department of Health and Human Resources for the respondent mother was a good plan, and directs that the same be implemented as a post-adjudicatory improvement period for the respondent mother; the Department is ORDERED to finance any substance abuse treatment programs it arranges for the respondent mother, and the respondent father should continue to pursue any appropriate services provided by the prison system, and not engage in any behavior that would delay his release.

II.

STANDARD OF REVIEW

For appeals resulting from abuse and neglect proceedings, such as the case sub judice, we employ a compound standard of review: conclusions of law are subject to a de novo review, while findings of fact are weighed against a clearly erroneous standard.

> "'Although conclusions of law reached by a circuit court are subject to de novo review, when an action, such as an abuse and neglect case, is tried upon the facts without a jury, the circuit court shall make a determination based upon the evidence and shall make findings of fact and conclusions of law as to whether such child is abused or neglected. These findings shall not be set aside by a reviewing court unless clearly erroneous. A finding is clearly erroneous when, although there is evidence to support the finding, the reviewing court on the entire evidence is left with the definite and firm conviction that a mistake has been committed. However, a reviewing court may not overturn a finding simply because it would have decided the case differently, and it must affirm a finding if the circuit court's account of the evidence is plausible in light of the record viewed in its entirety.' Syl. pt. 1, In re Travis W., ___ W. Va. ___, ___ S.E.2d ___ (No. 26640 Dec. 7, 1999). With this standard in mind, we consider the parties' arguments.

DISCUSSION

On appeal to this Court, the DHHR assigns two errors: (1) the circuit court improperly granted the respondent parents a delayed improvement period to begin after Amos' release from prison and Tracy's completion of an inpatient substance abuse/detoxification program and (2) the circuit court erred by denying the DHHR's motion to terminate the parents' parental rights.

A. Delayed Improvement Period

The DHHR first complains that the circuit court erroneously granted the respondent parents a delayed improvement period.[15] In this respect, the DHHR argues that improvement periods of the type

[15]The DHHR additionally complains that the circuit court improperly granted the parents a one-year improvement period in violation of the applicable governing statute which limits dispositional improvement periods to six months' duration, with a discretionary three-month extension. See W. Va. Code § 49-6-5(c); W. Va. Code § 49-6-12(c,g). For his part, Amos suggests that the circuit court properly followed the statutory guidelines in awarding both parents a one-year delayed improvement period. In this regard, Amos represents that, following the conclusion of the six-month dispositional improvement period authorized by W. Va. Code § 49-6-5(c), the circuit court is required to hold a new dispositional hearing. Because the court could, in theory, dispose of the case anew by granting the respondent parent(s) another six-month improvement period, Amos argues that the duration of the improvement periods awarded by the circuit court in the proceedings underlying this appeal were not in error.

While our final resolution of this assignment of error does not require us to consider whether the precise duration of the improvement periods awarded was appropriate, see text at page 24, infra, we nevertheless wish to speak briefly on this matter. In its dispositional order, the circuit court variously characterized the improvement periods awarded to the respondent parents both as a "one (1) year post-adjudicatory improvement period" and as "the respondent father's [and the respondent mother's] six (6) month statutory improvement period." As a result of this contradictory language, it is difficult to ascertain just how long the circuit court intended each of the parents' improvement periods to last, i.e., six months or one year. In any event, however, we remind the circuit court that, on remand, it must heed the statutory guidelines for improvement periods, and mould the parents' improvement periods, if any should be warranted, to the time constraints provided by the Legislature. To reiterate our earlier admonition,

> [a]lthough it is sometimes a difficult task, the trial court must accept the fact that the statutory limits on improvement periods (as well as our case law limiting the right to improvement periods) dictate that there comes a time for decision, because a child deserves resolution and permanency in his or her life, and because part of that permanency must include at minimum a right to rely on his or her caretakers to be there to

awarded by the circuit court in this case are not authorized by the statutory law governing child abuse and neglect proceedings. See W. Va. Code § 49-6-2(b) (1996) (Repl. Vol. 1999); W. Va. Code § 49-6-5(c) (1998) (Repl. Vol. 1999); W. Va. Code § 49-6-12 (1996) (Repl. Vol. 1999). In turn, Tracy and Amos reply that the circuit court properly awarded them improvement periods in accordance with the governing statutes.[16] See id.

At issue in this assignment of error is the authority of a circuit court to grant an improvement period to parents facing the termination of their parental rights, and the court's ability to further alter the commencement of such an improvement period. Typically, an improvement period in the context of abuse and neglect proceedings is viewed as an opportunity for the miscreant parent to modify his/her behavior provide the basic nurturance of life.

[16]Tracy also contends that her entitlement to an improvement period should not be negated by her counsel's dereliction in duty, i.e., his failure to follow the appropriate procedural rules which require a party to apply, in writing, for an improvement period. See W. Va. Code § 49-6-12(c) ("The court may grant an improvement period not to exceed six months as a disposition pursuant to section five [§ 49-6-5] of this article when . . . [t]he respondent moves in writing for the improvement period . . . ."); W. Va. R. P. for Child Abuse & Neglect Proceed. 17(c)(1) ("An application to the court for an order shall be by motion which, unless made during a hearing or trial, shall be made in writing, shall state with particularity the grounds therefor, and shall set forth the relief or order sought. The requirement of writing is fulfilled if the motion is made in a written notice of the hearing on the motion."). Because our ultimate resolution of the improvement period issue concludes that the circuit court's ruling was clearly erroneous, see text at page 24, infra, we need not further consider this matter. We do, however, caution the circuit court, on remand, to pay strict allegiance to the procedural requirements for the issuance of improvement periods prescribed by the statutory guidelines therefor, should it deem that any such improvement periods are warranted in this case. See, e.g., W. Va. Code §§ 49-6-5(c), 49-6-12; W. Va. R. P. for Child Abuse & Neglect Proceed. 17(c), 38.

so as to correct the conditions of abuse and/or neglect with which he/she has been charged. Code, 49-6D-3(a) (1984), is to clearly set forth an organized, realistic method of identifying family problems and the logical steps to be used in resolving or lessening these problems.").

As such, one who faces the termination of his/her parental rights may, during the pendency of an abuse and neglect proceeding, move the presiding court for an improvement period pursuant to W. Va. Code § 49-6-12(a(1),b(1),c(1)). Accord Syl. pt. 9, State ex rel. Diva P. v. Kaufman, 200 W. Va. 555, 490 S.E.2d 642 (1997) ("'W. Va. Va. R. P. for Child Abuse & Neglect Proceed. 17(c) (explaining proper form of motions in child abuse and neglect proceedings). Among the types of improvement periods that may be available to the petitioning parent are those that serve as an alternative disposition of an abuse and neglect proceeding [hereinafter "dispositional improvement period"],[17] such as the improvement periods at issue herein:[18]

> The court may as an alternative disposition allow the parents or custodians an improvement period not to exceed six months. During this period the court shall require the parent to rectify the conditions upon which the determination was based. The court may order the child to be placed with the parents, or any person found to be a fit and proper person for the temporary care of the child during the period. At the end of the period the court shall hold a hearing to determine whether the conditions have been adequately improved, and at the conclusion of such hearing, shall make a further dispositional order in accordance with this section.

W. Va. Code § 49-6-5(c). Accord W. Va. R. P. for Child Abuse & Neglect Proceed. 38. Thus, a circuit court may, in its discretion, grant the abusing/neglecting parent an improvement period before it finally decides whether his/her parental rights should be ultimately terminated.

Improvement periods are further regulated, both in their allowance and in their duration, by the West Virginia Legislature, which has assumed the responsibility of implementing guidelines for child abuse and neglect proceedings generally. See W. Va. Code § 49-6-1, et seq. W. Va. Code § 49-6-12 (1996) (Repl. Vol. 1999), the main statute pertaining to improvement periods, contains various criteria to be considered by a circuit court in determining the propriety of such relief in a given case. >
> (1) The respondent moves in writing for the improvement period;

[19]For the sake of brevity, and to maintain consistency with the legal question at issue in this appeal, our discussion of the applicable law will focus primarily upon dispositional improvement periods. In the context of this analysis, however, we also will include references to the standards governing pre- and post-adjudicatory improvement periods, to the extent that such authority is available.

W. Va. Code § 49-6-12(c).[20] While delineating a six-month duration for dispositional improvement periods,[21] this section also permits a circuit court to extend a dispositional improvement period for an additional three months, if the circumstances of an individual case warrant such an extension:

> (g) A court may extend any improvement period granted pursuant to subsection[] . . . (c) of this section for a period not to exceed three months when the court finds that the respondent has substantially complied with the terms of the improvement period; that the continuation of the improvement period will not substantially impair the ability of the department to permanently place the child; and that such extension is otherwise consistent with the best interest of the child.[22]

W. Va. Code § 49-6-12(g) (footnote added). Upon the conclusion of a dispositional improvement period, and any extension thereof, the circuit court is required to conduct a final dispositional hearing within sixty days of the improvement period's cessation. See W. Va. Code §§ 49-6-2(d), 49-6-12(k); W. Va. R. P. for Child Abuse & Neglect Proceed. 38. But see W. Va. Code § 49-6-12(j) (instructing that such a hearing may be continued only for "good cause").

[20]A similar method is employed for pre- and post-adjudicatory improvement periods. See W. Va. Code § 49-6-12(a,b).

[21]Comparable time limits are imposed for pre- and post-adjudicatory improvement periods. See W. Va. Code § 49-6-12(a,b) (establishing three month and six month time frames for pre- and post-adjudicatory improvement periods, respectively).

[22]This three-month discretionary extension is applicable also to post-adjudicatory improvement periods. See W. Va. Code § 49-6-12(g). See also Syl. pt. 2, In re Jamie Nicole H., 205 W. Va. 176, 517 S.E.2d 41 (1999) ("Pursuant to West Virginia Code § 49-6-12(g) (1998), before a circuit court can grant an extension of a post-adjudicatory improvement period, the court must first find that the respondent has substantially complied with the terms of the improvement period; that the continuation of the improvement period would not substantially impair the ability of the Department of Health and Human Resources to permanently place the child; and that such extension is otherwise consistent with the best interest of the child.").

Even with these detailed guidelines, however, a parent charged with abuse and/or neglect is not unconditionally entitled to an improvement period. For example, when the award of an improvement period would jeopardize the best interests of the subject child, the parent requesting such relief ordinarily will not be accommodated.

> "[C]ourts are not required to exhaust every speculative possibility of parental improvement before terminating parental rights where it appears that the welfare of the child will be seriously threatened . . . ." Syl. Pt. 1, in part, In re R.J.M., 164 W. Va. 496, 266 S.E.2d 114 (1980).

Syl. pt. 7, in part, In re Carlita B., 185 W. Va. 613, 408 S.E.2d 365 (1991). Similarly, when a parent cannot demonstrate that he/she will be able to correct the conditions of abuse and/or neglect with which he/she has been charged, an improvement period need not be awarded before the circuit court may terminate the offending parent's parental rights.

> "'Termination of parental rights, the most drastic remedy under the statutory provision covering the disposition of neglected children, W. Va. Code, 49-6-5 [1977] may be employed without the use of intervening less restrictive alternatives when it is found that there is no reasonable likelihood under W. Va. Code, 49-6-5(b) [1977] that conditions of neglect or abuse can be substantially corrected.' Syllabus Point 2, In re R.J.M., 164 W. Va. 496, 266 S.E.2d 114 (1980). Syllabus point 4, In re Jonathan P., 182 W. Va. 302, 387 S.E.2d 537 (1989)." Syllabus Point 1, In re Jeffrey R.L., 190 W. Va. 24, 435 S.E.2d 162 (1993).

Syl. pt. 7, In re Katie S., 198 W. Va. 79, 479 S.E.2d 589 (1996). Likewise, when the conduct forming the basis of the abuse and/or neglect allegations consists of abandonment, such parental recalcitrance is perceived as so egregious as to warrant the virtually automatic denial of an improvement period. "Abandonment of a child by a parent(s) constitutes compelling circumstances sufficient to justify the denial of an improvement period." Syl. pt. 2, James M. v. Maynard, 185 W. Va. 648, 408 S.E.2d 400

(1991). Finally, a dispositional improvement period is not available to a respondent parent "where a finding is made pursuant to W. Va. Code, 49-6-5(a)(6) [1977] that there is 'no reasonable likelihood that the conditions of neglect or abuse can be substantially corrected in the near future,' and, pursuant to W. Va. Code, 49-6-2(b) [1980], 'compelling circumstances' justify a denial thereof." Syl. pt. 3, in part, In re Darla B., 175 W. Va. 137, 331 S.E.2d 868 (1985).

A parent's rights are necessarily limited in this respect because the pre-eminent concern in abuse and neglect proceedings is the best interest of the child subject thereto. Syl. pt. 3, In re Michael Ray T., ___ W. Va. ___, ___ S.E.2d ___ (No. 26639 Dec. 3, 1999) ("'Cases involving children must be decided not just in the context of competing sets of adults' rights, but also with a regard for the rights of the child(ren).' Syllabus point 7, In re Brian D., 194 W. Va. 623, 461 S.E.2d 129 (1995).").

> Once a court exercising proper jurisdiction has made a determination upon sufficient proof that a child has been neglected and his natural parents were so derelict in their duties as to be unfit, the welfare of the infant is the polar star by which the discretion of the court is to be guided in making its award of legal custody.

Syl. pt. 8, in part, In re Willis, 157 W. Va. 225, 207 S.E.2d 129 (1973). In other words, "'[a]lthough parents have substantial rights that must be protected, the primary goal in cases involving abuse and neglect, as in all family law matters, must be the health and welfare of the children.' Syl. Pt. 3, In re Katie S., 198 W. Va. 79, 479 S.E.2d 589 (1996)." Syl. pt. 3, In re Billy Joe M., ___ W. Va. ___, 521 S.E.2d 173 (1999). Accord Syl. pt. 1, State v. C.N.S., 173 W. Va. 651, 319 S.E.2d 775 (1984) ("'Though constitutionally protected, the right of the natural parent to the custody of minor children is not absolute and it may be limited or terminated by the State, as parens patriae, if the parent is proved unfit to be

For this reason, then, the Legislature has very specifically commanded that abuse and neglect proceedings shall be accorded the utmost priority on circuit court dockets:

> Any petition filed and any proceeding held under the provisions of this article shall, to the extent practicable, be given priority over any other civil action before the court, except proceedings under article two-a [§ 48-2A-1 et seq.], chapter forty-eight of this code and actions in which trial is in progress. Any petition filed under the provisions of this article shall be docketed immediately upon filing. . . .

W. Va. Code § 49-6-2(d). Echoing these directives, this Court has adopted comparable language in Rule 2 of the West Virginia Rules of Procedure for Child Abuse and Neglect Proceedings, which provides, in relevant part:

> These rules shall be liberally construed to achieve safe, stable, secure permanent homes for abused and/or neglected children and fairness to all litigants. These rules are not to be applied or enforced in any manner which will endanger or harm a child. These rules are designed to accomplish the following purposes:
> (a) To provide fair, timely and efficient disposition of cases involving suspected child abuse or neglect[and]
>
> . . . .
> (d) To reduce unnecessary delays in court proceedings through strengthened court case management . . . .

In the same vein, we repeatedly have held in our case law that abuse and neglect proceedings should be resolved as expediently as possible in order to safeguard the well being of the young children at the heart of such proceedings.

> "'Child abuse and neglect cases must be recognized as being among the highest priority for the courts' attention. Unjustified procedural delays wreak havoc on a child's development, stability and security.' Syl. Pt. 1, in part, In re Carlita B., 185 W. Va. 613, 408 S.E.2d 365 (1991)." Syllabus point 3, In re Jonathan G., 198 W. Va. 716, 482 S.E.2d 893 (1996).

Syl. pt. 2, In re Michael Ray T., ___ W. Va. ___, ___ S.E.2d ___ (No. 26639 Dec. 3, 1999). See also Syl. pt. 7, In re George Glen B., 205 W. Va. 435, 518 S.E.2d 863 (1999) ("'The clear import of the statute [West Virginia Code § 49-6-2(d)] is that matters involving the abuse and neglect of children shall take precedence over almost every other matter with which a court deals on a daily basis, and it clearly reflects the goal that such proceedings must be resolved as expeditiously as possible.' Syl. Pt. 5, In re Carlita B., 185 W. Va. 613, 408 S.E.2d 365 (1991).").

Having reviewed the law of this State regarding improvement periods, we turn now to the parties' contentions in the instant appeal. In its order granting Tracy and Amos dispositional improvement periods, the circuit court delayed the commencement thereof until Amos' "release from incarceration" and until Tracy "has successfully completed a long-term inpatient substance abuse treatment" program. This ruling, however, has no basis in the applicable governing law. While the Legislature has created various types of improvement periods and has established specific time limits therefor, nowhere has it provided for the delayed implementation thereof. See W. Va. Code §§ 49-6-2(b,d), 49-6-5(c), 49-6-12. In fact, the very nature of a delayed improvement period contradicts the established legislative purpose of expediting abuse and neglect proceedings to safeguard the welfare of the child(ren) subject thereto. See W. Va. Code § 49-6-2(d); Syl. pt. 7, In re George Glen B., 205 W. Va. 435, 518 S.E.2d 863.

Moreover, under the circumstances of the present case, the delayed implementation of the respondent parents' improvement periods is particularly problematic because, by the very terms of the court's ruling, the delay is indefinite. By basing the commencement date upon such a speculative condition as Tracy's successful completion of a substance abuse treatment program, the circuit court presupposes that she will be able to accomplish, in the short-term, what she has been unwilling to do for the ten and one-half months preceding the circuit court's order.[23] Furthermore, the language employed by the circuit court in granting the respondent father a delayed improvement period is ambiguous. Because it has not defined what constitutes Amos' "release from incarceration," it is unclear as to whether his improvement period shall commence upon his release to a "half-way house" or home confinement, or whether his improvement period is further delayed until his ultimate release from federal custody in March, 2001. In any event, for each of the potential dates upon which Amos' improvement period could start, one naturally must assume that he will, in fact, be eligible for release upon those dates certain[24] and that he will not have lost any good time credited to his sentence. One must also suppose that Amos will be able to assimilate back into society, after a four year sojourn therefrom due to his own socially deviant behavior, to such a degree as to be determined a fit and proper caretaker for his children. As a result of the plethora of difficulties

[23]In his appellate brief, counsel for the respondent mother has indicated that "Tracy B. entered a drug treatment facility in Parkersburg, West Virginia, with the assistance of DHHR, shortly after the Circuit Court's granting of her improvement period, and as of the date of the writing of this Brief, she remains in said facility." While we commend Tracy's efforts, we have no information before us, apart from her counsel's solitary representation, demonstrating that the respondent mother has, in fact, complied with the circuit court's condition by "successfully complet[ing]" this treatment program.

[24]Even the phrase "dates certain" is somewhat of a misnomer in this context as the precise dates upon which Amos anticipates to be released have repeatedly been communicated in the vague terms of particular months and years, rather than by reference to a precise day of such months and years.

surrounding the very idea of delayed improvement periods, not to mention the logistical impossibilities of implementing the same and the rights of the innocent children which will unquestionably be trammeled if such an attempt is made, we conclude that the circuit court's order granting such relief to the respondent parents was in error.

Accordingly, we hold that the commencement of a dispositional improvement period in abuse and neglect cases must begin no later than the date of the dispositional hearing granting such improvement period. We hold further that, at all times pertinent thereto, a dispositional improvement period is governed by the time limits and eligibility requirements provided by W. Va. Code § 49-6-2 (1996) (Repl. Vol. 1999), W. Va. Code § 49-6-5 (1998) (Repl. Vol. 1999), and W. Va. Code § 49-6-12 (1996) (Repl. Vol. 1999).

As the delayed dispositional improvement periods at issue herein clearly violate the statutory mandates and contravene the judicial decisions pertaining to improvement periods, the decision of the circuit court awarding each of the respondent parents a delayed dispositional improvement period is hereby reversed.

B. Termination of Parental Rights

In its second assignment of error, the DHHR requests this Court to reverse the circuit court's order denying its motion to terminate the parental rights of Amos and Tracy. To support this argument, the DHHR contends that Amos, as a result of his incarceration, has technically abandoned his infant children in that his imprisonment prevents him from providing for their care and support. Because abandonment can constitute neglect pursuant to the applicable statutory law, see W. Va. Code § 49-1-3(g)(1)(B) (1998) (Repl. Vol. 1998),[25] the DHHR maintains that Amos' incarceration effectively amounts to neglect so as to warrant the termination of his parental rights. Likewise, the DHHR avers that Tracy has neglected and abandoned Emily and A.J. by virtue of her ongoing substance abuse problems and her inability and/or unwillingness to provide for the children's care and support.

Responding to these contentions, Amos and Tracy dispute that they have ever abandoned their children so as to warrant the termination of their parental rights. Tracy contends that her conduct does not satisfy the six-month abandonment period contained in W. Va. Code § 48-4-3c(a)(2) (1997) (Repl. Vol. 1999).[26] Likewise, Amos contends that he did not abandon his children because when he was [26]W. Va. Code § 48-4-3c(a) (1997) (Repl. Vol. 1999), which is contained in the body of statutes governing adoptions, provides, in pertinent part:

> (a) Abandonment of a child over the age of six months shall be presumed when the birth parent:
>
> (1) Fails to financially support the child within the means of the birth parent; and
>
> (2) Fails to visit or otherwise communicate with the child when he or she knows where the child resides, is physically and financially able to do so and is not prevented from doing so by the person or authorized agency having the care or custody of the child: Provided, That such failure to act continues uninterrupted for a period of six months immediately preceding the filing of the adoption incarcerated, he entrusted Emily and A.J. to their mother's care. In addition, the respondent parents assert that neither the statutes governing abuse and neglect proceedings nor this Court's jurisprudence interpreting the same include incarceration as a factor upon which the termination of a parent's parental rights may be based. Accordingly, they urge that the fact that a parent is incarcerated does not, per se, warrant the termination of the imprisoned parent's parental rights. See, e.g., In re Adoption of Maynor, 38 N.C. App. 724, 248 S.E.2d 875 (1978); Hon. Jean M. Johnson & Christa N. Flowers, You Can Never Go Home Again: The Florida Legislature Adds Incarceration to the List of Statutory Grounds for Termination of Parental Rights, 25 Fla. St. U. L. Rev. 335 (1998). Finally, Tracy contends that if, apart from the fact of his incarceration, Amos is entitled to participate in an improvement period and/or retain his parental rights, then her parental rights should not be terminated because, in the words of the circuit court, "when a reunification plan is adopted as to one parent, termination of the other parent's parental rights normally serves no purpose."

Although the allegations of abuse and neglect lodged by the DHHR against the respondent parents warrant careful consideration, and a final resolution to these year-and-a-half long proceedings is imperative, we are left with the firm conviction that the final disposition of this abuse and neglect case is more appropriately decided, in the first instance, by the circuit court. Our reasons for this conclusion are two-fold. First, in the context of abuse and neglect proceedings, the circuit court is the entity charged with weighing the credibility of witnesses and rendering findings of fact. Syl. pt. 1, in part, In re Travis W., ___ W. Va. ___, ___ S.E.2d ___ (No. 26640 Dec. 7, 1999) ("[W]hen an action, such as an abuse and neglect case, is tried upon the facts without a jury, the circuit court shall make a determination based upon the evidence and shall make findings of fact and conclusions of law as to whether such child is abused or neglected. These findings shall not be set aside by a reviewing court unless clearly erroneous. . . ." (internal citations and quotations omitted)). This Court, therefore, cannot set aside a circuit court's factual determinations unless such findings are clearly erroneous. Id. In the instant appeal, the record presented for our appellate consideration does not adequately contain essential information necessary for this Court to review the circuit court's rulings under a clearly erroneous standard. Conspicuously absent from the appellate record are the transcripts of the various hearings held in the proceedings underlying this appeal. Also missing from the record presented for our consideration are the reasoned recommendations of the children's guardian ad litem as to the disposition most consistent with Emily's and A.J.'s welfare and best interests, the only indication of which is a solitary reference in the circuit court's dispositional order reflecting that "the Guardian Ad Litem is seeking termination of the respondent mother's rights only."[27] Both of these pieces of vital information have been omitted from the record presented for our consideration despite our clear and oft-repeated admonitions that parties appearing before this Court are responsible for designating the appellate record[28] and that guardians are duty-bound to provide guidance to the tribunal charged with determining the subject child(ren)'s ultimate fate.[29]

Second, as we decided in the preceding section, see supra Section III.A., the circuit court erred by granting the parties a delayed improvement period as such a construct does not exist in either the statutory or jurisprudential law of this State. From those portions of the record that we do have at our disposal in the instant proceeding, however, it seems that the circuit court was very likely torn between the DHHR's allegations of abuse and neglect, on the one hand, and Amos' efforts to improve his parenting skills and continue his relationship with his children, on the other hand. While we do not profess to know the innermost workings of the Circuit Court of Mercer County, particularly in light of the fact that the appellate record is completely devoid of any hearing transcripts reflecting the lower court's reasoning for its rulings, we nonetheless find that it is quite likely that the circuit court granted the respondent parents delayed improvement periods in lieu of considering the merits of the DHHR's motion to terminate their parental rights. In that we have thwarted the circuit court's attempted circumvention of a final disposition of this case at the present time, we conclude that it is proper to vacate the court's order insofar as it denied the DHHR's termination motion and to remand this case to permit the circuit court to reconsider, on the merits, the DHHR's motion to terminate Amos' and Tracy's parental rights. See Syl. pt. 7, In re Michael Ray T., ___ W. Va. ___, ___ S.E.2d ___ (No. 26639 Dec. 3, 1999) (""'In the exercise of its appellate jurisdiction, this Court will not decide nonjurisdictional questions which were not considered and decided by the court from which the appeal has been taken.' Frederick Business Properties Co.*, 195 W. Va. 246, 465 S.E.2d 246 (1995).").

In spite of our conclusion that the circuit court is the better-equipped tribunal to render an initial disposition of this case, the parties' arguments nevertheless incorporate several important legal issues instructive to the circuit court's ultimate decision on remand. First, the respondent parents assert that incarceration, per se, does not warrant the termination of an incarcerated parent's parental rights. With this statement of the applicable law, we readily agree.[30] As it has been duly noted, the Legislature has assumed the task of establishing a body of law to govern abuse and neglect proceedings. See W. Va. Code § 49-6-1, et seq. Within this statutory authority, however, the Legislature has not deemed it necessary to base the termination of an individual's parental rights solely upon the fact of his/her incarceration. See W. Va. Code § 49-6-5(a,b).[31]

[30]We disagree, however, with the characterization of the applicable law advanced by Tracy and Amos. In their responsive briefs, they contend that a parent facing termination of his/her parental rights is entitled to provide the court with information demonstrating extenuating circumstances which have prevented him/her from caring for and supporting the child(ren) subject to such termination proceedings. See W. Va. Code § 48-4-3c(d) (allowing birth parent to overcome presumption of abandonment by providing that he/she "shall have the opportunity to demonstrate to the court the existence of compelling circumstances preventing said parent from supporting, visiting or otherwise communicating with the child: Provided, That in no event may incarceration provide such a compelling circumstance if the crime resulting in the incarceration involved a rape in which the child was conceived"). Furthermore, the respondent parents indicate that the circumstances under which a parent may explain his/her failure to care for or support his/her child specifically do not include incarceration arising from a sexual crime during which the subject child was conceived. Id. To this point, all of these statements accurately reflect the law of this State--as it pertains to termination of parental rights for purposes of adoption. These points of law do not, however, govern abuse and neglect proceedings such as the one underlying the instant appeal. See Syl. pt. 1, Parkins v. Londeree, 146 W. Va. 1051, 124 S.E.2d 471 (1962) ("In the construction of a legislative enactment, the intention of the legislature is to be determined, not from any single part, provision, section, sentence, phrase or word, but rather from a general consideration of the act or statute in its entirety."). Rather, abuse and neglect proceedings are governed by the separate body of statutory law contained in W. Va. Code § 49-1-1, et seq., concerning "Child Welfare." See W. Va. Code § 49-1-1(a)(8) (1998) (Repl. Vol. 1998) (enumerating goals of "Child Welfare" statutes, including to "[p]rovide for early identification of the problems of children and their families, and respond appropriately with measures and services to prevent abuse and neglect" (emphasis added)). See also W. Va. Code § 49-1-1(a)(8) (1999) (Repl. Vol. 1999) (same). Accordingly, in explaining why termination of parental rights generally cannot be based solely upon a parent's incarceration, we will refer to the pertinent authorities concerning abuse and neglect proceedings instead of those governing the adoption process.

[31]The applicable statutory law authorizes the termination of a parent's parental rights "[u]pon a finding that there is no reasonable likelihood that the conditions of neglect or abuse can be substantially corrected in the near future, and when necessary for the welfare of the child . . . ." W. Va. Code § 49-6-5(a)(6). The phrase

"no reasonable likelihood that conditions of neglect or abuse can be substantially corrected" shall mean that, based upon the evidence before the court, the abusing adult or adults have demonstrated an inadequate capacity to solve the problems of abuse or neglect, on their own or with help. Such conditions shall be deemed to exist in the following circumstances, which shall not be exclusive:

(1) The abusing parent or parents have habitually abused or are addicted to alcohol, controlled substances or drugs, to the extent that proper parenting skills have been seriously impaired and such person or persons have not responded to or followed through the recommended and appropriate treatment which could have improved the capacity for adequate parental functioning;

(2) The abusing parent or parents have willfully refused or are presently unwilling to cooperate in the development of a reasonable family case plan designed to lead to the child's return to their care, custody and control;

(3) The abusing parent or parents have not responded to or followed through with a reasonable family case plan or other rehabilitative efforts of social, medical, mental health or other rehabilitative agencies designed to reduce or prevent the abuse or neglect of the child, as evidenced by the continuation or insubstantial diminution of conditions which threatened the health, welfare or life of the child;

(4) The abusing parent or parents have abandoned the child;

(5) The abusing parent or parents have repeatedly or seriously injured the child physically or emotionally, or have sexually abused or sexually exploited the child, and the degree of family stress and the potential for further abuse and neglect are so great as to preclude the use of resources to mitigate or resolve family problems or assist the abusing parent or parents in fulfilling their responsibilities to the child; or

(6) The abusing parent or parents have incurred emotional illness, mental illness or mental deficiency of such duration or nature as to render

Indeed, in our numerous cases applying the Legislature's edicts in this regard, we also have been reluctant to find that incarceration, per se, warrants the termination of an imprisoned parent's parental rights. See, e.g., State v. Tammy R., 204 W. Va. 575, 577 n.4, 578 n.7, & 580 n.13, 514 S.E.2d 631, 633 n.4, 634 n.7, & 636 n.13 (1999) (per curiam) (limiting appellate review to issue of child's placement and declining to consider whether mother's incarceration amounted to abandonment so as to warrant termination of her parental rights); *West Virginia Dep't of Health & Human Resources ex rel. Instead, we have cautiously acknowledged that while certain incidences of incarceration certainly are more egregious than others and should be considered when contemplating the termination of parental rights,[32] "[a] natural parent of an infant child does not forfeit his or her parental right to the custody of the child merely by reason of having been convicted of one or more charges of criminal offenses." Syl. pt. 2, State ex rel. Acton v. Flowers, 154 W. Va. 209, 174 S.E.2d 742 (1970) (emphasis added).

Thus, while an individual's incarceration may be a criterion in determining whether his/her parental rights should be terminated, other factors and circumstances impacting his/her ability to remedy the conditions of abuse and neglect should also be considered when making such a disposition.[33] See,

Va. at 713-15, 356 S.E.2d at 467-69 (basing termination of father's parental rights upon his conviction of first degree murder of his child's mother; his prolonged period of imprisonment therefor; his history of habitual alcohol abuse; and his history of domestic violence towards his child's mother). For example, in the case sub judice, the circuit court may consider Amos' incarceration in deciding whether his parental rights should be terminated, but the court must also evaluate additional evidence relevant to his ability to parent his children, such as his history of substance abuse; the allegations of his past domestic violence towards Tracy; his participation in parenting classes during his incarceration; his regular visits with and telephone calls to his children during his imprisonment; his frequent inquiries as to the health and well being of his children during these proceedings; and any additional information which the lower court deems instructive to its decision.

Next, the respondent parents contend that Amos' parental rights should not be terminated because he has a strong emotional bond with Emily and A.J. fostered, in large part, by his regular visits with his children during his incarceration.[34] From the record in this case, it is apparent that this precise factual issue has not been finally resolved by the circuit court in that reports by the psychologist evaluating the children variously indicate that there does and there does not exist such a bond, and that, if such emotional ties do exist, they are not equally experienced by both children. Likewise, we can find no indication in the appellate record of the guardian ad litem's views on whether continued visitation between the children and their father would be in the youngsters' best interests or whether it would, in fact, be detrimental to them. On this factual issue, then, we defer to the circuit court's initial evaluation of the evidence. See Syl. pt. 1, In re Travis W., ___ W. Va. ___, ___ S.E.2d ___ (No. 26640 Dec. 7, 1999). Once the lower court has properly considered this information, it may use such findings to instruct its final disposition of this case vis-a-vis the extent of, if any, parental contact Amos will be entitled to retain.

In other words, if the circuit court deems that there exists a sufficient emotional bond between the respondent father and his children, but also concludes that his parental rights should be terminated, that tribunal may grant Amos post-termination visitation with Emily and A.J., provided such a continued relationship is in the children's best interests and "would not unreasonably interfere with their permanent placement." State ex rel. Amy M. v. Kaufman, 196 W. Va. 251, 260, 470 S.E.2d 205, 214 (1996).

> "When parental rights are terminated due to neglect or abuse, the circuit court may nevertheless in appropriate cases consider whether continued visitation or other contact with the abusing parent is in the best > interest of the child. Among other things, the circuit court should consider whether a close emotional bond has been established between parent and child and the child's wishes, if he or she is of appropriate maturity to make such request. The evidence must indicate that such visitation or continued contact would not be detrimental to the child's well being and would be in the child's best interest." Syllabus Point 5, In re Christina L., 194 W. Va. 446, 460 S.E.2d 692 (1995).

Syl. pt. 8, In re Katie S., 198 W. Va. 79, 479 S.E.2d 589 (1996). See also Syl. pt. 11, In re Jonathan G., 198 W. Va. 716, 482 S.E.2d 893 (1996) ("A child has a right to continued association with individuals with whom he has formed a close emotional bond, including foster parents, provided that a determination is made that such continued contact is in the best interests of the child."). We repeat our admonition, however, that in visitation matters, the best interests of the child(ren) are paramount. Syl. pt. 5, Carter v. Carter, 196 W. Va. 239, 470 S.E.2d 193 (1996).

Lastly, Tracy contends that if Amos is permitted to retain his parental rights, hers need not be terminated. Instead, she claims that "[t]he Circuit Court can merely order the custodial parent to not allow the children involved to have contact with the non-custodial parent," and that allowance of parental rights would enable the collection of child support from the non-custodial parent. As we have previously discussed, the circuit court is the more appropriate tribunal to decide, in the first instance, whether the respondent parents' parental rights should, in fact, be terminated. However, we wish to clarify a few points of law implicated by Tracy's contentions on this point.

First, the argument advanced by Tracy in this respect fails to appreciate the fact that the termination of parental rights is not an all-or-nothing proposition. The statute governing terminations,

W. Va. Code § 49-6-5, permits the termination of one parent's parental rights while leaving the rights of the nonabusing parent completely intact, if the circumstances so warrant. The circuit court is authorized,

> [u]pon a finding that there is no reasonable likelihood that the conditions of neglect or abuse can be substantially corrected in the near future, and when necessary for the welfare of the child, [to] terminate the parental, custodial or guardianship rights and/or responsibilities of the abusing parent and [to] commit the child to the permanent sole custody of the nonabusing parent, if there be one, or, if not, to either the permanent guardianship of the department or a licensed child welfare agency.

W. Va. Code § 49-6-5(a)(6) (emphasis added). By the same token, simply because one parent has been found to be a fit and proper caretaker for his/her child does not automatically entitle the child's other parent to retain his/her parental rights if his/her conduct has endangered the child and such conditions of abuse and/or neglect are not expected to improve. Id.

Additionally, to retain her parental rights, Tracy must demonstrate that she is, in fact, able to properly care for Emily and A.J. As we noted with respect to Amos, the circuit court must consider all the circumstance influencing Tracy's parenting abilities in rendering such a decision, including her occasional visits with Emily and A.J.; her substance abuse problems; her maintenance of, or her inability to maintain, a suitable home and steady employment; and her disappearance from January, 1999, until August, 1999.

Finally, in rendering a final disposition of this matter, we urge the circuit court to consider all of the possible dispositions available in abuse and neglect proceedings, see W. Va. Code § 49-6-5, and the circumstances under which termination of parental rights is statutorily required, see W. Va. Code § 49-

6-5b (1998) (Repl. Vol. 1999).[35]

IV.

CONCLUSION

For the foregoing reasons, we reverse that portion of the September 15, 1999, order of the Circuit Court of Mercer County awarding Amos and Tracy delayed dispositional improvement periods. We further vacate the circuit court's denial of the DHHR's motion to terminate the respondent parents' parental rights, and remand this case to permit the circuit court to reconsider such motion and render a final disposition in these abuse and neglect proceedings.

Reversed, in part, Vacated, in part, and Remanded.

Starcher, J., concurring:

I write to say that I am troubled by the future implications of the majority's opinion. While I do concur with remanding this matter to the circuit court, I am uncertain as to the message we are sending.

The circuit judge in this case went to great lengths to protect the welfare of a very troubled family. The mother is a drug addict; the father committed a crime allegedly to "feed his family." The mother is in and out of rehab; the father is stuck in a federal prison until the end of the year. And in the middle, two young children are growing up very quickly.

In looking at the facts in this case the judge did the best he could with the situation as presented to the court. It appears that the mother is so wrapped up in her addiction that she does not provide care for the children. The father, however, seems to regret his actions and is struggling to maintain a relationship with the children. He regularly visits with the children in a prison visiting room, plays with them, talks, and inquires about their well-being. Beyond that, there isn't much he can do from the confines of prison except count the days.

The circuit judge placed the children in the legal custody of the Department of Health and Human Resources ("DHHR"), but provided both parents with an improvement period, with the father's to begin after he is released from prison.

This Court and the Legislature have repeatedly urged the DHHR to bring abuse and neglect cases to a quick conclusion, and I agree with this. But exactly how a prison sentence -- even a brief one -- fits into the concept of abandonment of children by a parent has never been considered by this Court. The DHHR is advocating for a clean, sharp rule: Because the father voluntarily committed a crime, he voluntarily "abandoned" the children. Because he abandoned the children, he fits within the abandonment portion of the abuse and neglect statutes, and should have his parental rights terminated. The DHHR basically argues that incarceration, ipso facto, requires a parent's rights to raise their children to be automatically terminated.

The Legislature has crafted broad guidelines for the DHHR and for the circuit courts to follow in deciding whether to terminate the "parental rights" of a parent. However, nowhere in these guidelines is "criminal incarceration" mentioned.

The majority opinion rightly rejects the DHHR's premise that incarceration of a parent should call for an automatic termination of parental rights. And I agree. The majority states that a parent's incarceration might be a factor to consider in deciding whether DHHR can take custody of a child, and even a factor in determining whether to entirely terminate any parental rights. But it cannot be the sole factor, as this case demonstrates.[1]

While a circuit court should not delay or drag out a parent's improvement period, the trial judge should not be stripped of the right to fashion a solution in these cases that addresses the ultimate best interests of a child -- even if it means waiting for a dad to conclude a brief prison stint.

[1]Criminal defense attorneys should, hereafter, warn their clients of the holding in this case if they have young children. By pleading guilty to a crime, a defendant may not only be giving up his freedom, and maybe his right to vote, own a gun, get a hunting or fishing license, but a defendant now may also, in some circumstances, have their parental rights terminated and lose their right to parent his child.

I agree with the majority's returning of this case to the circuit court for final disposition. But I do not agree that we should dictate the outcome to the circuit judge. The circuit judge in this case has demonstrated a strong desire to protect the interests of both the children and the parents. The father has repeatedly indicated he is willing and able to parent his children -- his only impediment is a relatively short federal sentence. If the circuit judge believes that this parenting arrangement deserves a chance for the benefit of the children, this Court should not second guess the judge and arbitrarily say otherwise.

The goal of abuse and neglect proceedings is to protect children from severe physical and emotional trauma, and to provide every child with long-term stability. While we may not be able to provide every child with the perfect, white bread, cookie-cutter childhood replete with sitcom-like suburban experiences, the court system must fashion a solution that provides protection for children, with a reasonable opportunity to reach adulthood safely and in as good physical and mental health as practicable. And this opportunity may include permitting a father who has been incarcerated for a crime to continue to parent his children.

I am troubled that the majority's opinion might be read as giving direction to the circuit court to simply terminate both parents' rights. I would hope that the circuit judge in this case will again carefully examine the interests of the children and the parents, and again take whatever action he deems to be in the best interests of the children, even if it means repeating the court's ruling that the father's rights not be terminated. Termination of the rights of the parents should be the answer only when other alternatives have failed.

With this caution, I concur.

I am authorized to state that Justice McGraw joins in this concurrence.

SYLLABUS BY THE COURT

1. "Although conclusions of law reached by a circuit court are subject to de novo review, when an action, such as an abuse and neglect case, is tried upon the facts without a jury, the circuit court shall make a determination based upon the evidence and shall make findings of fact and conclusions of law as to whether such child is abused or neglected. These findings shall not be set aside by a reviewing court unless clearly erroneous. A finding is clearly erroneous when, although there is evidence to support the finding, the reviewing court on the entire evidence is left with the definite and firm conviction that a mistake has been committed. However, a reviewing court may not overturn a finding simply because it would have decided the case differently, and it must affirm a finding if the circuit court's account of the evidence is plausible in light of the record viewed in its entirety." Per Curiam:

The petitioners herein, Donna and John M.[1] (hereinafter "Donna and John"), appeal from an order entered September 23, 2008, by the Circuit Court of Wood County. By that order, the circuit court denied the petition filed by Donna and John alleging that their granddaughter, the minor child at issue herein, Emily G. (hereinafter "Emily"), is "an abused and/or neglected child."[2] On appeal to this Court, Donna and John contend that the circuit court erred by refusing to adjudicate Emily as an abused and/or neglected child and that such ruling precludes the establishment of Emily's permanent placement. Upon a review of the parties' arguments, the record submitted for appellate consideration, and the pertinent authorities, we vacate the decision of the Wood County Circuit Court dismissing the abuse and/or neglect petition filed by Donna and John and reinstate said petition. Furthermore, we remand this case to permit the circuit court to hold a hearing on Donna and John's petition alleging that their granddaughter, Emily, is an abused and/or neglected child. Finally, we direct the circuit court to grant intervenor status to the Wood County Department of Health and Human Resources (hereinafter "DHHR") so that it may participate in the abuse and neglect proceedings on remand and to appoint counsel to represent Emily and her biological parents, Sylvia and Carl, during the remand proceedings.

I.

FACTUAL AND PROCEDURAL HISTORY

The facts underlying the instant proceeding are largely undisputed by the parties. Emily, the subject child of the case sub judice, was born on August 14, 2006. Sylvia, who is the daughter of Donna and the stepdaughter of John, is Emily's mother, and Carl is Emily's father.[3] At the time of Emily's birth, Sylvia was seventeen years old; Sylvia was residing with Donna and John; and she and Carl were not married to each other. When Emily was approximately two months old, Sylvia assigned temporary guardianship of Emily to Donna and John on October 25, 2006. Thereafter, Sylvia and Carl, by petition dated November 14, 2006, jointly attempted to regain Emily's custody.

During the next year and one-half, Sylvia and Carl continued their tumultuous relationship.[4] Sylvia and Carl were briefly married to each other,[5] and numerous domestic violence petitions were filed by each of them against the other before, [3]On August 27, 2007, following DNA testing, Carl was recognized as Emily's father. However, it is unclear from the record whether Carl voluntarily signed an affidavit of paternity or whether Carl was declared to be Emily's father by court order.

[4]Before Emily was born, Carl had filed a domestic violence petition against Sylvia, which petition Carl later requested be dismissed.

[5]Sylvia and Carl were married on July 10, 2007, and were divorced by order of the Wood County Family Court following its hearing of October 2, 2007.

during, and after their marriage.[6] The allegations of domestic violence range from physical attacks involving hitting, kicking, cutting, and choking, to non-physical attacks involving death threats, telephone harassment, and being held against the petitioner's will. These petitions alternately culminated in six-month protective orders or were dismissed at the petitioner's request.

Throughout this time, Emily's guardianship proceedings continued through the Wood County Family Court. On January 29, 2007, the family court upheld the temporary guardianship agreement by which Sylvia had assigned temporary custody of Emily to Donna and John and awarded Emily's temporary custody to Donna and John in accordance therewith. Carl continued to pursue custodial rights to Emily, and filed petitions for modification of Emily's custody on February 2, 2007, which petition the family court denied. Thereafter, on March 5, 2007, Carl filed another petition for modification of Emily's custody; additional proceedings were had on this petition in the family court. Following a hearing held on October 2, 2007, the family court granted Carl[7] supervised visitation with Emily for one hour every other week, which visitations were later increased to one hour every week following the family court's February 4, 2008, hearing.

[6]During the oral arguments in this case, counsel for Donna and John represented that a total of ten domestic violence petitions have been filed regarding Sylvia and Carl's violence towards one another, including the most recent petition filed in January 2009. Some of these petitions culminated in criminal sanctions for violations of the resultant protective orders.

[7]It is not apparent from the record whether the family court also granted Sylvia supervised visitation with Emily.

Subsequently, on July 8, 2008, the family court entered a final order awarding Emily's "sole care, custody and control" to Donna and John, as the child's "primary residential custodians . . . until further Order of the Court." The court additionally awarded supervised visitation to Sylvia and Carl for one hour every week, and permitted Carl's parents, Emily's paternal grandparents, to participate in these visits one time per month. Finally, the court adopted the recommendations of Emily's Guardian ad Litem (hereinafter "Guardian"), who suggested the family court impose various requirements on Sylvia and Carl with a view towards remedying their tendencies to commit domestic violence and providing a safe, nurturing, and violence-free environment for Emily.[8]

[8]In his May 5, 2008, report, Emily's Guardian ad Litem recommended that,

> [t]o protect the parents [Sylvia and Carl] and the child [Emily], the following limiting factors should be imposed by the Court: 1) both parents should have only supervised visits with Emily until further order of the Court; 2) these visits should be supervised by Kid's First (at different times for each parent) until each parent has completed the programs of intervention recommended herein (upon a parent's completion of said programs that parent's visitation may be monitored by another responsible adult); 3) neither parent shall reside in or visit the same home where Emily resides when Emily is present until the parent has completed the programs of

Following the entry of the family court's order, Donna and John filed the instant abuse and/or neglect petition[9] in the Circuit Court of Wood County on September 8, 2008,[10] ostensibly in accordance with the Guardian ad Litem's recommendation that such a petition be filed if Sylvia and Carl cannot maintain an amicable, violence-free intervention recommended herein; 4) each parent shall actively participate in and complete the Batterer's Intervention Program at the Day Report Center; 5) each parent shall actively participate in and complete a program designed for victim's [sic] of domestic violence; 6) each parent shall actively participate in and complete parenting classes; 7) each parent shall demonstrate that [he/she] [is] able to maintain a home environment that is stable, safe, nurturing, free of domestic violence, and otherwise appropriate for a child of such tender years; 8) each parent shall abide completely with the protective violence orders in effect; 9) neither parent should seek to have said orders terminated prematurely; 10) the parents should not have any form of contact or communication with each other; and 11) Abuse and Neglect Proceedings should be commenced as soon as it becomes evident that either party is failing to comply fully with the conditions set forth herein so that parental rights can be terminated and visitation ended.

[9]Donna and John filed their petition alleging that Emily is an abused and/or neglected child pursuant to W. Va. Code § 49-6-1 (2005) (Supp. 2009). For further treatment of this statute, see Section III, infra.

[10]While it does not appear from the record in this case that Donna and John served their abuse and/or neglect petition upon the Wood County Department of Health and Human Resources (DHHR) or that they otherwise notified the DHHR of the petition's filing despite the statutory requirement to do so, their counsel stated during the oral arguments in this case that they had, in fact, served the Department with their petition. See W. Va. Code § 49-6-1(b) (requiring that "[n]otice [of the filing of an abuse and neglect petition] shall . . . be given to the department").

relationship with one another.[11] In their petition, Donna and John alleged Emily to be an abused and/or neglected child as a result of the ongoing domestic violence between her mother, Sylvia, and her father, Carl; sought to terminate the parental rights of Emily's parents, Sylvia and Carl; and indicated their willingness to provide permanence and stability to Emily by adopting her. By order entered September 23, 2008, the circuit court denied Donna and John's petition finding that it "does not allege sufficient facts to come within the statutory definition of abuse and neglect." The circuit court explained further that "there are no allegations that any of the acts of domestic violence occurred in the presence of the child." From this adverse ruling, Donna and John appeal to this Court.

II.

STANDARD OF REVIEW

On appeal to this Court, Donna and John seek review of the circuit court's order dismissing their abuse and/or neglect petition. In Syllabus point 1 of In the Interest of Tiffany Marie S., 196 W. Va. 223, 470 S.E.2d 177 (1996), we explained the method by which we review circuit court rulings in abuse and neglect proceedings:

> Although conclusions of law reached by a circuit court are subject to de novo review, when an action, such as an abuse and neglect case, is tried upon the facts without a jury, the circuit court shall make a determination based upon the evidence and shall make findings of fact and conclusions of law as to whether such child is abused or neglected. These > findings shall not be set aside by a reviewing court unless clearly erroneous. A finding is clearly erroneous when, although there is evidence to support the finding, the reviewing court on the entire evidence is left with the definite and firm conviction that a mistake has been committed. However, a reviewing court may not overturn a finding simply because it would have decided the case differently, and it must affirm a finding if the circuit court's account of the evidence is plausible in light of the record viewed in its entirety.

Accord In re Elizabeth Jo H., 192 W. Va. 656, 659, 453 S.E.2d 639, 642 (1994) (per curiam) (commenting, in abuse and neglect case, that "[a]ppellate oversight is . . . deferential" and applying "clearly erroneous standard" of review"). We will consider the parties' arguments in light of this standard.

III.

DISCUSSION

During the proceedings underlying the instant appeal, the circuit court dismissed the petition filed by Donna and John alleging that their granddaughter, Emily, was an abused and/or neglected child. The circuit court rendered this ruling, without holding a hearing on said petition, based upon its belief that "the Petition does not allege sufficient facts to come within the statutory definition of abuse and neglect. For example, there are no allegations that any of the acts of domestic violence occurred in the presence of the child."

On appeal to this Court, Donna and John complain that the circuit court erred by dismissing their petition and refusing to consider the evidence they presented in support of their allegations that Emily is an abused and/or neglected child. In this regard, Donna and John argue that the ongoing history of domestic violence between Sylvia and Carl supports a finding that Emily is an abused and/or neglected child. They contend that since the family court's final order, Sylvia and Carl have continued their tumultuous and violent relationship and that, other than attending supervised visitation with Emily, they have not satisfied any of the other conditions recommended by the Guardian ad Litem and adopted by the family court. In support of their allegations of abuse and/or neglect, Donna and John rely upon similar cases decided by this Court in which a finding of abuse and/or neglect was premised not upon direct violence towards the subject child but instead upon domestic violence in the home in which the child lived. See In re Frances J.A.S., 213 W. Va. 636, 584 S.E.2d 492 (2003) (per curiam); In re Brandon Lee B., 211 W. Va. 587, 567 S.E.2d 597 (2001) (per curiam). Donna and John further express concern that Emily's best interests require that she have stability and permanency in her life and that until the parental rights of Sylvia and Carl have been terminated, no such permanency can be achieved.

The Guardian ad Litem responds that although he was Emily's Guardian in the underlying custody proceedings, he was not a party to Donna and John's petition alleging Emily to be an abused and/or neglect child[12] and does not have any information from which to conclude that Emily has been abused and/or neglected by Sylvia and Carl's failure to comply with his recommendations set forth in the family court's final order. While the Guardian has reservations about the ability of Emily's parents to care for her given their mental capacity, young age, and history of violence towards each other, he nevertheless requests that Emily be permitted to maintain the marginal relationship she currently has with her parents until such time as visitation with them becomes harmful to her. Moreover, the Guardian remains hopeful that Sylvia and Carl will be able to establish a more meaningful relationship with Emily in the future and that, for this reason, their legal rights to Emily should remain in place.

Finally, Carl responds to Donna and John's arguments by stating that he has complied with the Guardian's recommendations by attending supervised visitation with Emily and completing a parent education class. As he did repeatedly during the previous guardianship proceedings, Carl reiterates in the case sub judice his desire to be awarded custody of Emily and represents that he is currently in a stable relationship and lives in a peaceful household free from domestic violence.

[12]While appearing before this Court during the oral arguments in this case, the Guardian ad Litem specifically stated that the circuit court had not appointed him to represent Emily in the instant abuse and neglect proceeding insofar as the court had dismissed said proceeding before a hearing had been held on the underlying abuse and neglect petition.

Having reviewed the parties' arguments and the governing law, we agree with Donna and John's assertions that the circuit court committed error in this case. However, we reach this conclusion not upon the credibility or substantiality of the allegations of abuse and/or neglect proffered by Donna and John, but rather based upon the statutory law that governs abuse and neglect petitions. Pursuant to this authority, the circuit court erred by dismissing Donna and John's abuse and/or neglect petition without holding a hearing thereon.

W. Va. Code § 49-6-1 (2005) (Supp. 2009) permits a petition to be filed when a child is believed to be abused and/or neglected, dictates the procedure for filing an abuse and neglect petition, and details the court's duties once such a petition has been filed:

> (a) If the department or a reputable person believes that a child is neglected or abused, the department or the person may present a petition setting forth the facts to the circuit court in the county in which the child resides, or if the petition is being brought by the Department, in the county in which the custodial respondent or other named party abuser resides, or in which the abuse or neglect occurred, or to the judge of the court in vacation. Under no circumstance may a party file a petition in more than one county based on the same set of facts. The petition shall be verified by the oath of some credible person having knowledge of the facts. The petition shall allege specific conduct including time and place, how such conduct comes within the statutory definition of neglect or abuse with references thereto, any supportive services provided by the department to remedy the alleged circumstances and the relief sought. Upon filing of the petition, the court shall set a time and place for a hearing and shall > appoint counsel for the child. When there is an order for temporary custody pursuant to section three [§ 49-6-3] of this article, the hearing shall be held within thirty days of the order, unless a continuance for a reasonable time is granted to a date certain, for good cause shown.

> (b) The petition and notice of the hearing shall be served upon both parents and any other custodian, giving to the parents or custodian at least ten days' notice. Notice shall also be given to the department, any foster or preadoptive parent, and any relative providing care for the child. . . .

(Emphasis added). Pursuant to this statutory language, once a petition has been filed alleging a child to be abused and/or neglected, the court in which such petition is filed is required to "set a time and place for a hearing."[13] W. Va. Code § 49-6-1(a). This language is mandatory and absolutely requires a hearing to be held on said petition: "In a child abuse and neglect [case], . . . a court . . . must hold a hearing under W. Va. Code, 49-6-2, and determine 'whether such child is abused or neglected.' Such a finding is a prerequisite to further continuation of the case." Syl. pt. 1, in part, State v. T.C., 172 W. Va. 47, 303 S.E.2d 685 (1983). Here, the circuit court did not hold a hearing on the petition alleging Emily to be an abused and/or neglected child, but rather dismissed the petition without a hearing. Dismissal of the petition without a hearing is a direct violation of the statutory mandate to hold a hearing on abuse and/or neglect petitions. See W. Va.

[13]The manner in which this hearing is conducted is set forth in W. Va. Code § 49-6-2 (2006) (Supp. 2009).

Code § 49-6-1(a).

When the requisite procedure is not followed in an abuse and neglect case, this Court has held that the order resulting from such deviation will be vacated and the case will be remanded for entry of an order that satisfies the procedural requirements:

> Where it appears from the record that the process established by the Rules of Procedure for Child Abuse and Neglect Proceedings and related statutes for the disposition of cases involving children [alleged] to be abused or neglected has been substantially disregarded or frustrated, the resulting order . . . will be vacated and the case remanded for compliance with that process and entry of an appropriate . . . order.

Syl. pt. 5, in part, In re Edward B., 210 W. Va. 621, 558 S.E.2d 620 (2001). Because W. Va. Code § 49-6-1(a) requires a circuit court presented with an abuse and neglect petition to hold a hearing thereon, and because the circuit court did not hold a hearing on the petition filed by Donna and John alleging Emily to be an abused and/or neglected child, we vacate the order entered September 23, 2008, by the Wood County Circuit Court dismissing the petition and reinstate said petition. Furthermore, we remand this case to the circuit court so that a hearing may be had on Donna and John's petition.

On remand, the circuit court additionally should ensure that the other requirements of W. Va. Code § 49-6-1 have been complied with, particularly the statutory directives requiring participation by the Department of Health and Human Resources, see

W. Va. Code § 49-6-1(b), and the appointment of counsel for the subject child, see W. Va. Code § 49-6-1(a). Moreover, on remand, the circuit court also is directed to comply with the requirements of W. Va. Code § 49-6-2(a) (2006) (Supp. 2009), which provides, in pertinent part, that counsel should be appointed to represent the minor child's biological parents during the abuse and neglect proceedings. From the record before this Court, it does not appear that Donna and John served their abuse and neglect petition on the Wood County Department of Health and Human Resources or that the Department otherwise received notice of their petition.[14] Insofar as "[n]otice shall . . . be given to the department," W. Va. Code § 49-6-1(b), the Department should have been made a party to the circuit court proceedings below. Furthermore, we specifically have recognized that "the Department of Health and Human Resources has a duty to . . . join or participate in proceedings to terminate parental rights . . . ." Syl. pt. 2, in part, In re George Glen B., Jr., 207 W. Va. 346, 532 S.E.2d 64 (2000). Accordingly, on remand, we direct the circuit court to grant intervenor status to the Wood County Department of Health and Human Resources to permit it to participate in the abuse and neglect proceedings concerning Emily. Inclusion of the Department also will enable it to fulfill its statutory duty to "provide supportive services in an effort to remedy circumstances detrimental to [the] child." W. Va. Code § 49-6-1(c).

Moreover, it has come to this Court's attention that no counsel has been appointed for Emily in the underlying abuse and neglect case. The Guardian ad Litem appointed for Emily in the preceding guardianship proceeding has appeared on her behalf in the case sub judice, but he has not been formally appointed to represent her in the instant proceeding. Pursuant to W. Va. Code § 49-6-1(a), "[u]pon filing of the petition [alleging a child to be abused and/or neglected], the court . . . shall appoint counsel for the child." Likewise, we have held that "[e]ach child in an abuse and neglect case is entitled to effective representation of counsel." Syl. pt. 5, in part, In re Jeffrey R.L., 190 W. Va. 24, 435 S.E.2d 162 (1993). Despite this requirement that counsel be appointed for the child subject to an abuse and neglect petition, though, no counsel has yet been appointed for Emily in this case.[15] Therefore, on remand, the circuit court is directed to appoint counsel to represent Emily in her abuse and neglect proceedings.

Finally, no counsel has been appointed to represent Emily's biological parents, Sylvia and Carl, in the underlying abuse and neglect proceedings. W. Va. Code § 49-6-2(a) specifically requires, in pertinent part, that, > custodian or other persons standing in loco parentis to him or her shall have the right to be represented by counsel at every stage of the proceedings and shall be informed by the court of their right to be so represented and that if they cannot pay for the services of counsel, that counsel will be appointed. . . . Provided, That such representation shall only continue after the first appearance if the parent or other persons standing in loco parentis cannot pay for the services of counsel. . . .

> [i]n any proceeding under the provisions of this article, the child, his or her parents and his or her legally established

In recognition of this statutory requirement, we similarly have held that > [c]ircuit courts should appoint counsel for parents and custodians required to be named as respondents in abuse and neglect proceedings incident to the filing of each abuse and neglect petition. Upon the appearance of such persons before the court, evidence should be promptly taken, by affidavit and otherwise, to ascertain whether the parties for whom counsel has been appointed are or are not able to pay for counsel. In those cases in which the evidence rebuts the presumption of inability to pay as to one or more of the parents or custodians, the appointment of counsel for any such party should be promptly terminated upon the substitution of other counsel or the knowing, intelligent waiver of the right to counsel. Counsel appointed in these circumstances are entitled to compensation as permitted by law.

Syl. pt. 8, In the Matter of Lindsey C., 196 W. Va. 395, 473 S.E.2d 110 (1995) (emphasis in original). See also Syl. pt. 1, State ex rel. LeMaster v. Oakley, 157 W. Va. 590, 203 S.E.2d 140 (1974) ("In child neglect proceedings which may result in the termination of parental rights to the custody of natural children, indigent parents are entitled to the assistance of counsel because of the requirements of the Due Process clauses of the West Virginia and United States Constitutions."). Even though Sylvia and Carl are entitled to be represented by counsel during Emily's abuse and neglect proceedings, no counsel has been appointed for them. Thus, during the remand proceedings, the circuit court is directed to appoint counsel to represent Sylvia and Carl in accordance with W. Va. Code § 49-6-2(a).

IV.

CONCLUSION

For the foregoing reasons, the September 23, 2008, order of the Circuit Court of Wood County dismissing the abuse and/or neglect petition filed by Donna and John is hereby vacated and the subject petition is reinstated. Furthermore, this case is remanded to the Wood County Circuit Court so that a hearing may be held on the aforementioned abuse and/or neglect petition. Finally, the Circuit Court of Wood County is directed to grant intervenor status to the Wood County Department of Health and Human Resources so that it may participate in the abuse and neglect proceedings on remand and to appoint counsel to represent Emily and her biological parents, Sylvia and Carl, during the remand proceedings.

Per Curiam:

This case is before this Court upon appeal of a final order of the Circuit Court of Mingo County entered on October 28, 2002. Pursuant to that order, the circuit court terminated the parental rights of the appellants and respondents below, Eric C.[1] and Phoebe C., to their children, Erica C., Ashley J., and Oakie Lee C., and further denied the appellants post-termination visitation with their children.

In this appeal, the appellants claim that they established that there was a reasonable likelihood that the conditions of abuse and neglect could be substantially corrected in the near future, and therefore, the circuit court erred by terminating their parental rights. They further contend that the circuit court erred by denying them post-termination visitation with their children based upon events which occurred after the dispositional hearing but prior to entry of the dispositional order.

This Court has before it the petition for appeal, the entire record, and the briefs of counsel. For the reasons set forth below, the circuit court's final order is affirmed.

I.

FACTS

Eric C. is the biological father of Erica C., born on November 21, 2000, and the stepfather of Ashley J., born on May 1, 1995, and Oakie Lee C., born on August 11, 1996. Phoebe C. is the biological mother of all three children. The biological father of Ashley J. and Oakie Lee C. is deceased.

On June 18, 2001, the appellee and petitioner below, the West Virginia Department of Health and Human Services (hereinafter "DHHR"), sought and obtained emergency custody of the children after an incident wherein the appellants were cited for disorderly conduct and public intoxication[2] at a restaurant in Mingo County, West Virginia. At the time of the incident, Erica C. and Ashley J. were found in the appellants' car outside the restaurant next to the road. The vehicle was not running, and the windows were not rolled down. The children had been left in the vehicle at least an hour and perhaps as much as an hour and a half. Oakie Lee C. was not present. He was with his maternal aunt, Loretta C., with whom he had been residing for approximately four years.[3]

[3]Oakie Lee C. was not removed from the physical custody of Loretta C. However, the court did grant the DHHR legal custody of him.

In the emergency petition, the DHHR indicated that it had first received a referral concerning the family on December 15, 2000. At that time, it was alleged that the appellants were neglecting the children and abusing controlled substances. These allegations were never substantiated, and the appellants were not cooperative. They moved several times and failed to take the requested drug screens or participate in the parenting classes offered them.

Based on the above, the children were removed from the appellants' custody and a preliminary hearing was scheduled for June 21, 2001. The preliminary hearing was continued until June 28, 2001, because the appellants were not properly served with the petition for emergency custody.[4] At the time the preliminary hearing was rescheduled, physical custody of all three children was granted to Loretta C., but the DHHR retained legal custody.

At an adjudicatory hearing on July 24, 2001, the court found that the children had been neglected. The appellants were granted a 90-day post-adjudicatory improvement period. The court ordered the DHHR to provide services, including random drug and alcohol screening.

[4]Apparently, Eric C. was incarcerated at this time in Pike County, Kentucky, on a shoplifting charge. Phoebe C. had also been incarcerated, but was released on June 21, 2001.

After several continuances, a dispositional hearing was held on March 26, 2002. The final dispositional order was entered on June 21, 2002. In that order, the circuit court found that the DHHR had established by clear and convincing evidence that there was no reasonable likelihood that the conditions of abuse and neglect could be corrected. Consequently, the appellants' parental rights were terminated. However, the court indicated that this might be a case where post-termination visitation would be appropriate, especially since the children were going to be permanently placed with their maternal aunt, Loretta C. Accordingly, the court ordered that the current visitation schedule continue until further order and review by the court.

A judicial review was conducted on September 18, 2002. At that hearing, the DHHR recommended that the appellants' visitation rights be terminated. The court directed the DHHR to file a written motion and scheduled an evidentiary hearing for October 4, 2002. At that hearing, the court terminated the appellants' visitation with their children. This appeal followed.

As set forth above, the appellants appeal the termination of their parental rights and visitation with their children. "For appeals resulting from abuse and neglect proceedings, such as the case sub judice, we employ a compound standard of review: conclusions of law are subject to a de novo review, while findings of fact are weighed against a clearly erroneous standard." In re Emily, 208 W.Va. 325, 332, 540 S.E.2d 542, 549 (2000). As we explained in Syllabus Point 1 of In the Interest of: Tiffany Marie S., 196 W.Va. 223, 470 S.E.2d 177 (1996),

> Although conclusions of law reached by a circuit court are subject to de novo review, when an action, such as an abuse and neglect case, is tried upon the facts without a jury, the circuit court shall make a determination based upon the evidence and shall make findings of fact and conclusions of law as to whether such child is abused or neglected. These findings shall not be set aside by a reviewing court unless clearly erroneous. A finding is clearly erroneous when, although there is evidence to support the finding, the reviewing court on the entire evidence is left with the definite and firm conviction that a mistake has been committed. However, a reviewing court may not overturn a finding simply because it would have decided the case differently, and it must affirm a finding if the circuit court's account of the evidence is plausible in light of the record viewed in its entirety.

With these standards in mind, we now consider whether the circuit court erred in this case.

III.

DISCUSSION

A. Termination of Parental Rights

The appellants first contend that they were able to show that there was a reasonable likelihood that the conditions of neglect and abuse suffered by their children could be substantially corrected in the near future, and therefore, the circuit court erred by terminating their parental rights. In making this argument, the appellants fail to point to any specific evidence to support their contention. Instead, they emphasize the fact that the children were not physically harmed as a result of being left alone in the car on June 18, 2001. They also say that the court focused on the limited cognitive functioning of Phoebe C. and failed to consider evidence indicating that her mental health problems could be treated.

As set forth above, the circuit court granted the appellants a 90-day post-adjudicatory improvement period. Thereafter, the court conducted the disposition hearing and found that the only alternative in this case was the termination of parental rights. In making that finding, the Court stated that Eric and Phoebe C.

> a) Have previously demonstrated no intention or desire to obtain and provide a clean, safe and stable home for the children and, to this date, does [sic] not have a permanent place of residence which meets with the approval of the Court;
> b) Have abused and/or are addicted to prescription medications and admit that they need more than prescription medication, contrary to their therapists opinions;
> c) Have been unwilling to cooperate in the development of or follow a reasonable family care plan designed to lead to > the children's return to their care, custody and control;

>
> d) At no point throughout the course of these proceedings does it appear that the Respondent parents have made any concerted effort to cooperate in the best interests of their children, or even make the appropriate effort to attend visitation with their children.
> e) Missing a visitation because it is "check day" is simply an unacceptable excuse to give the caseworkers, [Loretta C.], or the Court in this case.[5]

(Footnote added).

In Syllabus Point 4 of In the Matter of Jonathan P., 182 W.Va. 302, 387 S.E.2d 537 (1989), this Court held that:

> "Termination of parental rights, the most drastic remedy under the statutory provision covering the disposition of neglected children, W.Va.Code, 49-6-5 [1977] may be employed without the use of intervening less restrictive alternatives when it is found that there is no reasonable likelihood under W.Va.Code, 49-6-5(b) [1977] that conditions of neglect or abuse can be substantially corrected." Syllabus Point 2, In re R.J.M., 164 W.Va. 496, 266 S.E.2d 114 (1980).

This Court has further stated that:

> "[C]ourts are not required to exhaust every speculative possibility of parental improvement before terminating parental rights where it appears that the welfare of the child will be seriously threatened . . . ." Syl. Pt. 1, in part, In re R.J.M., 164 W.Va. 496, 266 S.E.2d 114 (1980).

[5]Phoebe C. receives social security benefits, and the court is referring here to an instance when the appellants explained their absence at a scheduled visitation with their children by stating that it was "check day."

Syllabus Point 7, in part, In re Carlita B., 185 W.Va. 613, 408 S.E.2d 365 (1991). Based upon the above, as well as our review of the entire record in this case, it is clear that the appellants failed to present any evidence to show that there was a reasonable likelihood that the conditions of abuse and neglect suffered by their children could be substantially corrected in the near future.

These children were found to be neglected because the appellants abused prescription medications, had a history of domestic violence, and failed to provide the children with necessary supervision and care. In addition, they effectively abandoned Oakie Lee C. by leaving him with his maternal aunt since he was six months old. It was only after these proceedings began that the appellants sought to remove Oakie Lee from Loretta C.'s home. Although they were granted an improvement period, the appellants made no serious effort to change their behavior or provide a stable home for their children. The DHHR made several attempts to help the appellants regain custody of their children, but the appellants refused to cooperate and continued to abuse prescription drugs. Accordingly, the circuit court did not err in terminating the appellants' parental rights.

B. Termination of Visitation

The appellants also claim that the circuit court erred by terminating their post-termination visitation with their children based upon events that occurred after the dispositional hearing, but before the final dispositional order was entered. Those events included the appellants missing two of five scheduled visits in April 2002. During the visits that did occur that month, the children did not recognize the appellants as their parents. Also, in April 2002, the appellants failed to submit to a random drug screen. In May 2002, the appellants separated and began visiting the children individually, which caused the children to become confused. Phoebe C. missed two visits in May 2002, and Eric C. had problems keeping all the children occupied at one time during his visits.

In Syllabus Point 5 of In re Christina L., 194 W.Va. 446, 460 S.E.2d 692 (1995), this Court held that:

> When parental rights are terminated due to neglect or abuse, the circuit court may nevertheless in appropriate cases consider whether continued visitation or other contact with the abusing parent is in the best interest of the child. Among other things, the circuit court should consider whether a close emotional bond has been established between parent and child and the child's wishes, if he or she is of appropriate maturity to make such request. The evidence must indicate that such visitation or continued contact would not be detrimental to the child's well being and would be in the child's best interest.

As previously noted, the circuit court initially believed that continued contact between the appellants and their children would be appropriate in this case. However, following the failure of a strong effort to effect post-termination visitation by the DHHR and after a judicial review and hearing, the court determined that continued visitation was no longer in the children's best interest.

In this appeal, the appellants seek to reverse the court's decision terminating their visitation based on a procedural error, i.e., the court's failure to enter the dispositional order in a timely manner.[6] While the court should have entered the order in a timely fashion,[7] we are unable to conclude that the appellants were prejudiced by the late entry as they were allowed to continue to visit their children during that time. More importantly, "a mere procedural technicality does not take precedence over the best interests of the children." In re: Tyler D., 213 W.Va. 149, —, 578 S.E.2d 343, 354 (2003). As this Court has said on numerous occasions, "the best interests of the child is the polar star by which decisions must be made which affect children." Michael K.T. v. Tina L.T., 182 W.Va. 399, 405, 387 S.E.2d 866, 872 (1989). See also Syllabus Point 1, State ex rel. Cash v. Lively, 155 W.Va. 801, 187 S.E.2d 601 (1972) ("'In a contest involving the custody of an infant the welfare of the child is the polar star by which the discretion of the court will be guided.' Point 2, Syllabus, State ex rel. Lipscomb v. Joplin, 131 W.Va. 302 [47 S.E.2d 221].").

[6]Pursuant to Rule 38 of the Rules of Procedure for Abuse and Neglect Proceedings, "[w]ithin ten (10) days of the conclusion of the [disposition] hearing, the court shall enter a final disposition order[.]"

[7]Almost three months elapsed between the dispositional hearing and entry of the dispositional order in this case. Such a delay is unconscionable, unacceptable, and unfair to the children. This Court has often stressed the necessity for rapid finality in abuse and neglect proceedings. Specifically, we have mandated that, "Child abuse and neglect cases must be recognized as being among the highest priority for the courts' attention. Unjustified procedural delays wreak havoc on a child's development, stability and security." Syllabus Point 1, in part, In the Interest of Carlita B. In accordance with that directive, this Court adopted the Rules of Procedure for Child Abuse and Neglect Proceedings in 1996 to ensure that abuse and neglect cases are resolved in the most expeditious manner possible. See Rule 2 ("These rules are designed . . . [t]o reduce unnecessary delays in court proceedings through strengthened court case management."). With that said, we hereby advise all circuit judges that in the future unnecessary delays in abuse and neglect proceedings will be examined very closely, and this Court will take whatever action is required to guarantee the efficient and timely disposition of abuse and neglect cases.

In this case, it is now clear that continued visitation would be detrimental to the children. While the conduct of the appellants in April and May of 2002 was not satisfactory, their actions in August and September of 2002 were even more egregious. They were arrested on August 16, 2002, for domestic assault and domestic battery of each other. Also, on August 20, 2002, both appellants had positive drug screens for the drug Butalbital. Although Phoebe C. was able to produce a valid prescription to explain her positive drug screen, Eric C. was not. Finally, on September 2, 2002, Phoebe C. was arrested for two counts of destruction of property. She was under the influence of alcohol at the time of her arrest.

In sum, there was a considerable amount of evidence presented to the circuit court showing that the appellants continue to abuse prescription drugs and have significant family and other legal problems. Their relationship with each other is at best unstable and domestic violence between them is a frequent occurrence. In addition, the record indicates that the children no longer wish to have contact with the appellants. Consequently, continued visitation would not be in the children's best interest. Thus, the circuit court did not err by terminating the appellants' visitation with their children.

IV.

CONCLUSION

Accordingly, for the reasons set forth above, the final order of the Circuit Court of Mingo County entered on October 28, 2002, is affirmed.

Affirmed.

Per Curiam:

This is an appeal filed on behalf of F.S. and Z.S.[1] by their guardian ad litem, Reggie R. Bailey (hereinafter referred to collectively as "the petitioners"), from a decision of the Circuit Court of Wood County dismissing a petition for abuse and neglect against their father, C.S. (hereinafter "the respondent" or "the father"). The underlying abuse and neglect petition was based upon allegations of sexual abuse by the father against F.S. The petitioners contend that the circuit court erred by failing to find that clear and convincing evidence of sexual abuse was presented. Based upon this Court's thorough review of the appendix record, arguments of counsel, and applicable precedent, we reverse the ruling of the circuit court and remand this case for further proceedings consistent with this opinion.

I. Factual and Procedural History

On May 23, 2012, the Department of Health and Human Resources (hereinafter "DHHR") filed a petition for abuse and neglect, alleging that the respondent father had repeatedly sexually abused and assaulted F.S.[2] The petition asserted that the children had visited their father every other weekend subsequent to a 2006 divorce between the petitioners' parents. The father had remarried in 2009, and his current wife, L.S., has two daughters and one son. The three step-children also resided in the home when the petitioners visited. The petitioner, F.S., typically slept in a bedroom with L.S's daughters, sharing a top bunk with a step-sister.[3] Another step-sister slept in the bottom bunk in the same bedroom. The petitioner, Z.S. shared a bedroom with L.S.'s son.

The DHHR first learned of the alleged sexual abuse of F.S. in July 2011. The petitioners' mother, M.S. (hereinafter "the mother"), reported that F.S. said the respondent father had performed sexual acts on her. She was eight years old at the time of that report. Specifically, the mother indicated that F.S. stated that her father would get in bed with her and "rub his wiener on her and pee on her."[4] In response to these allegations of abuse, Child Protective Services worker, Ms. Connie Carpenter, interviewed F.S. in August 2011. The child informed Ms. Carpenter that her father got in bed with her on several occasions and "wet" on her with his penis.[5]

[3]The step-sisters do not report any knowledge of the respondent entering the bedroom.

Detective Shanna Modesitt of the Wood County Sheriff's Office also interviewed[6] F.S. in August 2011. F.S. told the detective that her father "wets" on her when he gets in bed with her. During adjudicatory hearings held in late 2012 and 2013, the circuit court reviewed a video recording of the child's interview with Detective Modesitt. According to the transcript of that video interview provided in the record to this Court, F.S. specifically informed Detective Modesitt that her father has gotten in bed with her several times when other family members were not home. She indicated that he placed his penis on [4]A detailed recital of the graphic sexual allegations of this case is necessary because of the nature of the circuit court's order this Court is called upon to review. Our task is to determine whether, upon the facts available to it at the adjudicatory hearing, the circuit court erred in dismissing the petition for abuse and neglect filed against the father.

her legs and vaginal area, that it made "squishy noises," and that it felt "sticky."[7] The child also indicated that she sometimes slept on the bottom bunk if her step-sister was not at home.

She stated that her father pulled her pants down to her ankles and lifted her shirt to touch her chest. She believed that the last of these incidents occurred when she was in third grade, and she no longer had contact with her father by the time of the interview with Detective Modesitt.

During the adjudicatory hearings, the respondent testified and denied any sexual abuse of his daughter. He explained that the version of the alleged occurrences presented by F.S. lacked credibility because he could not have accessed her on the top bunk without awakening his step-daughters who also slept in the room. He also testified that he sleeps downstairs and other children were always present when F.S. was visiting. Although [7]F.S. stated that her father "unzips and sometimes he wets on me." She said, "I pretend to go to the bathroom and I wipe it off." She also informed Detective Modesitt that it "smells disgusting." She stated that "he'll sometimes just unzip . . . and he'll sometimes pull down his underwear or he sometimes has a hole in his underwear." She indicated that "he just comes against me and stuff. He'll just grab it out and kind of pull it and kind of just rub it around me and rub it like right here . . ." on her vagina and buttocks. She explained that she had tried to scoot away from him in bed, but "[e]very time I try to scoot over he'll keep on scooting until I can't move anymore." She also stated that he sometimes placed his penis slightly into her vagina.

he acknowledged his failure[8] of a polygraph test, he alleged that the failure resulted from some "changed" questions by the administrator of the test.[9]

A clinical psychologist, Mary Longmore Gable, testified that she had conducted approximately thirty-five sessions of therapy with F.S. Ms. Gable explained that F.S. reported several issues regarding her father's sexual conduct toward her,[10] informing Ms. Gable that her father lingered near her private areas while bathing and drying her. F.S. also informed Ms. Gable that her father pulled down his "boy private parts" and would begin "rubbing them on top of her." F.S. reported specific details about how her legs were spread, how her father would unzip his pants, and how his penis felt "squishy like a blob of jelly." Ms. Gable also explained that F.S. told her that she sometimes pretended to be sleeping, in

[9]During questioning regarding the father's failure of the polygraph test, the mother's attorney asked the respondent: "Well, did he rephrase questions, or - - I don't understand what you mean. Could you give an example." The respondent explained that "[i]t's been quite some time. I'd have to recall that information. If you would give me a few minutes, Mr. White. I just remember that the - - the question was different." The mother's attorney then inquired regarding whether the test administrator asked "you a question twice, one phrased differently than another?" The respondent replied, "I'm not sure. I just know it was different."

[10]Prior to starting therapy with Ms. Gable, F.S. had refused to speak of the abuse when interviewed by Magistrate Joyce Purkey and her assistant in conjunction with the mother's attempt to obtain a protective order against the respondent. At that time, F.S. denied any inappropriate acts by her father. The child also failed to make any disclosure of abuse to her brother's family therapist, Jennifer Cozart. She later explained to Detective Modesitt that she had refused to talk about the abuse when there was more than one other person present.

an effort to reduce the likelihood that her father would touch her. Ms. Gable testified that she believed F.S. had been sexually abused based on the consistency of the child's statements, the sensory details of the sexual events, her child-appropriate language, and the emotions she expressed concerning the alleged occurrences. Ms. Gable additionally noted that she had not detected any "red flags" indicating the F.S. had been coached or was fabricating the claims of sexual abuse.[11]

Dr. Fred J. Krieg, a forensic psychologist, was called by the respondent. Although Dr. Krieg had not personally interviewed F.S., he had reviewed all the records of her allegations and testified that he was unable to "say whether or not [the child] was sexually abused or not." In his review of F.S.'s revelations to Detective Modesitt, he found some indication that the child was attempting to determine whether her answers were pleasing to the interviewer and that she seemed susceptible to suggestibility.[12] Dr. Krieg also noted that there was no physical evidence of abuse and that the child had refused to discuss

[11]Ms. Gable acknowledged F.S.'s reluctance to talk about the sexual abuse, testifying that the child did not initially "want to talk about it with me because she was afraid I wouldn't be her friend anymore." Ms. Gable explained that such reactions were common with children. Consistent with this emotional reaction, the child also informed Detective Modesitt that she "would only talk . . . if there's not two people."

[12]Dr. Krieg referenced F.S.'s statement at the conclusion of the interview with Detective Modesitt. F.S. was asked whether there was anything else she wanted to talk about with the detective, and she responded by saying, "It's hard to think of something unless because if you say it first and I'll remember what to say." Dr Krieg opined that this could be a "sign that somebody outside has said, 'These are the things you need to say.'" the abuse when questioned in her father's criminal trial and with one of the therapists, Ms. Cozart.

On August 2, 2013, the circuit court dismissed the petition for abuse and neglect, finding that the facts presented did not constitute clear and convincing evidence of abuse by the respondent. In so ruling, the circuit court found inconsistencies in F.S.'s allegations, such as the fact that she indicated she was always asleep throughout these occurrences and said that she did not actually see her father performing the acts.[13] Moreover, the circuit court emphasized the fact that F.S. had refused to speak of the abuse and denied anything inappropriate when interviewed by Magistrate Joyce Purkey and made no disclosure of abuse to her brother's therapist, Ms. Cozart. F.S. further refused to discuss the abuse at the respondent's criminal trial in April 2013, and he was consequently acquitted.[14]

The circuit court also noted inconsistencies in the mother's statements with respect to how and when she learned of the alleged abuse. The mother had informed Ms.

[13]Although F.S. stated, during parts of the interview with Detective Modesitt, that she did not see her father performing these sexual acts, she did describe seeing him standing in her room and lying down beside her when these sexual incidents occurred. F.S. also indicated that she sometimes pretended to be asleep in an attempt to prevent the inappropriate touching.

[14]As this Court recognized in In re Taylor B., 201 W.Va. 60, 491 S.E.2d 607 (1997), acquittal of criminal charges has no bearing on abuse and neglect cases. "[C]ivil abuse and neglect proceedings focus directly upon the safety and well-being of the child and are not simply 'companion cases' to criminal prosecutions." Id. at 66, 491 S.E.2d at 613.

Carpenter and Ms. Cozart that her son, Z.S., told her of the abuse toward F.S. However, she told Detective Modesitt that F.S. made the original revelations of abuse. The circuit court also noted that the mother maintained a significant grudge against the father[15] and had exaggerated the effects of the alleged abuse when discussing difficulties in F.S.'s school performance. The principal of the school F.S. attended indicated that F.S. was progressing well in school and had not experienced any behavioral problems.

In addressing the testimony of the psychologist, Ms. Gable, the circuit court observed that she was not a forensic psychologist and had accepted F.S.'s statements as true, without any independent investigation of her credibility or other indicia of reliability of her claims. This Court's review of the record reveals that Ms. Gable was initially unaware of F.S.'s refusal to speak about the abuse to certain other individuals. The respondent's counsel questioned Ms. Gable during the adjudicatory hearing and informed her that the child had sometimes refused to speak of the abuse. Upon learning this, Ms. Gable clearly indicated that such knowledge would not necessarily alter her conclusion that F.S. had been abused. Ms. Gable explained that "it would depend on the change in consistency" and that she would still look "at the emotional response, the language, and all of those things in combination."

[15]The mother had made an allegation of sexual misconduct by the father in 2006. At that time, the mother had apparently indicated that the father had spent too much time bathing the child's private areas. That claim was found to be unsubstantiated and was not extensively developed in the record currently before this Court. The allegations which form the basis for the present issue occurred subsequent to that initial allegation.

Ms. Gable stated that F.S. "has too much that is consistent with children that are sexually abused."

The petitioners appeal the circuit court's adjudicatory order, contending that the circuit court erred in dismissing the petition for abuse and neglect. The petitioners argue that the facts presented constitute clear and convincing evidence of sexual abuse.

II. Standard of Review

This case is before this Court on appeal from the circuit court's order dismissing the abuse and neglect petition and finding that the facts presented did not constitute clear and convincing evidence of sexual abuse. Generally, this Court accords plenary review to a circuit court's resolution of questions of law, while factual determinations made by the circuit court are reversible only if clearly erroneous. In In re Emily, 208 W.Va. 325, 540 S.E.2d 542 (2000), this Court explained: "For appeals resulting from abuse and neglect proceedings, such as the case sub judice, we employ a compound standard of review: conclusions of law are subject to a de novo review, while findings of fact are weighed against a clearly erroneous standard." Id. at 332, 540 S.E.2d at 549. The concept of mixed questions of law and fact was addressed in Burnside v. Burnside, 194 W.Va. 263, 460 S.E.2d 264 (1995), and this Court explained that "[a]lthough factual findings are reviewed under the clearly erroneous standard, mixed questions of law and fact that require the consideration of legal concepts and involve the exercise of judgment about the values underlying legal principles are reviewed de novo." Id. at 265, 460 S.E.2d at 266.

These standards were also expressed in syllabus point one of In re Tiffany Marie S., 196 W.Va. 223, 470 S.E.2d 177 (1996):

> Although conclusions of law reached by a circuit court are subject to de novo review, when an action, such as an abuse and neglect case, is tried upon the facts without a jury, the circuit court shall make a determination based upon the evidence and shall make findings of fact and conclusions of law as to whether such child is abused or neglected. These findings shall not be set aside by a reviewing court unless clearly erroneous. A finding is clearly erroneous when, although there is evidence to support the finding, the reviewing court on the entire evidence is left with the definite and firm conviction that a mistake has been committed. However, a reviewing court may not overturn a finding simply because it would have decided the case differently, and it must affirm a finding if the circuit court's account of the evidence is plausible in light of the record viewed in its entirety.

See also In re Samaria S., 347 S.W.3d 188, 200 (Tenn. Ct. App. 2011) ("Under this standard of proof, the appellate court must distinguish between the specific facts found by the trial court and the combined weight of those facts." (internal quotes and citations omitted)). This Court has also recognized that credibility determinations are uniquely within the province of a circuit court. This Court explained this concept in Tiffany Marie S., as follows:

> [w]hen findings are based on determinations regarding the credibility of witnesses, Rule 52(a) [of the West Virginia Rules of Civil Procedure] demands even greater deference to the trial court's findings[.] . . . Deference is appropriate because the > trial judge was on the spot and is better able than an appellate court to decide whether the error affected substantial rights of the parties.

196 W.Va. at 231, 470 S.E.2d at 185 (internal quotations and citations omitted). Guided by those standards of review, we address the petitioners' assignment of error.

III. Discussion

This Court has consistently recognized that a parent's right to the care and custody of his child is a firmly established liberty interest protected by the due process clauses of the federal and state constitutions. Troxel v. Granville, 530 U.S. 57, 65 (2000); In re Jeffrey R.L., 190 W.Va. 24, 32, 435 S.E.2d 162, 170 (1993). This Court in Jeffrey R.L. acknowledged the manner in which child abuse and neglect cases are addressed, specifically in conjunction with observance of the fundamental rights of a parent to the care and custody of his child.

> In the Court's analysis of child abuse and neglect cases, we must take into consideration the rights and interests of all of the parties in reaching an ultimate resolution of the issues before us. Although the rights of the natural parents to the custody of their child and the interests of the State as parens patriae merit significant consideration by this Court, the best interests of the child are paramount. Thus, as an initial matter, we emphasize that the health, safety, and welfare of [the child] must be our primary concern in analyzing the facts and issues before us.

As this Court stated in syllabus point three of In re Katie S., 198 W.Va. 79, 479 S.E.2d 589 (1996), "[a]lthough parents have substantial rights that must be protected, the primary goal in cases involving abuse and neglect, as in all family law matters, must be the health and welfare of the children." Thus, while a parent's right is fundamental, it is certainly not absolute. A parent's right may be limited or ultimately terminated where it is relinquished, abandoned, or where the parent has engaged in conduct requiring restriction of parental rights.

A petition for abuse and neglect[16] may be filed in this state under the provisions of West Virginia Code § 49-6-2 (2009). That statute enunciates the manner of evaluation of such a case and directs the circuit court to make certain findings subsequent to an adjudicatory hearing, as follows:

> At the conclusion of the adjudicatory hearing, the court shall make a determination based upon the evidence and shall make findings of fact and conclusions of law as to whether such child is abused or neglected. . . . The findings must be based upon conditions existing at the time of the filing of the petition and proven by clear and convincing evidence.

W.Va. Code § 49-6-2(c). In syllabus point three of In re Christina L., 194 W.Va. 446, 460 S.E.2d 692 (1995), this Court addressed this statute and observed:

> "'"W. Va. Code, 49-6-2(c) [1980], requires the State Department of Welfare [now the Department of Human

[16]An "[a]bused child" is defined in West Virginia Code § 49-1-3(a) (2009) as a "child whose health or welfare is harmed or threatened by . . . [s]exual abuse or sexual exploitation[.]"

> Services], in a child abuse or neglect case, to prove 'conditions existing at the time of the filing of the petition . . . by clear and convincing proof.' The statute, however, does not specify any particular manner or mode of testimony or evidence by which the State Department of Welfare is obligated to meet this burden." Syllabus Point 1, In Interest of S.C., 168 W.Va. 366, 284 S.E.2d 867 (1981).' Syllabus Point 1, West Virginia Department of Human Services v. Peggy F., 184 W.Va. 60, 399 S.E.2d 460 (1990)." Syllabus Point 1, In re Beth, 192 W.Va. 656, 453 S.E.2d 639 (1994).

In this Court's appellate review of the dismissal of petitions for abuse and neglect, we have evaluated the dispositive issue of whether clear and convincing evidence of abuse was established. For example, in In re Tyler D., 213 W.Va. 149, 578 S.E.2d 343 (2003), the DHHR and the children's guardian ad litem appealed an order of the circuit court dismissing the petition for abuse and neglect. Upon review of the facts presented, this Court reversed the circuit court and found "clear and convincing evidence that Tyler D. was sexually abused." Id. at 156, 578 S.E.2d at 350. We reasoned as follows:

> While there was no physical evidence, three witnesses testified that Tyler D's reports of sexual abuse were credible. In particular, Mr. Mayfield, Tyler's psychotherapist, testified that he believed that Tyler was telling the truth about being sexually abused based upon the language he used, the consistency in his statements, and the details he provided. Likewise, Beverly Green, a child protective services investigator with the Allegheny County Department of Social Services in Maryland, testified that the consistency in Tyler's statements about the sexual abuse indicated that he was being truthful. Finally, Glenda Razo, a case manager for child abuse and neglect in Fort > Knox, Kentucky, testified that Tyler's allegations of sexual abuse were credible. All three witnesses indicated that they have considerable experience in dealing with sexually abused children. This evidence cannot simply be ignored.

Id. at 156-57, 578 S.E.2d at 350-51. "Thus, given all of the above, we find that the circuit court erred by concluding that there was no clear and convincing evidence that these children were abused and neglected." Id. at 157, 578 S.E.2d at 351.

Similarly, this Court reversed a circuit court's dismissal of an abuse and neglect petition in In re Katelyn T., 225 W.Va. 264, 692 S.E.2d 307 (2010). In that case, the guardian ad litem and DHHR appealed the circuit court's dismissal of an abuse and neglect petition alleging sexual abuse, and this Court found that the evidence presented below constituted clear and convincing evidence of the abuse. Id. at 278, 692 S.E.2d at 321.

In the present case, although there was no physical evidence of abuse, F.S.'s testimony, presented to the circuit court through the video recording of her interview with Detective Modesitt, provided explicit evidence of multiple episodes of sexual abuse. The child's statements to Ms. Carpenter and Ms. Gable also detailed the sexual abuse she suffered. Significantly, the circuit court did not find that F.S. fabricated the claims of sexual abuse. It appears that the circuit court dismissed the petition based upon particular elements of doubt or components of uncertainty revealed within F.S.'s testimony. For instance, the child referenced "sleeping" during the sexual abuse and stated, in at least one portion of her questioning, that she did not "see" her father performing these acts. While these issues were quite reasonably included in the court's evaluation of the evidence and the child's credibility, those instances cannot be viewed in isolation from the extensive other evidence of sexual abuse. The child's testimony also revealed instances where she observed her father during the occurrences and was awake and aware of his actions.[17]

[17]Likewise, the child's self-imposed rule of refusal to speak of the abuse where more than one person was present must be evaluated in terms of her age and maturity. The psychologist, Ms. Gable, testified that such emotional responses are common in children. While perhaps unconventional, these issues do not entirely undermine the child's credibility. In State v. Edward Charles L., 183 W.Va. 641, 398 S.E.2d 123 (1990), this Court explained that cases involving child victims > generally pit the child's credibility against an adult's credibility and often times an adult family member's credibility. Since sexual abuse committed against children is such an aberrant behavior, most people find it easier to dismiss the child's testimony as being coached or made up or conclude that any touching of a child's private parts by an adult must have been by accident. In addition, children often have greater difficulty than adults in establishing precise dates of incidents of sexual abuse, not only because small children don't possess the same grasp of time as adults, but because they obviously may not report acts of sexual abuse promptly, either because they are abused by a primary care-taker and authority figure and are therefore unaware such conduct is wrong, or because of threats of physical harm by one in almost total control of their life. In most cases of sexual abuse against children by a care-taker or relative, the acts of sexual abuse transpire over a substantial period of time, often several years.

Id. at 650-51, 398 S.E.2d 132-33 (footnote omitted).

Another element of uncertainty was created by the testimony of Dr. Krieg, indicating that he had discerned signs of suggestibility in the child during his review of the evidence. It is significant to note that Dr. Krieg never spoke directly with F.S.; nor did he testify that she had fabricated the sexual abuse allegations. He concluded, "My testimony is that in reviewing the documentation that led to this charge, that I don't find reliable evidence in the information to be able to tell us whether or not that child was sexually abused." Those individuals to whom F.S. spoke directly, however, painted a vastly different picture. Ms. Gable, Ms. Carpenter, and Detective Modesitt testified concerning the child's assertions and the distinct graphic sensory details she provided, as set forth above. Ms. Gable testified that F.S.'s language and emotional states were consistent with a child who has been sexually abused. Further, Ms. Gable found no signs that F.S. was lying or had been coached. Ms. Gable stated, "A few details may change, but overall the story does not."

This is a classic case of the inability of a trial court to ascertain, with complete certainty, the truth of the allegations of abuse. As indicated by the circuit court's adjudicatory order, one could quite effortlessly compile an inventory of doubts and skepticism based upon the evidence presented. The evidence is simply not crystal clear, beyond all doubt. However, that is not the standard to be employed in an abuse and neglect case. In reviewing the entirety of the evidence, this Court must adhere to the appellate standard of review set forth above, according significant weight to the circuit court's credibility determinations while refusing to abdicate our responsibility to evaluate the evidence and determine whether an error has been committed.

It is imperative to note that the evidence in an abuse and neglect case does not have to satisfy the stringent standard of beyond a reasonable doubt; the evidence must establish abuse by clear and convincing evidence. This Court has explained that "'clear and convincing' is the measure or degree of proof that will produce in the mind of the factfinder a firm belief or conviction as to the allegations sought to be established." Brown v. Gobble, 196 W.Va. 559, 564, 474 S.E.2d 489, 494 (1996) (internal citations omitted). We have also stated that the clear and convincing standard is "intermediate, being more than a mere preponderance, but not to the extent of such certainty as is required beyond a reasonable doubt as in criminal cases." Cramer v. W. Va. Dept. of Highways, 180 W.Va. 97, 99 n.1, 375 S.E.2d 568, 570 n.1 (1988); see also Colorado v. New Mexico, 467 U.S. 310, 316 (1984) (holding that party with burden of persuasion may prevail only if he can "place in the ultimate factfinder an abiding conviction that the truth of [his] factual contentions are 'highly probable.'").

Reviewing the facts presented in the adjudicatory hearing to determine whether they constituted clear and convincing evidence of abuse and employing the standards set forth in Tiffany Marie S., this Court is "left with the definite and firm conviction that a mistake has been committed." Syl. Pt. 1, in part, Tiffany Marie S., 196 W.Va. at 224, 470 S.E.2d at 178. We find that the evidence presented below constitutes clear and convincing evidence of sexual abuse by the respondent. Utilizing child-appropriate language and reiterating the sexually explicit details during multiple interviews, F.S. explained episodes during which her father got in bed with her, rubbed himself against her legs and vaginal area, and wet on her. She described the multitude of sensory aspects of those experiences, in vivid detail. These claims were investigated by the DHHR and the Wood County Sheriff's Office and discussed through the therapy of Ms. Gable. Based upon all the evidence presented on these allegations, we conclude that the circuit court erred in dismissing the petition and finding lack of clear and convincing evidence that the respondent abused his daughter.[18]

[18]Having determined that the facts support a finding that clear and convincing evidence of abuse was presented, the petitioners should be adjudicated as abused children. In the abuse and neglect setting, this Court has recognized the rights of children residing in the home, such the respondent's son, Z.S., even where he was not alleged to have been a victim. In syllabus point two of Christina L., this Court explained:

> Where there is clear and convincing evidence that a child has suffered physical and/or sexual abuse while in the custody of his or her parent(s), guardian, or custodian, another child residing in the home when the abuse took place who is not a direct victim of the physical and/or sexual abuse but is at risk of being abused is an abused child under W.Va. Code, 49-1-3(a) (1994).

IV. Conclusion

For the foregoing reasons, the order of the Circuit Court of Wood County dismissing the petition for abuse and neglect is reversed.[19] Accordingly, this case is

> Pursuant to W. Va. Code § 48-9-401 (2001) (Repl. Vol. 2009), a decision on a motion for modification of custody requires a determination of whether there has been a substantial change in the circumstances of the child or of one or both parents and whether a modification is necessary to serve the best interests of the child, obviously a completely different standard than a finding of abuse and neglect. The allegations of abuse and neglect certainly constituted a change in circumstances, and there were several other factors that indicated that it would be in C.C.'s best interests to be placed in the custody of his mother. Therefore, regardless of the outcome of the abuse and neglect case, it seems that the circumstances probably warranted a modification of custody pursuant to W. Va. Code § 48-9-401.

remanded to the circuit court for entry of an order adjudicating F.S. and Z.S. as abused children based upon the sexual abuse perpetrated upon F.S. by the respondent and for further proceedings consistent with this opinion.[20] The mandate of this Court shall issue contemporaneously herewith.

Reversed and Remanded.

[20]This matter should be expedited. "Child abuse and neglect cases must be recognized as being among the highest priority for the courts' attention. Unjustified procedural delays wreak havoc on a child's development, stability and security." Syl. Pt. 1, in part, In re Carlita B., 185 W.Va. 613, 408 S.E.2d 365 (1991). As the case proceeds in the dispositional phase, this Court does not in any manner limit the discretion of the circuit court as provided by statute; nor do we suggest any particular result. However, in the event the circuit court elects to consider an order of visitation, the court must remain mindful of the principles expressed in syllabus point three of Carter v. Carter, 196 W.Va. 239, 470 S.E.2d 193 (1996), as follows:

> Because of the extraordinary nature of supervised visitation, such visitation should be ordered when necessary to protect the best interests of the children. In determining the best interests of the children when there are allegations of sexual or child abuse, the circuit court should weigh the risk of harm of supervised visitation or the deprivation of any visitation to the parent who allegedly committed the abuse if the allegations are false against the risk of harm of unsupervised visitation to the child if the allegations are true.

SYLLABUS BY THE COURT

1. "Although conclusions of law reached by a circuit court are subject to de novo review, when an action, such as an abuse and neglect case, is tried upon the facts without a jury, the circuit court shall make a determination based upon the evidence and shall make findings of fact and conclusions of law as to whether such child is abused or neglected. Per Curiam:

This case is before this Court upon appeal of a final order of the Circuit Court of Kanawha County entered on July 30, 2009, which granted a six-month dispositional improvement period to the appellee and respondent below, Sarah S.[1] in this abuse and neglect proceeding. In this appeal, the guardian ad litem for the children, Faith C., Sophia S., and Madelyn S.,[2] contends that the circuit court erred by granting the improvement period and not terminating Sarah S.'s parental rights. This Court has before it the petition for appeal, the entire record, and the briefs and argument of counsel. For the reasons set forth below, the order of the circuit court is affirmed, and this case is remanded to the circuit court with directions regarding the improvement period as set forth herein.[3]

I.

FACTS

On September 15, 2008, the West Virginia Department of Health and Human Resources (hereinafter "DHHR") filed an abuse and neglect petition alleging that Faith, Sophia, and Madelyn were abused and/or neglected by their parents. Sarah S. is the mother of all three children. Teddy C. is the father of Faith, and Benjamin S. is the father of Sophia and Madelyn.[4] In particular, the DHHR asserted that on September 12, 2008, Sophia, who was twenty-two months old, received second-degree burns to her legs and feet as a result of an intentional immersion in scalding water at her home. The DHHR maintained that the perpetrator of the alleged abuse was Sarah S., as there was no dispute that Benjamin S. was not at the residence at the time of the incident.[5] The only people present in the home at that time were Sophia, Madelyn, and Sarah S.[6]

As a result of her severe injuries, Sophia was first transported by helicopter to the Burn Center at Cabell Huntington Hospital in Huntington, West Virginia, and then transferred to the Nationwide Children's Hospital in Columbus, Ohio, a few days later. After prolonged treatment which included surgery, Sophia's wounds healed. Although the police responded to the residence at the time of the incident,[7] no criminal charges were filed against Sarah S. She claimed that Sophia had climbed up onto the bathroom sink, turned on the hot water, and burned herself instantaneously. Sarah S. stated that she was outside of the family residence talking on a cell phone when the incident occurred.[8] She said she heard a child screaming and did not immediately respond because she thought the screams were coming from her youngest daughter, Madelyn, who needed a nap. When she did go into the residence, she said she found Sophia on top of the bathroom vanity already severely burned.

During the abuse and neglect proceedings below, the DHHR presented testimony from two experts, Eduardo Pino, M.D., and David Henchman, M.D., both doctors at the Burn Center at Cabell Huntington Hospital. They testified that the nature of Sophia's burns indicated that she had been immersed and held down in scalding water. According to these doctors, no other explanation of the child's injuries could be consistent with the type of burns she sustained. Specifically, Drs. Pino and Henchman testified that the "glove and stocking" circumferential burns encompassing the entire area around the child's legs could only lead to the singular conclusion that the child had been immersed in scalding water and held down. Dr. Pino opined that this was a "classic" example of an immersion burn. During his testimony, Dr. Pino stated:

> The nature of the burns being circumferential, particularly higher or one side then [sic] on the other, really to me signifies that this child was more or less dumped into hot water.
>
> . . . I don't know what the water temperature of the sink was. But the fact that both extremities are burned, nobody steps into a bathtub or sink or whatever, with both feet at the same time.
> The fact that it's circumferential means that it was just an immersion, just going like this. Certainly one foot versus the other is that one foot was probably picked up and so that's why it only burned to one leg, and the other one burned further down.

Similarly, Dr. Henchman testified that he could not imagine any other scenario to explain Sophia's injuries other than someone just holding her down in the water. He testified:

> I can't imagine another scenario that would give that result. I would think that anytime a child or anyone's foot touched hot water that much, instinctively pull it away. To put both feet inside up to the calf in scalding water, I can't imagine another scenario.

The DHHR also submitted into evidence a medical report from the Nationwide Children's Hospital which included the following statement from Gail E. Besner, M.D., the attending physician:

> Child Assessment Team was consulted and evaluation revealed bilateral circumferential burns to both feet extending to the mid calf on the right and to the ankle on the left (i.e. in an asymmetric stocking distribution). The mechanism of production of these burns was immersion into a scalding hot > liquid. Child Assessment Team consultant indicated this pattern of burn injury was frequently inflicted. The patient also had an unexplained long linear bruise to the right thigh, which added concern for physical abuse . . . Child Assessment Team agreed with the filing of a report of suspected physical abuse to Children's Services.

In contrast to the evidence presented by the DHHR, Sarah S. offered the testimony of Gregory Porter, P.A., who indicated that he had participated in approximately twenty-five water submersion cases. Mr. Porter was qualified as an expert in emergency medicine, primary health care, and emergency medicine for children. Mr. Porter opined that Sophia's injuries were accidentally self-inflicted. He testified as follows in response to questions from counsel for Sarah S.:

> Q: Is a stocking glove appearance the only thing that you look at when you are trying to determine if one has had an immersion burn or not?
> A: Absolutely not.
>
> Q: What is a stocking glove appearance to a burn?
>
> A: Stocking glove, I mean if you think about it, has [sic] a female wearing knee highs, that sort of thing. Stocking glove usually refers to that. It is very, you know, clear from the foot all the way up to a level. It is sort of like a stocking.
>
>
> Q: But would that be dispositive that it's an immersion burn or would it be a possibility?
>
> A: It rises the–raises the suspicion for immersion burn.

Mr. Porter explained that in addition to the appearance of the burn, the depth of the burn had to be considered. He stated:

Q: Okay. Is there anything about them, the depth of an immersion burn that is important?

A: Absolutely.

Q: What is that?

A: During my research of the case, I think that's the most striking piece of evidence. If you are immersed in a body of water that is a consistent temperature say that this child, I think the water heater was 147, 150 degrees; if you take a child and you emerge [sic] in that water, you are going to have the same depth of burn everywhere that the water was. The only thing that would change that is the time of exposure. But so random, that you just draw a line and you stick them in the same amount of water you will have same thickness burn all the way from start to finish.

Q: Did this child have the same thickness burns?

A: No, they did not.

Q: Were her burns then mixed?

A: That's a good way to describe it, mixed depth.

Q: And if you would, talking about mixed depth, are you saying that the burns are different on her foot or top of the foot or back of her leg or what?

A: Yes. On different parts of her body are different depths.

Q: The medical records support mixed depth injuries?

A: The initial medical records did not. But in burn cases you really don't know what a burn looks like for several hours or even days after a burn. There is continued damage that goes on even after the burn. Both nerves vascularly and dermis.

A burn can look very bad initially, and as it starts to heal, the next couple of days you will see the true character of the burn.

It's worth mentioning that the burns from the mid-calf distally and spontaneously healed. It was a second degree burn that spontaneously healed. And this child unfortunately had to be grafted on the dorsal of the feet, the top of the feet.

Mr. Porter further explained that the fact that the burns on the top of Sophia's feet were deeper than her other burns was consistent with her standing in the sink, turning on the faucet, and allowing the hot water to hit the top of her feet. He testified:

> So to me if the story was she was in a basin and there was hot water running from above on top of the feet, that makes perfect sense in my opinion.
> Q: So there was mixed depth. And the place that had to be grafted was the top of the feet?
>
> A: Correct.
>
> Q: Did the bottom of the feet heal?
>
> A: Spontaneously.
>
> Q: Did the back of the leg heal?
>
> A: Spontaneously.
>
> Q: Did the front of the leg heal?
> A: Yes, spontaneously.

Mr. Porter also testified that "typically in burns that are of immersion only and forced immersion, that line is very straight, it would be more cross both sides." Referencing photographs of Sophia's injuries, he stated, "This one is a very irregular line. This one is not burned up very far, and also an irregular angle." He concluded:

> My opinion is an accidental burning. I think they–an adult was not around to supervise this child. I think this child, in my opinion, made it to the toilet, made it to the vanity, switched on the hot water. And then could not as the water rose–as I understand it, it's a slow draining vanity. As the water rose this child had nothing–nowhere to go. And I think she, you know, sustained the injuries that she sustained during that process.

Sarah S., Benjamin S., and Rosetta S., the paternal grandmother, all testified about Sophia's propensity to climb. Specifically, Benjamin S. stated that he had observed Sophia climb from the commode to the vanity just one month before she was injured.

Detective Snuffer, one of the investigating police officers, also testified. He stated that Sarah S. was cooperative during the investigation and firm in her resolve that she did not intentionally harm her child. According to the police report, the police officers found standing water in the vent in the bathroom floor where the injury occurred; water-soaked bathroom rugs in the bathroom floor where the injury occurred; dry bathtubs, kitchen sink and master bathroom sink; a rapidly filling and slow draining bathroom sink where the injury occurred; and no drain stopper in the bathroom sink where the injury occurred. The officers concluded that Sarah S.'s claim that there was no intentional wrongdoing on her part was consistent with the evidence they found during their investigation. As previously noted, no criminal charges were filed against Sarah S.

Full evidentiary adjudicatory hearings were held on March 5, 2009, and May 11, 2009. On June 24, 2009, the Court entered an adjudicatory order finding by clear and convincing evidence that Sarah S. did not intentionally inflict physical or emotional harm upon any of the minor children, particularly Sophia. The circuit court further found, however, that Sarah S. had neglected the children, particularly Sophia, by her own admission, because she was outside the family home when Sophia was injured. Thus, the circuit court concluded that Sarah S. was an "abusing parent" within the meaning of W. Va. Code § 49-1-3(b) (2007) (Repl. Vol. 2009).[9]

The disposition hearing was held on June 24, 2009. Both the DHHR and the guardian ad litem moved for the termination of Sarah S.'s parental rights. Sarah S. requested an improvement period. The court concluded that there were no statutory grounds for terminating Sarah S.'s parental rights and that she "ha[d] demonstrated through her acceptance of responsibility for neglect of the minor child an adequate capacity to solve the problems of neglect with a reasonable likelihood that the conditions of neglect which led to the filing of the petition in this action can be corrected substantially in the near future." See W. Va. Code § 49-6-5 (2006) (Repl. Vol. 2009). The circuit court further found that Sarah S. had demonstrated, by clear and convincing evidence, that she is likely to fully participate in an improvement period. See W. Va. Code § 49-6-12(b)(2) (1996) (Repl. Vol. 2009). Accordingly, the court granted Sarah S. a six-month dispositional improvement period. The court directed the DHHR to develop a plan of improvement to begin reunification of the

"For appeals resulting from abuse and neglect proceedings, such as the case sub judice, we employ a compound standard of review: conclusions of law are subject to a de novo review, while findings of fact are weighed against a clearly erroneous standard." In re Emily, 208 W. Va. 325, 332, 540 S.E.2d 542, 549 (2000). In other words,

> Although conclusions of law reached by a circuit court are subject to de novo review, when an action, such as an abuse and neglect case, is tried upon the facts without a jury, the circuit court shall make a determination based upon the evidence and shall make findings of fact and conclusions of law as to whether such child is abused or neglected. These findings shall not be set aside by a reviewing court unless clearly erroneous. A finding is clearly erroneous when, although there is evidence to support the finding, the reviewing court on the entire evidence is left with the definite and firm conviction that a mistake has been committed. However, a reviewing court may not overturn a finding simply because it would have decided the case differently, and it must affirm a finding if the circuit court's

DISCUSSION

As noted above, the guardian ad litem contends in this appeal that the circuit court erred by not terminating Sarah S.'s parental rights. The guardian maintains that the evidence clearly establishes that Sophia sustained second-degree burns as a result of intentional immersion in scalding water. The guardian asserts that the expert testimony of the two physicians who treated Sophia at the Burn Center at the Cabell Huntington Hospital, as well as the medical records from Nationwide Children's Hospital, indicate that Sophia was held down in the water, but managed to lift one foot in her efforts to fight off the assault resulting in non-symmetrical, but circumferential, injuries to her legs–a "classic stocking and/or glove" severe burn injury. In addition, the experts testified that the fact that Sophia suffered very few burns to her upper legs and perineum area was consistent with the dunking or immersion of the child in the sink as there would be minimal splashing. Finally, the experts stated that the unexplained long linear bruise on Sophia's right thigh was consistent with the force necessary to hold down a child in the scalding water. The guardian argues that the circuit court erred by ignoring this overwhelming medical evidence which established that Sophia's injuries were not the result of an accident and elevating the opinion of Mr. Porter, a physician assistant, over the well-reasoned opinions of highly trained medical doctors.

In response, Sarah S. argues that the circuit court did not err by concluding that she did not intentionally harm her child and refusing to terminate her parental rights. Sarah S. contends that the guardian's argument is based upon theories and scenarios of how Sophia was injured instead of actual evidence. Sarah S. maintains that the evidence shows that Sophia accidentally burned herself. In that regard, she first points out the Kanawha County Sheriff's Department conducted a thorough investigation and concluded that the evidence was consistent with her explanation of what happened to Sophia. The investigating officers took digital photographs of the interior and exterior of the residence. They checked all sinks and bathtubs. They turned on the hot water and let it run for a few seconds at which time the water became hot. They measured the temperature of the water with a thermometer. They noted that the bathtubs were dry. They measured the depth of the bathtub, the height of the vanity, the diameter of the sink, and checked the hot water tank, noting that it was covered with cobwebs indicative that it had not been disturbed. They also noted that the sink where the injury occurred filled rapidly, drained slowly, and had strong water pressure. The water was unable to drain without filling the sink rapidly. The police concluded that Sarah S.'s statement that Sophia's injury was an accident was consistent with the evidence.

In addition to the police report, Sarah S. notes that the circuit court had evidence in the form of testimony from Rosetta S., the paternal grandmother, that Sophia had sat on her bathroom vanity just two weeks before the accident to wash her hands and asked to put her feet in the sink. In addition, Sophia's father, Benjamin S., testified that a month before the accident, he observed Sophia climbing onto the vanity where the accident occurred.

Finally, Sarah S. claims that the testimony provided by her medical expert, Mr. Porter, establishes that Sophia was not intentionally burned. She first points out that unlike DHHR's expert physcians who based their testimony solely upon their observations and treatment of Sophia S. at Cabell Huntington Hospital,[11] Mr. Porter reviewed Sophia's medical records from both hospitals. In addition, he consulted publications by the U.S. Department of Justice, as well as medical texts, regarding burn victims and classic findings in abuse and neglect cases. During his testimony, Mr. Porter provided a list of ten factors that are utilized by medical professionals to assess whether or not a burn injury is intentional or accidental. Those factors are as follows: the presence of glove and stocking appearance; the uniformity of depth of the burn; symmetry of the water line; the presence or absence of splash injuries; the sparing of skin; other injuries including bruises and old and new fractures; the ability of the child to climb; cognitive skills of the child; the location in the home where the injury occurred; and previous abuse and neglect of the child. When Mr. Porter considered the factors along with Sophia's medical records, he concluded that Sophia accidentally burned herself.

With regard to splash injuries, Mr. Porter testified that in the traditional abuse and neglect case where a child was forcibly held down in scalding water, there would be no splash injuries. He stated that Sophia's medical records showed that she had a few splash injuries on her upper legs, one in the perineum area, and one on her lower back. He testified that this evidence indicated that Sophia was trying to remove herself from the water and that she did not have any external force applied to her. He also opined that the linear bruise on one of Sophia's upper legs was most likely obtained by falling against a surface such as a straight edge. He explained that if a child is held down in water, there are typically hand or thumb prints on the child; Sophia had no such injuries, nor was there any evidence that she had ever been physically abused.

Sarah S. acknowledges that she was negligent in the supervision of her child. However, she maintains that the evidence outlined above shows that she did not intentionally harm Sophia. Therefore, she asserts that circuit court did not err by granting her a six-month improvement period and refusing to terminate her parental rights.

As noted in the preceding standard of review section of this opinion, this Court should not overturn the findings of the circuit court in an abuse and neglect proceeding "simply because [we] would have decided the case differently, and [we] must affirm a finding if the circuit court's account of the evidence is plausible in light of the record viewed in its entirety." Syllabus Point 1, Tiffany Marie S., supra. Under Rule 52(a) of the West Virginia Rules of Civil Procedure, "[i]n all actions tried upon the facts without a jury . . . the court shall find the facts specially and state separately its conclusions of law thereon . . . . Findings of fact, whether based on oral or documentary evidence, shall not be set aside unless clearly erroneous[.]" Furthermore, "due regard shall be given to the opportunity of the trial court to judge the credibility of witnesses." Id. Accordingly, this Court has observed that > [w]hen findings are based on determinations regarding the credibility of witnesses, Rule 52(a) demands even greater deference to the trial court's findings . . . . Deference is appropriate because the trial judge was on the spot and is better able than an appellate court to decide whether the error affected substantial rights of the parties.

Id. at 231, 470 S.E.2d at 185 (citation and internal quotation omitted). Finally, this Court has explained that > [d]etermining whether a parent or guardian has neglected or abused his or her children, like most adversarial-oriented explorations, is a predominantly factbound enterprise. It follows that, absent a mistake of law, an appellate tribunal should disturb a circuit court's determination only if it is clearly erroneous. This means, of course, that if there are two or more plausible interpretations of the evidence, the circuit court's choice among them must hold sway.

Id. at 237, 470 S.E.2d at 191.

This is an extremely close and difficult case. The circuit court was presented with two plausible interpretations of the evidence and acting as the finder of fact, determined that Sarah S. "did not intentionally inflict physical or emotional harm upon any of the minor children and more specifically, the minor child, [Sophia]." The circuit court did find, however, that Sarah S. was negligent in failing to supervise Sophia resulting in her being physically injured and that such action constituted neglect warranting a six-month dispositional improvement period. Having carefully examined the record in this case, this Court does not find the circuit court's findings of fact to be clearly erroneous. The circuit court had before it sufficient evidence to support its determination, and this Court is not left with a definite and firm conviction that a mistake has been committed.

While this Court finds no clear error and affirms the decision of the circuit court, we once again believe it is necessary to stress the importance of a promptly prepared case plan aimed at providing a meaningful improvement period and reunification of the family. See In re Jonathan G., 198 W. Va. 716, 482 S.E.2d 893 (1996). "Under W.Va.Code, 49-6-2(b) [(2006) (Repl. Vol. 2009)], when an improvement period is authorized, then the court by order shall require the Department of Human Services to prepare a family case plan pursuant to W.Va.Code, 49-6D-3 [(1998) (Repl. Vol. 2009)]." Syllabus Point 3, State ex rel. W.VA. Dept. of Human Services v. Cheryl M., 177 W. Va. 688, 356 S.E.2d 181 (1987).

> In formulating the improvement period and family case plans, courts and social service workers should cooperate to provide a workable approach for the resolution of family problems which have prevented the child or children from receiving appropriate care from their parents. The formulation of the improvement period and family case plans should therefore be a consolidated, multi-disciplinary effort among the court system, the parents, attorneys, social service agencies, and any other helping personnel involved in assisting the family.

Syllabus Point 4, In the Interest of Carlita B., 185 W. Va. 613, 408 S.E.2d 365 (1991). This is especially important in a case such as this where ensuring a child's safety is so vital.

The record in this case indicates that the only service that the DHHR provided to Sarah S. during the course of the proceedings below was supervised visits.[12] Also, the permanency plan filed by the DHHR prior to the disposition hearing contemplated termination of parental rights. Obviously, in light of our decision, the permanency plan must be revised and an improvement period plan formulated. At the outset of the improvement period, the circuit court has an obligation to facilitate communication between the parties to ensure Sarah S. and the DHHR are aware of what is expected during the improvement period. Carlita B., 185 W. Va. at 625-26 n.15, 408 S.E.2d at 377-78 n.15. The parties should make the court aware of any foreseen obstacles that would prevent compliance with the parenting plan so that they may be resolved prior to commencement of the improvement period. Id. Most importantly, however, the court should make sure that the children have been informed of the changes that are about to occur in their lives[13] and that they are receiving counseling or any other services that are necessary to achieve stability in their lives. Id.

While the circuit court found that Sophia may not have been intentionally harmed, the fact remains that she suffered very serious injuries because a lack of parental supervision. Clearly, services should be devised to address the conditions of neglect that resulted in Sophia's injuries. Furthermore, during the improvement period, the circuit court should monitor the status of the children and the progress of Sarah S. in satisfying the goals of the parenting plan on a monthly basis. See Carlita B., 185 W. Va. 625, 408 S.E.2d 377 (establishing monthly reviews to monitor improvement periods).[14] At such monthly reviews, the parties, attorneys, and social workers should appear before the court so that Sarah S.'s progress can be closely monitored to ensure compliance with the conditions of the improvement period, and a record of such proceedings should be made and filed.

> At the conclusion of the improvement period, the court shall review the performance of the parents in attempting to attain the goals of the improvement period and shall, in the court's discretion, determine whether the conditions of the improvement period have been satisfied and whether sufficient improvement has been made in the context of all the circumstances of the case to justify the return of the child[ren].

Syllabus Point 6, Carlita B.

[14]As noted in Carlita B., the circuit court should make sure that the parent has transportation to attend the monthly reviews and any program that is a condition of the improvements period, and if not, direct the DHHR to assist with transportation. Also, the monthly reviews and programs should be scheduled so that they do not interfere with the parent's employment. 185 W. Va. 625-26 n.15, 408 S.E.2d at 377-78 n.15.

IV.

CONCLUSION

Accordingly, for the reasons set forth above, the final order of the Circuit Court of Kanawha County entered on July 20, 2009, is affirmed, and this case is remanded to the circuit court with directions regarding the improvement period as set forth herein.

Affirmed and remanded with directions.

SUPREME COURT OF APPEALS
OF WEST VIRGINIA

Benjamin, J., dissenting.

I dissent from the majority opinion. Based upon my review of the record, I conclude that the circuit court's findings were not supported by the credible evidence of record and that such findings were clearly erroneous when the record is viewed as a whole. It is not often that I do not defer to the trial court in such matters and these certainly are difficult cases, but here I believe the conclusion that this young child scalded herself is inconsistent with the facts of the record and the opinions of Sophia S.'s treating physicians. Sophia S. received second-degree scalding-type burns to her feet and legs. Her mother contended that these burns were the result of an accidental immersion, as opposed to an intentional act on the part of her mother.[1] On appeal, I believe my colleagues fail to give sufficient weight to the medical opinions of the two treating emergency room physicians as well as that from the medical personnel treating the child at a specialized out-of-state burn clinic which supported the conclusion that Sophia S.'s burns were the result of the mother's intentional act.

[1] There is no dispute that the child's mother was the sole adult individual present at the time the child's feet and legs were burned. The mother presented a defense that the twenty-two month old child climbed up onto the bathroom sink, turned on the hot water and placed her feet and legs into the scalding water and held them there. The mother was on the phone at the time of this incident, immediately outside of the family's living quarters, where she had to go to get a usable signal on her cell phone.

The circuit court's findings of fact on this issue were based upon the opinion testimony of Greg Porter, a physician's assistant, who was hired by the mother to review medical records and to provide expert testimony. Mr. Porter was not involved in the treatment of this child. The State and the guardian ad litem relied upon the expert medical testimony of two treating physicians at the Cabell Huntington Hospital Burn Center, Eduardo Pino, M.D., and David Henchman, M.D. The State and the guardian ad litem also relied upon the medical opinion, by way of statement, of Gail E. Besner, M.D., Sophia S.'s treating physician at Nationwide Children's Hospital, a nationally-recognized children's medical facility in Columbus, Ohio. The combined expert opinions of Drs. Pino, Henchman and Besner concluded that Sophia S.'s immersion burns were the result of an intentional act by the mother. The opinions of these medical doctors was based upon years of experience with the treatment of burns on an emergency basis and upon their actual examination of Sophia S.

We have held that "[i]n determining who is an expert, a circuit court should conduct a two-step inquiry. First, a circuit court must determine whether the proposed expert (a) meets the minimal educational or experiential qualifications, (b) in a field that is relevant to the subject under investigation, and (c) which will assist the trier of fact. Second, a circuit court must determine that the expert's area of expertise covers the particular opinion as to which the expert seeks to testify. Gentry v. Mangum, 195 W.Va. 512, 466 S.E.2d 171 (1995). If one accepts for the moment that the physician's assistant was competent herein to give medical opinion testimony regarding causation,[2] the role of the circuit court as the fact-finder in this abuse and neglect proceeding was to assess and weigh the differences between the treating medical doctors' evidence and that of the retained physician's assistant. Based not only upon the overwhelming difference in expertise and experience of these witnesses, but also on the manner in which Sophie S. was burned, I believe that the circuit court failed to give sufficient weight to the opinions of the treating medical doctors. As the majority correctly notes, our standard of review of the findings and conclusions of the circuit court is deferential. Moreover, these are admittedly difficult cases for all involved. Here, however, when the record is reviewed as a whole, I believe the findings of the circuit court on the accidental nature of the child's burns to be clearly erroneous.

[2] I believe it appropriate at some point for this Court to visit the evidentiary issue of the minimum standards of competency which should be present where a given witness seeks to render opinion testimony of a certain nature. A physician assistant certainly has more training of a medical nature than does a laborer, yet that training and experience is far different from that of a medical doctor. At what point should our judicial system permit or prohibit non-physicians with some level of medical expertise (such as physician assistants, nurses, nurse practitioners, and emergency medical response personnel) from rendering opinion testimony of a medical causation nature? This question carries over to other areas of expertise. I believe it appropriate for us to revisit these basic gate-keeping matters.

Per Curiam:

In the instant case, we affirm a first degree murder conviction.

I.

The appellant, Brian Bush Ferguson, was convicted of first degree murder in November of 2002. The jury did not recommend mercy and on February 24, 2003, the appellant was sentenced to life imprisonment without the possibility of parole. We discuss the relevant facts of the case and the applicable standards of review infra as part of our consideration of the issues raised on appeal.

II.
A.

The appellant argues that the trial court erred by admitting hearsay evidence about an altercation between the appellant and the victim prior to the incident in which the victim died.

This evidence came from friends of the victim, who testified at trial that the victim had told the friends that the appellant had threatened the victim with a knife during a heated conversation about the appellant's girlfriend. The trial court admitted the testimony about the victim's statements under the "excited utterance" exception to the hearsay rule, W.Va. Rules of Evidence 803(2).

State v. Sutphin, 195 W.Va. 551, 466 S.E.2d (1995), Syllabus Points 7 and 8, states:

> 7. In order to qualify as an excited utterance under W.Va.R.Evid. 803(2): (1) the declarant must have experienced a startling event or condition; (2) the declarant must have reacted while under the stress or excitement of that event and not from reflection and fabrication; and (3) the statement must relate to the startling event or condition.
> 8. Within a W.Va.R.Evid. 803(2) analysis, to assist in answering whether a statement was made while under the stress or excitement of the event and not from reflection and fabrication, several factors must be considered, including: (1) the lapse of time between the event and the declaration; (2) the age of the declarant; (3) the physical and mental state of the declarant; (4) the characteristics of the event; and (5) the subject matter of the statements.

We have carefully reviewed the statements in question, which all of the evidence indicated were made by a person in an emotionally upset condition, just minutes after a frightening event. There was no evidence suggesting fabrication by the declarant. We agree with the trial court's conclusion that they were "excited utterances" and were admissible as such.

The appellant also argues that even if the victim's statements were "excited utterances," they were inadmissible as "testimonial hearsay," barred by the Confrontation Clause (U.S. Constitution, Amendment 6), as announced in the very recent case of Crawford v. Washington, 124 S.Ct. 1354, ___ U.S. ___, 158 L.Ed.2d 177 (2004). However, we do not perceive that Crawford's largely unexplored ban on "testimonial hearsay" that has not been tested by cross-examination extends to the statements to non-official and non-investigatorial witnesses, made prior to and apart from any governmental investigation, that are issue in this case.

We therefore find no error in the circuit court's ruling on the admissibility of the hearsay statements about the knife incident.[1]

B.

The appellant's next assignment of error asserts that the trial court erred in allowing the prosecution to place before the jury testimony and argument that amounted to commenting on the appellant's exercise of his constitutional rights to remain silent and to have the advice of counsel.

This testimony and argument related to the fact that the appellant, prior to his arrest, ended a police questioning session by asserting his right to consult with an attorney. A police officer testified at trial that the appellant said that he was going to get in touch with an attorney and then make arrangements to come back and talk with the police, but that the appellant did not do so.

Presenting evidence, comment, or argument that in response to official questioning or accusation a defendant has exercised his or her right to be silent or to have an attorney is fraught with the undeniable and serious danger that the jury will make the powerful inference that "an innocent person would not do such a thing." Therefore, to give teeth to these crucial constitutional protections, our jurisprudence mandates that such evidence, comment, or argument should be scrupulously avoided:

[1]The appellant also references other testimony relating to statements by the victim about the appellant, arguing that this testimony should not have been admitted. We have reviewed this testimony and find that the court did not err in concluding that it met the criteria of applicable hearsay exceptions and did not offend Crawford.

> Under the Due Process Clause of the West Virginia Constitution, Article III, Section 10, and the presumption of innocence embodied therein, and Article III, Section 5, relating to the right against self-incrimination, it is reversible error for the prosecutor to cross-examine a defendant in regard to his pre-trial silence or to comment on the same to the jury.

Syllabus Point 1, State v. Boyd, 160 W.Va. 234, 233 S.E.2d 710 (1977)

However, if a defendant himself or herself clearly "opens the door" by presenting evidence or argument about such conduct by the defendant, the trial court may allow the prosecution to inquire or otherwise touch on this subject – if it is necessary in fairness to present the prosecution's perspective, keeping in mind the need to keep the jury as much as possible from improperly drawing inferences from the accused's exercise of his rights. See, e.g., State v. Mills, 211 W.Va. 532, 544, 566 S.E.2d 891, 903 (2002). This, we perceive, is what happened in the instant case.

Specifically, the appellant introduced into evidence at trial a video tape of the police interview in which the appellant broke off police questioning and asserted his right to counsel; and the appellant's counsel questioned the police officer at trial about the events shown on the tape. The decision by the appellant and his counsel to play the police interview tape for the jury was a reasonable weighing of the benefit to the appellant versus the possible inference the jury could take from the appellant's cutting the interview short in accordance with his right to do so. Under these circumstances, it was not unfair for the trial court to allow the prosecution to also address, in a limited fashion, the events shown on the tape.

Moreover, after reviewing the more than 1,000 pages of transcript of the appellant's trial, we find that any evidence or comment referencing the appellant's asertion of his rights was marginal and beyond a reasonable doubt could not have had importance in the jury's decision. We find therefore find no merit in this assignment of error.

C.

The appellant's third assignment of error is that the trial court "warned" the appellant that cross-examination of a witness for the prosecution about his involvement in certain unrelated offenses might "open the door" for that witness testifying to the appellant's involvement in those offenses.

The record reflects that this issue arose in connection with the court's ruling on a prosecution motion in limine; and that the trial court's warning was cautionary in nature, directing both the prosecution and defense to be careful where their questions led to avoid bringing in prejudicial extraneous matters, and to come to the bench before going into uncertain areas. A complete review of this witness' testimony does not reveal any rulings by the trial court that constituted reversible error.

D.

The appellant also asserts error in the court's instructions. We conclude that even granting the remotest inferences to the appellant, the trial court had no evidentiary basis upon which to instruct the jury on voluntary manslaughter. The court's instructions did not deviate from the standard of beyond a reasonable doubt for all elements of the offense, nor did the court err in instructing on the mercy issue. We find no instructional error.

Finally, the appellant asserts that there was insufficient evidence for a conviction of first-degree murder.

There was evidence from which the jury could conclude that the appellant had harbored animosity toward the victim over a lengthy period of time and had made a threat of physical harm toward the victim at knife-point; that a subsequent encounter between the appellant and the victim further fueled the appellant's desire for retaliation against the victim, which the appellant expressed before the murder by stating that he would get the victim alone; and that the appellant had been "stalking" the victim by parking in the victim's parking lot just outside the victim's apartment in the weeks and days before the murder.

The jury also could find that appellant, whose physical appearance fit the descriptions of the shooter given by several witnesses, was known to be in the near vicinity of the shooting within minutes of the shooting; that the police subsequently obtained from the appellant's possession articles of clothing that were consistent with the description given by eyewitnesses to the shooting; that gunshot residue was found on those garments; that the appellant gave inconsistent and false statements to police in the early hours of the murder investigation; that the appellant's friend reported that approximately two weeks before the murder he had observed a large, stainless steel revolver in the appellant's apartment; that this gun fit the description of the firearm observed by an eyewitness to the shooting; and that the victim was killed by a .44 caliber magnum bullet of the type shot from this gun.

The standard set forth in Syllabus Point 1 of State v. Guthrie, 194 W.Va. 657, 461 S.E.2d 163 (1995) is:

> The function of an appellate court when reviewing the sufficiency of the evidence to support a criminal conviction is to examine the evidence admitted at trial to determine whether such evidence, if believed, is sufficient to convince a reasonable person of the defendant's guilt beyond a reasonable doubt. Thus, the relevant inquiry is whether, after viewing the evidence in the light most favorable to the prosecution, any rational trier of fact could have found the essential elements of the crime proved beyond a reasonable doubt.

Applying this standard, the evidence for conviction was sufficient.

III.

This Court has carefully reviewed the entire record in the instant case. The appellant's trial counsel presented a strong challenge to every evidentiary aspect of the prosecution's case. The trial court made a number of evidentiary rulings that were favorable to the defense. The prosecution's witnesses were tested in extended and effective cross-examination. The appellant took the stand, and presented his version of events to the jury.

Upon our review of the record, we conclude that the appellant received a fair trial, and we therefore affirm the circuit court's order entering judgment of conviction.

Affirmed.

SYLLABUS BY THE COURT

1. "'"Although conclusions of law reached by a circuit court are subject to de novo review, when an action, such as an abuse and neglect case, is tried upon the facts without a jury, the circuit court shall make a determination based upon the evidence and shall make findings of fact and conclusions of law as to whether such child is abused or neglected. A finding is clearly erroneous when, although there is evidence to support the finding, the reviewing court on the entire evidence is left with the definite and firm conviction that a mistake has been committed. Per Curiam:

The West Virginia Department of Health and Human Resources (hereinafter "WVDHHR") seeks a writ of prohibition to prevent the enforcement of an order of the Circuit Court of Marion County dated August 8, 2005, returning physical and legal custody of the infant child, Sean M. (hereinafter "Sean"),[1] to his parents. The WVDHHR argues that the father, Charles M. (hereinafter "Charles"), was responsible for the death of Dominic M. (hereinafter "Dominic"), the sibling of Sean; therefore, Sean should not be returned to the custody of his parents, Charles and Miranda M. (hereinafter "Miranda"). Based upon the parties' arguments, the record designated for our consideration, and the pertinent authorities, we deny the writ of prohibition.

I.

FACTUAL AND PROCEDURAL HISTORY

The matter before this Court deals only with abuse and neglect proceedings as they relate to Sean; however, it is necessary to discuss Dominic's case because of its significant impact on Sean's case. Sean was born on October 3, 1997, and his younger brother, Dominic, was born July 29, 2002. Dominic died on April 9, 2003, at the age of eight months, and the circumstances surrounding his death gave rise to the abuse and neglect proceedings as they related to both Sean and Dominic.

On April 6, 2003, Miranda put Dominic to bed in the late evening. She left for work soon thereafter, leaving both Sean and Dominic in the care of their father, Charles. The next morning at 5:30 a.m., Dominic seemed congested, and within thirty minutes, he was not breathing. Charles called for emergency assistance, and Dominic was transported to Fairmont General Hospital and subsequently transferred to West Virginia University Hospitals in Morgantown, West Virginia. Dominic was in full cardiac arrest, and was unstable hemodynamically, cardiovascularly, and hematologically. He also had bilateral retinal hemorrhages and a left parietal subdural hematoma that appeared acute in nature with global edema. In lay terms, Dominic had a large brain bleed caused from head trauma. Surgery was performed to drain the blood, but Dominic remained on life support and was pronounced to be brain dead. The decision was made to remove life support, and Dominic died on April 9, 2003.

The WVDHHR was contacted by the hospital regarding Dominic's injuries. Child abuse and neglect proceedings were instituted on April 8, 2003, on behalf of Dominic and Sean.[2] The petition was based on reports from the treating doctors that opined that

[2]West Virginia law allows abuse and neglect proceedings to be instituted for children residing in the same home as a child who has been physically abused. While there was no evidence that Sean personally experienced abuse, he qualified as an abused child (continued...)

Dominic suffered from symptoms consistent with Shaken Baby Impact Syndrome (hereinafter "SBIS"), and that his injuries were consistent with a recent, non-accidental trauma. The petition sought immediate custody of both children.

On April 8, 2003, Sean was placed in the physical and legal custody of WVDHHR. Sean was placed in foster care, and was eventually located with his maternal grandparents in Maryland. It was alleged that the father, Charles, was responsible for the injury and subsequent death of Sean's younger brother, Dominic. In addition to the civil abuse and neglect proceedings to determine whether Sean should be removed from his parents' custody, criminal proceedings also were instituted against Charles.[3] On March 28, 2004, Charles was convicted by a jury of the crime of death of a child by a parent. However, the verdict was set aside on May 4, 2004, due to juror misconduct. Thereafter, instead of facing the expense of a second trial, Charles entered an Alford Plea[4] of guilty to the charge of involuntary manslaughter, and received two years of probation. In accepting the Alford

[3]The mother, Miranda, was not charged with a crime. She was at work when Dominic stopped breathing, and she submitted to and passed a polygraph test. Because Charles was already charged with criminal abuse and neglect, his lawyer advised against submission to a polygraph test.

[4]An Alford plea is a guilty plea by a defendant who continues to protest his or her innocence. See State v. Lilly, 194 W. Va. 595, 605 n.2, 461 S.E.2d 101, 111 n.2 (1995) (Cleckley, J., concurring).

Plea, the circuit court made the finding that "the record in this case supports the conclusion that there is a significant probability that a jury would convict this defendant of the charge contained in the indictment in this case. Whereupon, the Court accepted said Alford Plea of guilty to Involuntary Manslaughter[.]"[5]

In the corollary abuse and neglect proceedings, a preliminary hearing was held on April 22, 2003. The circuit court made the following findings:

> 1. The infant's brother, Dominic . . . suffered from symptoms consistent with Shaken Baby Impact Syndrome.
> 2. The parents have offered no explanation for how the symptoms occurred.
> 3. The infant, Sean . . . should not be returned to the custody of his parents at this time.

Adjudicatory hearings were held on July 13, 2004, and October 26, 2004. The circuit court never made a finding as to whether the parents were guilty of abuse in the death of Dominic, and therefore, never made the predicate determination of whether Sean was an abused child. As the hearings progressed, more medical evidence was presented contradicting Dominic's

[5]We find it significant that the same circuit court judge presided over the criminal proceedings and the civil abuse and neglect proceedings. The judge was cognizant of the testimony adduced during both proceedings, and had the benefit of complete and full knowledge of the expert testimony for both sides when he ruled in the abuse and neglect action. Notice is also due of the professional background of the particular circuit judge who presided over these matters. diagnosis of SBIS. Thereafter, on April 18, 2005, the circuit court granted the parents a pre-adjudicatory improvement period.

The circuit court based its decision to grant a pre-adjudicatory improvement period, in part, on the reports submitted by the Guardian Ad Litem (hereinafter "GAL")[6] and the Court Appointed Special Advocate (hereinafter "CASA"). The GAL, as well as the CASA representative, held the opinion that Sean should be returned to the physical custody of his parents. This opinion was based on the fact that both parents had complied with all parameters of the pre-adjudicatory improvement period, and evidence that Sean would best be served by reunification with his parents. In addition to their compliance with the pre-adjudicatory improvement period and their cooperation with the authorities regarding the abuse and neglect investigation, the record further illustrated that Charles and Miranda had not been involved before with the WVDHHR. There were no allegations of any prior abuse or neglect, nor were there any allegations of drug or alcohol abuse. Both parents held steady employment and appeared to provide a loving and stable home for their children.

Moreover, in regard to the death of Dominic, evidence was introduced that his symptoms at death were more consistent with a subdural hematoma caused by a fall from bed[7] three weeks prior to his death, and were not consistent with shaken baby syndrome. Two experts testified regarding evidence of an old bleed in Dominic's head consistent with the timing of the fall, and they further testified that the death was caused by a slow bleed that worsened or that a re-bleed was triggered by slight movement on Dominic's part. Significantly, there was a lack of evidence to confirm shaken baby syndrome because the hallmark damage to the brain stem nerves was absent, as well as the absence of any neck tissue damage or rib bruising that is generally present in shaken baby syndrome. Based on this evidence, and based on the parents' compliance with the parameters set forth in the pre-adjudicatory improvement period, the circuit court[8] returned custody of Sean to his parents on July 19, 2005. The written order was entered August 8, 2005, and the WVDHHR filed a petition seeking a writ of prohibition to prevent the enforcement of this order. We issued a rule to show cause and now deny the petition.

[6] During the pendency of the civil abuse and neglect proceedings, a GAL was appointed to represent the best interests of the child, Sean. Not only did the GAL advocate to protect the best interests of Sean in the abuse and neglect proceeding, but she also attended the criminal trial of the father, Charles. Her knowledge and understanding of the medical evidence presented by both parties was instrumental in providing the court with the information needed to make a custody decision of this magnitude.

STANDARD FOR ISSUANCE OF WRIT

[7]The record shows that about three weeks prior to his death, Dominic rolled off of a bed onto carpet at his maternal grandparents' house when his mother became ill and left him briefly. The grandparents both acknowledged that this incident occurred. Sean was placed with these grandparents during the pendency of the abuse and neglect proceeding.

[8]See supra note 5.

We begin by outlining the standard of review in civil abuse and neglect proceedings, which has been established as follows:

> "'Although conclusions of law reached by a circuit court are subject to de novo review, when an action, such as an abuse and neglect case, is tried upon the facts without a jury, the circuit court shall make a determination based upon the evidence and shall make findings of fact and conclusions of law as to whether such child is abused or neglected. These findings shall not be set aside by a reviewing court unless clearly erroneous. A finding is clearly erroneous when, although there is evidence to support the finding, the reviewing court on the entire evidence is left with the definite and firm conviction that a mistake has been committed. However, a reviewing court may not overturn a finding simply because it would have decided the case differently, and it must affirm a finding if the circuit court's account of the evidence is plausible in light of the record viewed in its entirety.' Syl. Pt. 1, In the Interest of Tiffany Marie S., 196 W. Va. 223, 470 S.E.2d 177 (1996)." Syl. Pt. 1, State ex rel. Virginia M. v. Virgil Eugene S. II, 197 W. Va. 456, 475 S.E.2d 548 (1996).

Syl. pt. 1, State ex rel. Diva P. v. Kaufman, 200 W. Va. 555, 490 S.E.2d 642 (1997).

Because this case was filed as a writ of prohibition seeking to prevent the enforcement of the circuit court's order, resolution of this case also necessitates our examination of the applicable standard for writs of prohibition. A writ of prohibition is an appropriate remedy "when the inferior court has not jurisdiction of the subject matter in controversy, or, having such jurisdiction, exceeds its legitimate powers." W. Va. Code § 53-1-1 (1923) (Repl. Vol. 2000). It is undisputed that the circuit court has jurisdiction over civil abuse and neglect proceedings; therefore,

> "[i]n determining whether to grant a rule to show cause in prohibition when a court is not acting in excess of its jurisdiction, this Court will look to the adequacy of other available remedies such as appeal and to the over-all economy of effort and money among litigants, lawyers and courts; however, this Court will use prohibition in this discretionary way to correct only substantial, clear-cut, legal errors plainly in contravention of a clear statutory, constitutional, or common law mandate which may be resolved independently of any disputed facts and only in cases where there is a high probability that the trial will be completely reversed if the error is not corrected in advance." Syl. Pt. 1, Hinkle v. Black, 164 W. Va. 112, 262 S.E.2d 744 (1979).

Syl. pt. 2, State ex rel. Diva P. v. Kaufman, 200 W. Va. 555, 490 S.E.2d 642 (1997). See also State ex rel. Chafin v. Halbritter, 191 W. Va. 741, 743-44, 448 S.E.2d 428, 430-31 (1994) ("[P]rohibition may be substituted for a writ of error or appeal when the latter alternatives would provide an inadequate remedy.") (internal citations omitted). Mindful of these applicable standards, we now consider the parties' arguments.

III.

DISCUSSION

The primary issue presented for resolution by this Court is whether it was proper for the circuit court to return physical and legal custody of Sean to his parents. On appeal, the WVDHHR argues that Charles was responsible for the death of Dominic; therefore, Sean is not safe in the custody of Charles. A second issue raised by the WVDHHR is that the circuit court erred by granting a pre-adjudicatory improvement period. Conversely, the GAL and Miranda and Charles argue that the medical evidence did not support a conclusion of shaken baby syndrome. They further argue that the medical evidence is consistent with a fall that occurred three weeks prior to Dominic's death.

Because of the ease in disposing of the second issue regarding the granting of a pre-adjudicatory improvement period, we will address it first. The WVDHHR argues that the trial court erred in granting a pre-adjudicatory improvement period because such motion is proper only if made prior to the final adjudication. In this case, the circuit court entered an order granting a pre-adjudicatory improvement period on April 18, 2005. The order makes it clear that "[t]he adult respondents have previously moved this Court to grant them a pre-adjudicatory improvement period." The order also makes it clear that due to the complexity of the issues and the need for consideration of conflicting expert testimony, the adjudication process was long. On the date that the court granted the pre-adjudicatory improvement period, the parties were present for the third day of hearings, and were scheduled for a fourth day of hearings. Based on medical reports, and the reports from both the GAL and CASA, the circuit court found that a pre-adjudicatory improvement period was in the best interest of Sean. Rule 23(a) of the West Virginia Rules of Procedure for Child Abuse and Neglect Proceedings provides: "At any time prior to the final adjudicatory hearing, including at the preliminary hearing or emergency custody proceedings, a respondent may move for a pre-adjudicatory improvement period in accordance with W. Va.

Code §§ 49-6-2(b) and 49-6-12(a)." The record demonstrates that the parties had already requested a pre-adjudicatory improvement period. Therefore, because it was prior to the final adjudication, the circuit court was within its authority to grant a pre-adjudicatory improvement period.

We will now turn to the primary issue in this case regarding whether it was error to return Sean to his parents' custody. We have previously indicated that:

> In the law concerning custody of minor children, no rule is more firmly established than that the right of a natural parent to the custody of his or her infant child is paramount to that of any other person; it is a fundamental personal liberty protected and guaranteed by the Due Process Clauses of the West Virginia and United States Constitutions.

Syl. pt. 1, In re Willis, 157 W. Va. 225, 207 S.E.2d 129 (1973). Notwithstanding this Court's recognition of the constitutional rights afforded a natural parent to the custody of his or her child, we have also recognized that such a right is not absolute when we stated "[t]hough constitutionally protected, the right of the natural parent to the custody of minor children is not absolute and it may be limited or terminated by the State, as parens patriae, if the parent is proved unfit to be entrusted with child care." Syl. pt. 5, id.

The WVDHHR sought custody of Sean pursuant to W. Va. Code § 49-1-3(e) (1999) (Repl. Vol. 2004), which states:

> "Imminent danger to the physical well-being of the child" means an emergency situation in which the welfare or the life of > the child is threatened. Such emergency situation exists when there is . . . reasonable cause to believe that the following conditions threaten the health or life of any child in the home: (1) Nonaccidental trauma inflicted by a parent, guardian, custodian, sibling or a babysitter or other caretaker[.]

While there has been no specific finding that Sean was the personal victim of abuse, we have previously recognized that

> "'[w]here there is clear and convincing evidence that a child has suffered physical and/or sexual abuse while in the custody of his or her parent(s), guardian, or custodian, another child residing in the home when the abuse took place who is not a direct victim of the physical and/or sexual abuse but is at risk of being abused is an abused child under W. Va. Code, 49-1-3(a) (1994).' Syl. Pt. 2, In re Christina L., 194 W. Va. 446, 460 S.E.2d 692 (1995)."

Syl. pt. 8, State ex rel. Diva P. v. Kaufman, 200 W. Va. 555, 490 S.E.2d 642 (1997). Therefore, if Dominic was abused, then Sean also qualifies as an abused child[9] because he resided in the same home where the alleged abuse occurred.

The circuit court concluded that there was no evidence that Sean had ever been the victim of abuse and returned him to his parents' custody on July 19, 2005. In determining whether the circuit court's conclusion was clearly wrong, we are guided by the proposition that

[9]W. Va. Code § 49-1-3(a) (1999) (Repl. Vol. 2004), in pertinent part, states that an "'[a]bused child' means a child whose health or welfare is harmed or threatened by: (1) A parent, guardian or custodian who knowingly or intentionally inflicts, attempts to inflict or knowingly allows another person to inflict, physical injury or mental or emotional injury, upon the child or another child in the home[.]"

> "'"W. Va. Code, 49-6-2(c) [1980], requires the State Department of Welfare [now the Department of Health and Human Resources], in a child abuse or neglect case, to prove 'conditions existing at the time of the filing of the petition . . . by clear and convincing proof.' . . . . Syllabus Point 1, In Interest of S.C., 168 W. Va. 366, 284 S.E.2d 867 (1981).' Syllabus Point 1, West Virginia Department of Human Services v. Peggy F., 184 W. Va. 60, 399 S.E.2d 460 (1990)." Syllabus Point 1, In re Beth, 192 W. Va. 656, 453 S.E.2d 639 (1994).

Syl. pt. 3, in part, In re Christina L., 194 W. Va. 446, 460 S.E.2d 692 (1995).

In examining the record, we first note that there is no evidence to support a finding that Sean was ever personally a victim of direct child abuse. Therefore, we look to the evidence surrounding Dominic's death to see if Sean lived in the home with an abused child, and, therefore, also qualifies as an abused child. While medical evidence was submitted that Dominic suffered from SBIS, evidence was also submitted to the contrary. The treating doctors diagnosed Dominic with SBIS; however, we find it significant that the fall from bed was never mentioned as a possible cause of Dominic's problems. It appears that, upon presentation to the hospital, no other option besides SBIS was considered as a possible source of Dominic's problems.[10] As the abuse and neglect case progressed and the GAL became involved, medical evidence was introduced by experts who examined

[10]Even though Dominic was documented high on admission testing for having a clotting abnormality, the treating physicians did not perform any screenings for blood disorders. Also, despite evidence of old blood being present on the CT scan, an MRI was not performed.

Dominic's medical records and autopsy slides.[11] These experts opined that Dominic actually suffered from a head injury that was about fifteen days old, and that his death was caused by a re-bleed[12] of the injured area. Importantly, the timing of this old injury correlates with Dominic's fall from bed onto carpet while visiting at his grandparents' house. The defense experts also explained that Dominic suffered from a coagulation disorder, and this defect would have contributed to the likelihood of a slight fall causing a subdural hematoma, and would further contribute to its likelihood to re-bleed with any trivial movement. In light of the medical evidence, it is impossible to definitively state that Dominic was the victim of SBIS. Substantial evidence suggests Dominic fell from bed and that a chronic subdural hematoma formed that re-bled and caused his death.

In view of the facts presented, the evidence did not establish by clear and convincing proof that Charles abused Dominic. Therefore, there is no basis to find that Sean was an abused child as there is no allegation that he was the direct victim of abuse, and there is an absence of evidence showing that he lived in the same residence as another abused child. Therefore, the circuit court did not clearly err when it returned physical and legal custody of Sean to his parents, Charles and Miranda.

[11]Notably, these experts have refused remuneration for their time and services.

[12]The medical experts also opined that the slightest movement of Dominic could have triggered the re-bleed, the subdural hematoma that caused his death.

IV.

CONCLUSION

For the foregoing reasons, we deny the writ of prohibition and affirm the trial court's decision in its August 8, 2005, order returning custody of Sean to his parents.

Writ of Prohibition Denied.

SUPREME COURT OF APPEALS
OF WEST VIRGINIA

Benjamin, J., concurring:

I commend my fellow justices for their effort and care in the thorough review of the record in this difficult case and their dedication to justice for this family. That there may be disagreement in the outcome of this case is, in my opinion, less a matter of legal dissension than it is an endeavor by each justice to provide for Sean M.'s best interests.

I concur with the majority opinion not only because it is legally sound, but also because I believe that the result reached below, and affirmed by this Court, was necessitated by the particular facts of this case. While I appreciate and agree with the dissent's concerns, I write separately to express my disagreement with the view set out in the dissenting opinion. The dissent reasons that the medical evidence proved that Dominic M. suffered from shaken baby syndrome, and that his father, Charles M., entered a guilty plea to the charge of involuntary manslaughter for Dominic's death. Based on these two factors, the dissent avers that it was error to reunite Sean M. with his family because he is in danger in the presence of his father. Based upon a complete review of the unique and specific facts of this case, especially the ultimate medical conclusions regarding the probable circumstances of Dominic's death, I must disagree.

First, the trial court looked closely at all of the medical record, not just preliminary medical records. This complete medical record is, I believe, of great importance to the determination of whether this family should be reunited or should remain separated. It is understandable why the dissent, as well as many of the initial care givers involved in this case, felt that Dominic died from shaken baby syndrome. When Dominic first presented for treatment, shaken baby syndrome was the only practical option considered as a possible diagnosis. However, as the case progressed and further medical evidence was produced which contradicted the previous diagnosis, it soon became apparent that everyone involved needed to take a very close look at the entirety of the medical facts. When Dominic arrived at the hospital, he suffered from a "large brain bleed" caused from head trauma. His parents, Charles and Miranda, were questioned and were unable to explain their son's injuries. Because of their lack of an explanation, it was assumed that the child had been physically abused and the West Virginia Department of Health and Human Resources ("WVDHHR") was contacted. To be clear, I do not fault the hospital's decision to contact the agency, nor do I fault the WVDHHR's vigorous prosecution of the child abuse and neglect proceedings.

As the investigation continued and a guardian ad litem became involved on Sean's behalf, and the corollary criminal trial of Charles ensued, more evidence was developed and a different explanation for Dominic's injuries began to emerge. It became apparent that Dominic did not suffer from shaken baby syndrome. Not only were the normal signs of shaken baby syndrome absent, but it also became apparent that Dominic suffered from a subdural hematoma and that there was evidence of an "old bleed" in his brain. Much of this evidence was learned after the autopsy, which is significant because it is critical evidence that the initial treating doctors did not have available to them before making a diagnosis of shaken baby syndrome. The experts' testimony regarding the timing of this bleed correlated with the timing of a fall off of a bed at the home of Dominic's grandparents three weeks prior to his death. There was also evidence presented regarding the possibility of Dominic having a clotting disorder. Again, this information was learned post-autopsy and was not available to the treating physicians prior to their provisional diagnosis.

Once all of the evidence was gathered and the experts convened, a very different picture appeared from what was initially thought at the outset of the case. The trial judge initially found that "Dominic . . . suffered from symptoms consistent with Shaken Baby Impact Syndrome," and found that "[t]he infant, Sean . . . should not be returned to the custody of his parents[.]" However, after hearing all of the evidence and hearing the experts' explanation, this same trial judge changed his mind and found that there was no evidence that Sean had ever been the victim of abuse. Sean was ordered returned to the custody of his parents. I am also impressed by the fact that the experts on the behalf of the father felt so strongly about the plight of the father that they refused any payment for their time or travel associated with their review of this case. Also, the Court-Appointed Special Advocate, whose job it is to advocate on behalf of children, supported the position of the parents in this case, and even drove to Charleston, West Virginia, to be present in person to show that support when this case was argued before us. In summary, the overall picture revealed a very different portrayal of Dominic's death than what was initially suggested.

I also cannot agree with the dissent's reliance on the father's entry of an Alford plea to bolster the belief that Sean should not be returned to the custody of his parents. At oral argument before this Court, counsel for the father made it very clear why Charles entered an Alford plea. The family was already deeply in debt from the first criminal trial that was set aside due to juror misconduct. Subsequent to this first trial, new evidence and new experts were found who explained the reality of what happened to Dominic. Counsel for Charles stated at oral argument that the family was facing at least another $100,000.00 in trial expenses to proceed with a second trial, on top of the debt accumulated from the first trial. We were also informed that other family members were putting themselves in debt to support Charles and Miranda in their legal battle. Tragically, Sean has already lost his brother. Then, he was separated from his parents. In the absence of evidence proving that Dominic suffered from shaken baby impact syndrome and the compelling evidence that shows he died of an accidental fall, I cannot fault the circuit court's decision to reunite Sean with his family.

In view of the foregoing, I concur.

Starcher, J., concurring:

I join this Court's majority opinion and write separately to note my strong agreement with the ruling of the distinguished circuit judge, the Honorable Fred Fox, whose ruling the DHHR challenged in the instant case.

To review the facts: this father was first convicted of manslaughter, based on highly-disputed circumstantial evidence – in a trial in which juror misconduct was so severe that Judge Fox found it necessary to set aside the verdict. That does not happen every day.

Shortly before the second trial, the prosecution offered to let the father enter a plea without admitting guilt and be sentenced to probation only. This also is a rare, rare event.

Facing staggering expert witness costs, and just coming out of a trial where the jury was clearly swayed by emotional issues, the father faced a terrible choice. Do I go to trial again, and risk prison and the near-certainty of losing my only living child? Or do I enter a plea, knowing that I will have a fighting chance to regain my family?

I admire this father's choice. Unlike my dissenting colleague, I think that this father's love for his living child was shown in his decision to take the Alford plea.

I know Judge Fox, and he is one of the most strict judges on child welfare and criminal sentencing in this State. Judge Fox is also the most senior sitting judge in our State. It is simply wrong to suggest, as the dissent does, that Judge Fox would put an innocent child at risk.

Accordingly, I concur with the majority opinion.

Maynard, Justice, dissenting:

By upholding the circuit court's decision to return Sean to his father Charles, I fear that this Court has placed Sean in grave danger.

I believe there is clear and convincing evidence that the father's conduct resulted in the death of eight-month-old Dominic. It is significant that Dominic was found to have symptoms consistent with "shaken baby syndrome" when he was taken to the hospital. Qualified doctors from a prominent hospital within our State found that Dominic's injuries were non-accidental. Furthermore, Child Protective Service workers, who are trained in child abuse investigation and detection, concluded that Dominic was the victim of physical abuse, and his father was the most likely suspect.

In addition to the physical evidence of abuse, the father's Alford Plea of guilt to involuntary Manslaughter also indicates that he injured Dominic. I agree with the West Virginia Department of Health and Human Resources that eight-year-old child Sean has no place in a home with a father who pled guilty to involuntary manslaughter in causing the death of his own son. Even though Charles did not technically admit guilt in the plea, the trial court found that "the record in this case supports the conclusion that there is a significant probability that a jury would convict this defendant of the charge contained in the indictment in this case." This indicates to me that the evidence is strong enough to convince a jury beyond a reasonable doubt that Charles is responsible for the death of his son. Moreover, it does not seem logical that a loving father would plead guilty and be forever labeled a child killer if he bore no responsibility for Dominic's death. The burden of the stigma that will now follow Charles for life significantly outweighs the burden of any trial that he would have faced.

Given this compelling evidence, I firmly believe that Sean should never be returned to his father. No child should have to suffer the brutal injuries endured by Dominic. Head trauma of this magnitude caused Dominic more pain than most adults will experience in their lifetime. Then, after an unsuccessful surgery, Dominic died after his life support was removed. In my estimation, returning Sean to his father offers too great a risk that Sean may suffer the same fate as his younger brother. Accordingly, I must dissent to the majority opinion.

Per Curiam:

This is an appeal by Darrell S., biological father of Frances S. and Daryl Jean S., from a July 26, 2002, order of the Circuit Court of Preston County placing Frances and Daryl Jean in the custody of their mother and step-father, Melissa S. R. and David R., during a dispositional improvement period.[1] Melinda Russell, guardian ad litem for Frances and Daryl Jean, is also an Appellant in this action, maintaining that Frances and Daryl Jean should not have been returned to their mother's custody during the dispositional improvement period. Upon thorough review of this matter, we reverse and remand for further proceedings consistent with this opinion.

I. Facts and Procedural History

Subsequent to a divorce between the Appellant Darrell S. and Melissa S., Melissa S. was granted custody of the parties' two daughters, Frances and Daryl Jean.[2] On January 1, 1998, Melissa S. gave birth to Crystal S. whose putative father is not a party to this matter. On September 29, 1999, Melissa S. R. gave birth to David R., Jr., whose father is David R., a party to this action.[3] The Appellant, a resident of Colorado, maintained contact with his two daughters, Frances and Daryl Jean, while they resided with their mother and step-father in Preston County, West Virginia.

On January 17, 2001, the Department of Health and Human Resources (hereinafter "DHHR") filed a child abuse and neglect petition against Melissa S. R. and David R. based upon allegations of domestic violence and alcohol abuse which affected their parenting abilities.[4] In addition to the allegations contained in the petition, further investigation revealed that David R. had pled no contest in 1991 to the charge of sexual abuse of his biological fifteen-year-old daughter, not a party to this action.[5] Information

[3]Melinda Russell also serves as guardian ad litem for Crystal S. and David R., Jr., but she does not assign error to their placement with Melissa and David R. She does, however, assert that her petition for appeal "is also on behalf of all four child respondents in the instant case, regarding the circuit court's improperly giving weight to a psychological test purporting to differentiate between child molesters and non-child molesters."

[4]The petition was premised upon several instances of alleged domestic violence and child neglect, including a referral in November 1999 regarding several police calls to the Melissa S. R. and David R. residence due to instances of domestic violence; a February 2000 referral revealing that the children, including four-month-old David, Jr., had been left at home with the ten-year-old Frances while the parents went out drinking; and a May 2000 incident of domestic violence between David and Melissa in which Melissa had suffered bruises and abrasions on her neck. During that incident, David R. had been armed and had secluded himself in a nearby wooded area. Police helicopters searched the wooded area, and the children fled the house by climbing out a window. The DHHR offered services to the family but encountered lack of cooperation by David and Melissa R. Wellsprings Family Services terminated its assistance to the home due to non-compliance.

gathered during investigation of this petition in West Virginia also revealed that Melissa S. R. had relinquished her parental rights to her first three children in Ohio after she had left those children in the care of her mother and they had been sexually abused by relatives.

Subsequent to a stipulated adjudication in this matter, all four children of Melissa S. R. were placed in foster homes, and Melissa and David R. were granted a six-month post-adjudicatory improvement period. During that post-adjudicatory improvement period, Frances and Daryl Jean were placed in the temporary physical custody of their father, Appellant Darrell S., in Colorado.[6] The girls were transported to Colorado on July 12, 2001. A Colorado child protective services evaluation found that the home of Darrell S. and his wife, Ivy S., was an alcohol-free, safe environment for Frances and Daryl Jean.

During a multi-disciplinary team meeting in August 2001, marital difficulties between David and Melissa R. were revealed, and Melissa thereafter lived in a local Rape and Domestic Violence Shelter from August 22, 2001, to October 3, 2001. In October 2001, allegations of abuse after she had been placed in the custody of her father pursuant to a juvenile delinquency proceeding. Her infant son lived with her mother, and David R. believes that she formulated the sexual abuse story to allow her to return to her mother's home. David R. contends that he pled no contest to the charge to prevent his daughter from being involved in a trial. The daughter later recanted the sexual abuse allegations.

[6]Although Darrell S. previously experienced alcohol-related difficulties, including several DUI convictions and two years in jail, the evidence revealed that he has maintained sobriety since 1993.

the DHHR requested that the lower court find that there was no reasonable likelihood that the conditions of neglect or abuse could be substantially corrected in the near future and recommended that the parental rights of Melissa and David R. be terminated with respect to all four children.[7]

At the conclusion of the post-adjudicatory improvement period, the lower court conducted a dispositional hearing over the course of seventeen days from November 13, 2001, to April 18, 2002. The lower court essentially conducted this extended hearing for the dual purpose of determining the extent to which Melissa and David R. had complied with the requirements of the post-adjudicatory improvement period and deciding the permanent placements for the four children during the dispositional improvement period. Counsel for Appellant Darrell S. was present at the hearings, but was not permitted to participate.[8] [7]This position by the DHHR was based upon the results of psychological evaluations of David and Melissa R. conducted by Dr. Charles William Hewitt and distributed to counsel on September 12, 2001. Dr. Hewitt opined that Melissa and David R. both suffered from severe personality disorders and were unfit parents incapable of participating in any rehabilitative services.

[8]While counsel for Appellant Darrell S. was present at the hearings, he was excluded from participation and appeared only as an observer. On two occasions, the lower court informed counsel for Darrell S. that he was excluded from the hearings and that he was only present by the consent of the other parties. The lower court specifically informed counsel for Darrell S. that placement of the children was not at issue.

The lower court received evidence from DHHR caseworker Jack Wood. Mr. Wood testified that Melissa and David R. had complied with every aspect of their improvement period and had shown significant progress. However, Mr. Wood further explained that the DHHR's recommendation of termination of parental rights had been based upon Dr. Hewitt's psychological assessments conducted in March 2001, before the improvement period began. Dr. Thomas Adamski, a forensic psychiatrist, disagreed with Dr. Hewitt's assessment and concluded that the current behavior of Melissa R. contradicted Dr. Hewitt's conclusions that she was incapable of improvement. Richard Chamberlain, a marriage counselor, testified that Melissa and David R. had participated fully in his counseling program and were genuine in their desire to improve their relationship and parenting skills. Representatives from Burlington United Methodist Family Services also testified that Melissa and David R. were appropriate in their visitation with the children in foster care.

Based upon evidence of improvement by David and Melissa R., the guardian ad litem recommended that Crystal and David, Jr., be returned to Melissa and David R. The guardian ad litem also recommended that Frances and Daryl Jean remain in their father's care in Colorado during the dispositional improvement period.

On May 6, 2002, the lower court issued an opinion letter containing its findings of fact and conclusions of law. The letter included no explicit findings regarding the best interests of the children. In accordance with the opinion letter, the lower court entered an order dated May 15, 2002, granting a six-month dispositional improvement period to Melissa and David R., pursuant to West Virginia Code § 49-6-12(c). Once again, the order failed to include explicit findings regarding the best interests of the children. The lower court noted that Melissa and David R. were receiving sexual offender education and that they appeared motivated to remain sober and free of domestic violence. By the time of the entry of the Mary 15, 2002, order, Frances and Daryl Jean had been living in their father's care in Colorado for an entire school year.

On May 17, 2002, Appellant Darrell S. filed a motion for stay of execution, objecting to the placement of his daughters with their mother and step-father. On May 20, 2002, guardian ad litem Melinda Russell filed a motion for a stay of execution, also objecting to the lower court's placement of Frances and Daryl Jean with Melissa and David. R. during the dispositional improvement period. On May 21, 2002, the DHHR filed a motion for stay of execution, arguing that the four children should not be placed with Melissa and David R.[9] [9]The DHHR subsequently withdrew its request for a stay of the proceedings and indicated its intent not to contest the lower court's order returning the children to Melissa and David R. The DHHR informed this Court, via letter, that it had chosen not to petition for appeal in this matter. The DHHR specified that it does not oppose the relief sought by Darrell S. and the guardian ad litem regarding the placement of Frances and Daryl Jean in the custody of Darrell S. Thus, despite original challenges to the lower court's determination of placement of Crystal and David, Jr., with their mother, the placement of those children is not presented or briefed as an appellate issue before this Court. Therefore, we do not address the placement of the younger children.

In response to the motions for stay, the lower court issued a May 28, 2002, order articulating its acknowledgment that the best interests of Frances and Daryl Jean should be considered in formulating the dispositional improvement period. Thus, the lower court conducted placement reconsideration hearings on June 25, 2002; July 3, 2002; and July 18, 2002. Appellant Darrell S. traveled from Colorado to participate in the hearings. Daryl Jean specifically testified that she wished to remain with her father in Colorado. Frances also testified, but did not wish to express a preference.[10] Through telephone conferencing, the lower court heard the testimony of Valerie White of Boulder County Social Services in Colorado. Ms. White had conducted a home study of the residence of Darrell S. and his wife and had continued to monitor the girls while they lived in Colorado. Ms. White testified that the girls were well-adjusted with their father in Colorado and should remain there. The lower court also heard the testimony of Ms. Dianne Eraker, a counselor for the girls in Colorado. She recommended that the girls remain in Colorado with their father, recognizing the need for stability during this critical stage of adolescence. DHHR caseworker Jack Wood testified that the best interests of the girls would be served by allowing them to remain with their father during their mother's dispositional improvement period. David Walker, a parenting trainer, testified that he wanted to observe the interaction between the girls and Melissa and David R. during his parenting classes.

[10]The July 26, 2002, order recited Frances' testimony, explaining that Frances "was reluctant to express her wishes with respect to where she would prefer to reside, stating instead that she would prefer to 'just leave it up to dad.'"

By order dated July 26, 2002, the lower court found that Frances and Daryl Jean[11] should be returned to the custody of Melissa and David R. during the dispositional improvement period. The court found that "[n]either the Petitioner [DHHR], the Guardian Ad Litem, nor Mr. [S.] offered sufficient evidence compelling enough to justify this Court changing its previous order returning the children to Melissa [R.]." The court did not include explicit findings regarding the best interests of the children and specifically stated that a successful completion of the dispositional improvement period would be required "before making any final decisions regarding placement of the children."

On August 13 and 16, 2002, petitions for appeal to this Court were filed by Darrell S. and guardian ad litem Melinda Russell. Frances and Daryl Jean were returned to West Virginia and have remained in the custody of Melissa and David R. since October 25, 2002. The dispositional improvement period concluded on December 5, 2002, and the lower court granted an additional three-month extension, ending on March 5, 2003.

In this appeal, guardian ad litem Melinda Russell assigns the following errors: (1) abuse of discretion in disrupting the stable lives of Frances and Daryl Jean to return them to the custody of Melissa and David R.; (2) abuse of discretion by rigidly imposing the same disposition on two different sets of half-siblings where different permanency plans were available; and (3) error in giving weight to a sexual offender evaluation of David R. which did not meet the Daubert[12] test for scientific evidence.

Appellant Darrell S. assigns the following assignments of error: (1) error in excluding him from participation[13] in the original hearings; (2) abuse of discretion in failing to consider issues of child custody when deciding residential placement during the dispositional improvement period; (3) error in failing to find that placement of Frances and Daryl Jean with their father was in their best interests.

[12]See Daubert v. Merrell Dow Pharmaceuticals, Inc., 509 U. S. 579 (1993). This assignment of error is premised upon a conclusion reached by licensed psychologist Terry Laurita regarding the issue of whether David R. might engage in child sexual abuse. Ms. Laurita had subjected David R. to a sexual offender evaluation and had concluded that he posed a low risk of sexually offending any child in his care. The evaluation techniques utilized by Ms. Laurita became the subject of debate in this case based upon the Appellant's contention that evidence revealed through such evaluative tool should have been excluded from testimony due to the contention that it did not meet the Daubert test for scientific reliability. The Abel Assessment for Sexual Interest is purported to be an objective test designed to differentiate between child molesters and non-molesters. Our review of Ms. Laurita's conclusions reveals that her assessment of David R. was premised upon several evaluative techniques and was not based exclusively upon the results of any particular questioning tool. We find no error in the presentation of Ms. Laurita's opinion testimony to the lower court.

[13]While Darrell S. was not permitted to participate in the original hearings regarding the results of the improvement period granted to Melissa and David R., it is the opinion of this Court that the lower court remedied any resulting prejudice by permitting Darrell S. to participate fully in the reconsideration hearings. Darrell S. testified and presented the testimony of a Colorado social services worker and a counselor. He was also permitted to introduce evidence regarding the children's academic accomplishments, their activities, pictures of his home, and his monetary income.

This Court has consistently articulated that the two-pronged standard of review set forth in syllabus point one of McCormick v. Allstate Insurance Co., 197 W. Va. 415, 475 S.E.2d 507 (1996) should be employed in child abuse and neglect cases. That syllabus point provides as follows:

> When this Court reviews challenges to the findings and conclusions of the circuit court, a two-prong deferential standard of review is applied. We review the final order and the ultimate disposition under an abuse of discretion standard, and we review the circuit court's underlying factual findings under a clearly erroneous standard.

See also In re Brandon Lee B., 211 W. Va. 587, 567 S.E.2d 597 (2001), cert. denied, 536 U.S. 942 (2002); In re Beth Ann B., 204 W. Va. 424, 513 S.E.2d 472 (1998); State v. Michael M., 202 W. Va. 350, 504 S.E.2d 177 (1998). The following guidance is also provided in syllabus point one of In re Tiffany Marie S., 196 W. Va. 223, 470 S.E.2d 177 (1996):

> Although conclusions of law reached by a circuit court are subject to de novo review, when an action, such as an abuse and neglect case, is tried upon the facts without a jury, the circuit court shall make a determination based upon the evidence and shall make findings of fact and conclusions of law as to whether such child is abused or neglected. These findings shall not be set aside by a reviewing court unless clearly erroneous. A finding is clearly erroneous when, although there is evidence to support the finding, the reviewing court on the entire evidence is left with the definite and firm conviction that a mistake has been committed. However, a reviewing court may not overturn a finding simply because it would have decided the case differently, and it must affirm a finding if the circuit court's > account of the evidence is plausible in light of the record viewed in its entirety.

In the review requested in the case sub judice, it is the lower court's ultimate determination of the custody of Frances and Daryl Jean during the dispositional improvement period that has been challenged. We consequently review that determination under an abuse of discretion standard.

III. Discussion

This Court has historically emphasized that "[i]n a contest involving the custody of an infant the welfare of the child is the polar star by which the discretion of the court will be guided." Syl. Pt. 2, State ex rel. Lipscomb v. Joplin, 131 W. Va. 302, 47 S.E.2d 221 (1948); see also Holstein v. Holstein 152 W. Va. 119, 160 S.E.2d 177 (1968). In Bowens v. Maynard, 174 W. Va. 184, 324 S.E.2d 145 (1984), this Court stated that "[c]hild neglect and abuse procedures that include the custodian of the children in all the proceedings are calculated to achieve a valuable social goal. Their motivating factor is the often stated standard of the 'best interests of the child.'" 174 W. Va. at 186, 324 S.E.2d at 147. This Court has not deviated from that principle, and it has become the ultimate benchmark by which all custody decisions are appraised. While this Court has also observed that the rights of the parents are entitled to respect and protection , the rights of the children are paramount, as accentuated in syllabus point three of In re Katie S., 198 W. Va. 79, 479 S.E.2d 589 (1996): "Although parents have substantial rights that must be protected, the primary goal in cases involving abuse and neglect, as in all family law matters, must be the health and welfare of the children."[14]

Rule 38 of the West Virginia Rules of Procedure for Child Abuse and Neglect Proceedings, regarding hearings subsequent to improvement periods and final disposition, also recognizes the importance of the best interests of the child in this context, providing in pertinent part as follows:

> No later than sixty (60) days after the end of the alternative disposition improvement period, the court shall hold a hearing to determine the final disposition of the case, including whether the conditions of abuse and/or neglect have been adequately improved in accordance with W. Va. Code § 49-6-5(c). The court also shall determine the necessary disposition consistent with the best interests of the child. . . .

Particularly crucial to this Court's evaluation of this custody issue is the testimony of one of the children, twelve-year-old Daryl Jean. During her testimony, she explicitly stated that she preferred to remain living with her father in Colorado. As this Court has repeatedly recognized, children over the age of fourteen are capable of deciding custody issues for themselves, and the opinions of children approaching that age must also be earnestly considered. As this Court explained in David M. v. Margaret M., 182 W. Va. 57, 385 S.E.2d 912 (1989).

[14]The polar star guidance is particularly applicable in the abuse and neglect context, as we recognized in syllabus point eight of In re Willis, 157 W. Va. 225, 207 S.E.2d 129 (1973):

> Once a court exercising proper jurisdiction has made a determination upon sufficient proof that a child has been neglected and his natural parents were so derelict in their duties as to be unfit, the welfare of the infant is the polar star by which the discretion of the court is to be guided in making its award of legal custody. Even then, the legal rights of the parents, being founded in nature and wisdom, will be respected unless they have been transferred or abandoned.

> In the child custody context, children fall into one of three groups, depending on their age. Children under six years of age are called "children of tender years": They are the most dependent on their parents, but they usually cannot articulate an intelligent opinion about their custody. Children between six and fourteen are also dependent on their parents, but they can usually articulate a preference regarding custody arrangements and explain their reasons. By the age of fourteen a child takes on many of the qualities of an adult; in most cases, unless geography interferes, a child over fourteen will decide for himself or herself the parent with whom he or she wants to live, regardless of what a court says.

182 W. Va. at 64, 385 S.E.2d at 919-20 (footnotes omitted). This Court's observations regarding a child's contribution to the custody determination are based upon concepts contained in West Virginia Code § 44-10-4 (1923) (Repl. Vol. 1997), regarding the right of a minor to nominate his or her guardian.

> If the minor is above the age of fourteen years, he may in the presence of the county court, or in writing acknowledged before any officer authorized to take the acknowledgment of a deed, nominate his own guardian, who, if approved by the court, shall be appointed accordingly; and if the guardian nominated by such minor shall not be appointed by the court, or if the minor shall reside without the State, or if, after being summoned, he shall neglect to nominate a suitable person, the court may appoint the guardian in the same manner as if the minor were under the age of fourteen years.

In Rose v. Rose, 176 W. Va. 18, 340 S.E.2d 176 (1986), this Court discussed the issue of consulting children regarding custody selections and explained that the child's preference is not "binding on the trial court" and the parties may "introduce evidence to rebut the child's testimony." Id. at 179 n. 3, 340 S.E.2d at 178 n. 3. The Rose Court also emphasized as follows:

> [A]n inquiry should be made into the child's intelligence and maturity to see if the child's choice was intelligently made. Equally important, however, is the child's rationale for his decision. In order to be accorded weight, a child's preference for one parent over the other ought to be based on good reason.

Id. at 21 n. 4, 340 S.E.2d at 179 n.4. The Rose Court stated that "[i]n making its examination of the child, the trial court should try to explore several aspects of the child's decision." Id. at 21 n. 4, 340 S.E.2d at 179 n. 4. Guidelines were offered regarding the lower court's determination, as follows:

> 1. The trial court should give greater weight to the wishes of a child which are expressed with strength, clearness, or with great sincerity. . . .
> 2. A child's preference should be given less weight where it appears that the preference is based on a desire for less rigid discipline or restraint. . . .
>
> 3. The trial court should investigate whether the statement of preference by the child was induced by the party in whose favor the preference was expressed. If so, said statement of preference should be accorded little, if any, weight. . . .
> 4. Where an otherwise intelligent child makes an illogical decision based on unimportant factors, the trial court may disregard the child's statement of preference. . . .

Id. at 21 n. 4, 340 S.E.2d at 179 n.4.

In Judith R. v. Hey, 185 W. Va. 117, 405 S.E.2d 447 (1990), this Court observed that the child in question was over the age of fourteen years and recognized that "the legislature of this state has granted her the right to nominate her own guardian." Id. at 120, 405 S.E.2d at 450. The Court explained: "While W.Va.Code § 44-10-4 (1982) applies to circumstances where a guardian is to be appointed in lieu of a natural parent, we have previously found the statute to be 'evidence of the legislature's conclusion concerning the age at which an adolescent should be given some substantial say in his own affairs.' S.H. v. R.L.H., 169 W. Va. 550, 555, 289 S.E.2d 186, 189 (1982)." Id.

Analyses of the best interests of a child and assessments of the child's own preferences for placement are necessarily fraught with uncertainties and speculation regarding the most appropriate custody resolution. This Court has repeatedly encountered child custody battles in which neither parent presents a commendable record of stellar parenting skills. Alcohol abuse, prior criminal convictions, and allegations of prior sexual misconduct are unfortunate realities in these conflicts we seek to resolve. Courts are often faced with the difficult task of choosing between the lesser of two evils and placing the child in the environment which appears to present the fewest risks. As Justice Starcher observed in his concurrence to in In re Emily, 208 W. Va. 325, 540 S.E.2d 542 (2000),

> While we may not be able to provide every child with the perfect, white bread, cookie-cutter childhood replete with sitcom-like suburban experiences, the court system must fashion a solution that provides protection for children, with a reasonable opportunity to reach adulthood safely and in as good physical and mental health as practicable.

208 W. Va. at 345, 540 S.E.2d at 562 (Starcher, J., concurring).

Given the circumstances with which the lower court was presented in the present case, we conclude that the lower court abused its discretion by ordering the transfer of custody of Frances and Daryl Jean from Darrell S. to Melissa and David R. during the dispositional improvement period. The lower court was presented with the direct testimony of Daryl Jean that she preferred to live with her father in Colorado. Further, the Colorado home study report indicated that the living environment was appropriate, and the therapist who had counseled Frances and Daryl Jean in Colorado testified that it would be within Frances and Daryl Jean's best interests to remain with their father. Due to the passage of time, however, placement during the dispositional improvement period is no longer an issue. That improvement period has concluded, and the lower court must now determine the permanent placement of the children.[15]

[15]In Israel by Israel v. West Virginia Secondary Schools Activities Comm'n, 182 W. Va. 454, 388 S.E.2d 480 (1989), this Court examined the circumstances under which technically moot issues would still require the attention of this Court. Syllabus point one provides as follows:

> Three factors to be considered in deciding whether to

This Court has explained that "[t]o justify a change of child custody, in addition to a change in circumstances of the parties, it must be shown that such change would materially promote the welfare of the child." Syl. Pt. 2, Cloud v. Cloud, 161 W. Va. 45, 239 S.E.2d 669 (1977). While we understand the lower court's reluctance to remove Frances and Daryl Jean from the custody of their mother, the best interests of the children must be fully evaluated and Daryl Jean's stated preference must be recognized. In order to facilitate a thorough evaluation of those issues, the lower court should conduct a hearing upon remand which specifically addresses the preferences of Frances and Daryl Jean and fully explores issues surrounding their best interests. The lower court should provide the biological father and the biological mother with meaningful opportunity to be heard, including the right to address technically moot issues are as follows: first, the court will determine whether sufficient collateral consequences will result from determination of the questions presented so as to justify relief; second, while technically moot in the immediate context, questions of great public interest may nevertheless be addressed for the future guidance of the bar and of the public; and third, issues which may be repeatedly presented to the trial court, yet escape review at the appellate level because of their fleeting and determinate nature, may appropriately be decided.

In the present case, the lower court's determinations regarding custody during the dispositional improvement period reflected inadequate consideration of the best interests of Frances and Daryl Jean and the explicit testimony of Daryl Jean regarding her preference for custody. These precise issues will have to be developed and evaluated during the lower court's determination of the permanent custody issues; we consequently find that "sufficient collateral consequences will result" from this Court's determinations in this case "so as to justify relief." Israel, 182 W. Va. at 455, 388 S.E.2d at 481, syl. pt. 1.

testify and to present and cross-examine witnesses. In all custody matters, "we have traditionally held paramount the best interests of the child." Syl. Pt. 5, in part, Carter v. Carter, 196 W. Va. 239, 470 S.E.2d 193 (1996).

"Cases involving children must be decided not just in the context of competing sets of adults' rights, but also with a regard for the rights of the child(ren)." In re Brian D., 194 W. Va. 623, 636, 461 S.E.2d 129, 142 (1995). The question at the dispositional phase of a child abuse and neglect proceeding is not simply whether the parent has successfully completed his or her assigned tasks during the improvement period. Rather, the pivotal question is what disposition is consistent with the best interests of the child. In the present case, the lives of Frances and Daryl Jean have been severely uprooted during the legal processes of this abuse and neglect proceeding. Despite the efforts of the Melissa and David R. to rectify their deficiencies, simple reunification may not be in the best interests of Frances and Daryl Jean, and the lower court's evaluation on remand must fully address those best interests in determining a disposition which most effectively serves the children.

Reversed and Remanded with Directions.

Supreme Court Of Appeals Of West Virginia

STATE OF WEST VIRGINIA EX REL. GEORGE B. W., Petitioner

v.

HONORABLE TOD J. KAUFMAN, JUDGE OF THE CIRCUIT COURT OF KANAWHA COUNTY, and SHARON B. W.,Respondents

No. 23927

Submitted: January 15, 1997

Filed: March 3, 1997

SYLLABUS BY THE COURT

1. Although a court may enter an emergency order transferring custody where there are allegations of abuse or neglect without notice and full hearing if the court deems such an order necessary for the immediate protection of the child(ren), such order should be of limited duration, should set a prompt and full hearing on the allegations, and should apprise both parties of the scope of the hearing. In the event such emergency change is found to be warranted, the court should immediately appoint a guardian ad litem for the child.

2. "In determining whether to grant a rule to show cause in prohibition when a court is not acting in excess of its jurisdiction, this Court will look to the adequacy of other available remedies such as appeal and to the over-all economy of effort and money among litigants, lawyers and courts; however, this Court will use prohibition in this discretionary way to correct only substantial, clear-cut, legal errors plainly in contravention of a clear statutory, constitutional, or common law mandate which may be resolved independently of any disputed facts and only in cases where there is a high probability that the trial will be completely reversed if the error is not corrected in advance." Syl. Pt. 1, Hinkle v. Black, 164 W.Va. 112, 262 S.E.2d 744 (1979).

3. "In visitation as well as custody matters, we have traditionally held paramount the best interests of the child." Syl. Pt. 5, Carter v. Carter, 196 W.Va. 239, 470 S.E.2d 193 (1996).

4. "Because of the extraordinary nature of supervised visitation, such visitation should be ordered when necessary to protect the best interests of the children. In determining the best interests of the children when there are allegations of sexual or child abuse, the circuit court should weigh the risk of harm of supervised visitation or the deprivation of any visitation to the parent who allegedly committed the abuse if the allegations are false against the risk of harm of unsupervised visitation to the child if the allegations are true." Syl. Pt. 3, Carter v.

5. "Where supervised visitation is ordered pursuant to W. Va. Code, 48-2-15(b)(1) [1991], the best interests of a child include determining that the child is safe from the fear of emotional and psychological trauma which he or she may experience. The person(s) appointed to supervise the visitation should have had some prior contact with the child so that the child is sufficiently familiar with and trusting of that person in order for the child to have secure feelings and so that the visitation is not harmful to his or her emotional well being. Such a determination should be incorporated as a finding of the family law master or circuit court." Syl. Pt. 3, Mary D. v. Watt, 190 W. Va. 341, 438 S.E.2d 521 (1992).

6. "Prior to ordering supervised visitation pursuant to W.Va.Code, 48-2-15(b)(1) [1991], if there is an allegation involving whether one of the parents sexually abused the child involved, a family law master or circuit court must make a finding with respect to whether that parent sexually abused the child. A finding that sexual abuse has occurred must be supported by credible evidence. The family law master or circuit court may condition such supervised visitation upon the offending parent seeking treatment. Prior to ordering supervised visitation, the family law master or circuit court should weigh the risk of harm of such visitation or the deprivation of any visitation to the parent who allegedly committed the sexual abuse against the risk of harm of such visitation to the child. Furthermore, the family law master or circuit court should ascertain that the allegation of sexual abuse under these circumstances is meritorious and if made in the context of the family law proceeding, that such allegation is reported to the appropriate law enforcement agency or prosecutor for the county in which the alleged sexual abuse took place. Finally, if the sexual abuse allegations were previously tried in a criminal case, then the transcript of the criminal case may be utilized to determine whether credible evidence exists to support the allegations. If the transcript is utilized to determine that credible evidence does or does not exist, the transcript must be made a part of the record in the civil proceeding so that this Court, where appropriate, may adequately review the civil record to conclude whether the lower court abused its discretion." Syl. Pt. 2, Mary D. v. Watt, 190 W. Va. 341, 438 S.E.2d 521 (1992).

7. "In order for a trial court to determine whether to grant a party's request for additional physical or psychological examinations, the requesting party must present the judge with evidence that he has a compelling need or reason for the additional examinations. In making the determination, the judge should consider: (1) the nature of the examination requested and the intrusiveness inherent in that examination; (2) the victim's age; (3) the resulting physical and/or emotional effects of the examination on the victim; (4) the probative value of the examination to the issue before the court; (5) the remoteness in time of the examination to the alleged criminal act; and (6) the evidence already available for the defendant's use." Syl. Pt. 3, State v. Delaney, 187 W.Va. 212, 417 S.E.2d 903 (1992).

Workman, Justice:
In this petition for a writ of prohibition and emergency stay of an order of the Circuit Court of Kanawha County, we grant the writ as molded and direct that a hearing be held within ten days on the issues of visitation and whether additional examinations should be conducted on the subject child. See footnote 1

I. Factual Background

Subsequent to the Respondent Sharon B. W.'s (hereinafter "Respondent"), August 1995 petition for divorce from Petitioner George B. W. (hereinafter "Petitioner"), temporary custody of the parties' only child, four-year-old Ben W. (hereinafter "the child"), was granted to the Respondent. During visitation with the Petitioner in the summer of 1996, the child allegedly accused his mother's boyfriend of sexual abuse, See footnote 2 and the Petitioner immediately retained the services of Dr. Timothy Freeman. See footnote 3 Dr. Freeman interviewed the child and summarized the allegations of abuse in a document which was presented to the lower court on August 16, 1996. The Petitioner requested an emergency order relieving him of the obligation to return the child to the Respondent, and based upon the allegations of sexual abuse, the lower court entered an emergency order providing that the Petitioner should temporarily retain custody of the child. See footnote 4 On August 19, 1997, Dr. Freeman wrote to the Respondent's attorney, informing him of Dr. Freeman's recommendation that the child should not be in the company of his mother until "a point in . . .[his] therapy warrants his ability to sustain such visit without psychological discomfort."

Both parties thereafter moved for the appointment of a guardian ad litem for the child, and the matter was assigned to Family Law Master Charles Phalen, Jr. During a September 11, 1996, hearing, the family law master and the parties' attorneys discussed issues of the appointment of a guardian ad litem, the arrangements for psychiatric examination of the parents and the child, and the equitable distribution and alimony issues which had been pending prior to the allegations of sexual abuse. The only testimony taken was from the Petitioner and the Respondent for the purpose of establishing the jurisdictional information sufficient to grant a divorce. Subsequent to that hearing, the family law master directed as follows:

> Both parties and the minor child s hall be made available for evaluation by an expert or experts concerning issues of custody, visitation, and allegat ions of sexu al abuse. The parties m ay select their own experts, or they may jointly select one expert, for purposes of evaluati on. Any s ession with the parties or the minor child conducted as part of s uch evaluation shall be audio and video taped. The professional conducting the evaluation may elect to have present at any session suc h ot her persons, including but not lim ited to the parties and t he m inor c hild, as the pr ofessional m ay consider appropriate for purposes of the evaluation process.

Pursuant to the discussions between the parties' attorneys and the family law master during the September 11, 1996, hearing, attorney Beverly Selby was appointed as guardian ad litem for the child by order dated September 19, 1996. In her interim report dated September 26, 1996, Ms. Selby discussed the child's fear of his mother and discomfort with the thought of seeing her. Ms. Selby also indicated that she had spoken with Katheryne Smith of Directional Analysis, Incorporated, regarding her willingness to supervise the visitation.

By letter dated October 3, 1996, Dr. Freeman informed Family Law Master Phalen of the deleterious effects of supervised visitation or even telephone contact with the mother upon the child's therapy regarding the sexual abuse. Dr. Freeman's letter also addressed the child's opposition to any telephone or personal contact. By letter dated November 6, 1996, guardian ad litem Beverly Selby apprised family law master Phalen of her position that telephone calls with the Respondent, even if supervised, were not in the best interests of the child. Her conclusions in this regard were apparently premised upon Dr. Freeman's recommendation and the wishes of the child.

On November 7, 1996, Family Law Master Phalen ordered Directional Analysis, the neutral expert suggested by the guardian ad litem, to facilitate supervised telephone visitation between the child and the Respondent. By letter to Family Law Master Phalen dated November 18, 1996, Katheryne Smith of Directional Analysis expressed her concern that supervised visitation may be harmful to the child at this stage and requested additional time to investigate the case.

On December 15, 1996, the Respondent appeared at a Charleston restaurant at which the child and the Petitioner were dining. The Respondent allegedly began yelling the child's name and creating a disturbance before the Petitioner was able to remove the child from the restaurant. On December 16, 1996, the Respondent filed a motion in the lower court to compel the Petitioner to present the child for a psychological evaluation by Dr. Richard Gardner, a clinical child psychiatrist from New York, in which the mother would potentially be present, at the discretion of Dr. Gardner. See footnote 5 The lower court granted that motion by order entered on December 18, 1996, without a hearing or consultation with the guardian ad litem, the family law master, or the court-assigned supervisor, Ms. Smith of Directional Analysis. See footnote 6 The lower court stated that the family law master had unequivocally expressed his position on the issues. The Petitioner was given one of three days in December 1996 to produce the child for evaluation by Dr. Gardner.

By letter dated December 19, 1996, Dr. Freeman informed the lower court of the potential harm to the child from being subjected to another interview and recitation of the details of the sexual abuse. Ms. Smith also advised the lower court, by letter dated December 19, 1996, of her concerns regarding the appropriateness of evaluation and/or visitation.

The Petitioner contends that the lower court's entry of the order requiring evaluation constitutes an abuse of discretion and seeks a writ of prohibition against the lower court, an order requiring a hearing on the matter, and such other relief as may be required. Pursuant to Rule 14(b) of the West Virginia Rules of Appellate Procedure, See footnote 7 the proceedings below were automatically stayed upon this Court's issuance of a rule to show cause on December 20, 1996.

II. Change of Custody

It appears from the record that the lower court, by order dated August 16, 1996, entered an ex parte emergency order which temporarily altered the custody arrangements based on the document prepared by Dr. Freeman. It is of concern that no petition for modification and no hearing on that issue was held or apparently even scheduled. Although a court may enter an emergency order transferring custody where there are allegations of abuse or neglect without notice and full hearing if the court deems such an order necessary for the immediate protection of the child(ren), such order should be of limited duration, should set a prompt and full hearing on the allegations, and should apprise both parties of the scope of the hearing. In the event such emergency change is found to be warranted, the court should immediately appoint a guardian ad litem for the child.

III. Criteria for Awarding a Writ of Prohibition

In syllabus point one of Hinkle v. Black, 164 W.Va. 112, 262 S.E.2d 744 (1979), we addressed the appropriate use of a writ of prohibition, and observed:

> In determining whether to grant a rule to show cause in prohibition when a court is not acting in excess of its jurisdiction, this Court will look to the adequacy of other available remedies such as appeal and to the over-all economy of effort and money among litigants, lawyers and courts; however, this Court will use prohibition in this discretionary way to correct only substantial, clear-cut, legal errors plainly in contravention of a clear statutory, constitutional, or common law mandate which may be resolved independently of any disputed facts and only in cases where there is a high probability that the trial will be completely reversed if the error is not corrected in advance.

IV. Visitation

The right to contact by a parent with his or her child is an important one, not easily removed. Certainly, a non-offending parent has a clear right to custody or visitation with his or her child. As we explained in syllabus point two of Hammack v. Wise, 158 W.Va. 343, 211 S.E.2d 118 (1975), and have consistently maintained,

"A parent has the natural right to the custody of his or her infant child and, unless the parent is an unfit person because of misconduct, neglect, immorality, abandonment, or other dereliction of duty, or has waived such right, or by agreement or otherwise has permanently transferred, relinquished or surrendered such custody, the right of the parent to the custody of his or her infant child will be recognized and enforced by the courts."

Id. at 343, 211 S.E.2d at 119 (quoting Syllabus, State ex rel. Kiger v. Hancock, 153 W. Va. 404 [,] 168 S.E.2d [798] (1969)). Even where there are allegations of abuse and/or neglect, parents whose rights have not been terminated generally have a right to continued contact with the child, although such visitation may be supervised for the protection of the child. See footnote 8

In syllabus point five of Carter v. Carter, 196 W.Va. 239, 470 S.E.2d 193 (1996), for instance, we explained: "In visitation as well as custody matters, we have traditionally held paramount the best interests of the child." Id. at 241, 470 S.E.2d at 195. We emphasized that "[t]he best interests of the children should determine the pace of any visitation modification to assure that the children's emotional and physical well being is not harmed." 196 W.Va. at 246, 470 S.E.2d at 200. In syllabus point three of Carter, we reasoned:

> Because of the extraord inary nature of supervised vis itation, such visitation should be ordered w hen necessary to protect the best interests of the children. In dete rmining the best interests of the children when there are allegations of sexual or child abuse, the circuit court should weigh the ris k of harm of supervis ed visitation or the de privation of any visita tion t o t he parent w ho allegedl y committed the abuse if the allegations are false against the risk of harm of unsupervised visitation to the child if the allegations are true.

We have also held that the nature of supervision must be designed for the child's protection, both physical and emotional. In Mary D. v. Watt, 190 W.Va. 341, 438 S.E.2d 521 (1992), we encountered a situation in which the allegedly abusive father had been tried on charges of sexual abuse and acquitted. We noted, however, that "being found 'not guilty' under the criminal standard of 'beyond a reasonable doubt' will not necessarily ease the emotional and psychological trauma, if any, suffered by the children if visitation, even if supervised, were to continue." 190 W. Va. at 347, 438 S.E.2d at 527. Chief Justice McHugh enumerated specific guidelines for the development of a safe and secure atmosphere in which supervised visitation, where appropriate, may be exercised.

Where supervised visitation is ordered pursuant to W. Va. Code, 48-2-15(b)(1) [1991], the best interests of a child include determining that the child is safe from the fear of emotional and psychological trauma which he or she may experience. The person(s) appointed to supervise the visitation should have had some prior contact with the child so that the child is sufficiently familiar with and trusting of that person in order for the child to have secure feelings and so that the visitation is not harmful to his or her emotional well being. Such a determination should be incorporated as a finding of the family law master or circuit court.

Syl. Pt. 3, 190 W.Va. at 343, 438 S.E.2d at 523. In syllabus point two of Mary D., we addressed the circumstances under which a circuit court could consider an award of visitation rights to an alleged sexual offender:

> Prior to ordering supervised visitation pursuant to W.Va.Code, 48-2-15(b)(1) [1991], if there is an allegation involving whether one of the parents sexually abused the child involved, a family law master or circuit court must make a finding with respect to whether that parent sexually abused the child. A finding that sexual abuse has occurred must be supported by credible evidence. The family law master or circuit court may condition such supervised visitation upon the offending parent seeking treatment. Prior to ordering supervised visitation, the family law master or circuit court should weigh the risk of harm of such visitation or the deprivation of any visitation to the parent who allegedly committed the sexual abuse against the risk of harm of such visitation to the child. Furthermore, the family law master or circuit court should ascertain that the allegation of sexual abuse under these circumstances is meritorious and if made in the context of the family law proceeding, that such allegation is reported to the appropriate law enforcement agency or prosecutor for the county in which the alleged sexual abuse took place. Finally, if the sexual abuse allegations were previously tried in a criminal case, then the transcript of the criminal case may be utilized to determine whether credible evidence exists to support the allegations. If the transcript is utilized to determine that credible evidence does or does not exist, the transcript must be made a part of the record in the civil proceeding so that this Court, where appropriate, may adequately review the civil record to conclude whether the lower court abused its discretion

We recognized in Mary Ann P. v. William R.P., Jr., 197 W. Va. 1, 475 S.E.2d 1 (1996), that under some circumstances visitation could be totally suspended, at least until the family underwent therapy. In Mary Ann P., we determined that the record before us was "clear that forced visitation at this time would be detrimental to the children and futile on the defendant's behalf without professional intervention." 197 W. Va . at __, 475 S.E.2d at 8; see also Ledsome v. Ledsome, 171 W.Va. 602, 301 S.E.2d 475 (1983); Lufft v. Lufft, 188 W.Va. 339, 343, 424 S.E.2d 266, 270 (1992) (explaining that the right to visitation is determined by considering the child's welfare). In Mary Ann P., we also clothed the circuit court with the responsibility of determining when supervised visitation should resume and to "set forth a specific visitation schedule that takes into account the best interest of the children and the defendant's interest in attaining a close relationship with his sons." 197 W. Va. at ___, 475 S.E.2d at 8 (citing Weber v. Weber, 193 W.Va. 551, 457 S.E.2d 488 (1995); W. Va. Code, 48-2-15(b)(1993)). We also ordered the circuit court to determine whether the parties could agree on counseling or therapy for the children and their father. If no agreement could be reached, we instructed the lower court to "take any additional evidence needed and direct the participation in such counseling as a condition of the continuation of the plan for restoring visitation." Mary Ann P., 197 W. Va. at ___, 475 S.E.2d at 8.

As recognized in the concurrence to Mary Ann P., "[w]hen . . . there is credible evidence of sexual abuse, the risk of harm to the child weighs heavily in this balance, and courts should err on the side of caution if necessary to protect children at risk of possible abuse." 197 W. Va. at ___, 475 S.E.2d at 10. We emphasized in In re Carlita B., 185 W.Va. 613, 408 S.E.2d 365 (1991):

> In the difficult balance which must be fashioned between the rights of the parent and the welfare of the child, we have consistently emphasized that the paramount and controlling factor must be the child's welfare. "[A]ll parental rights in child custody matters," we have stressed, "are subordinate to the interests of the innocent child." David M. [v. Margaret M.], [182 W.Va. 57, 60,] 385 S.E.2d [912] at 916 [(1989)].

Commentators on the issue of appropriate limitation or termination of visitation have recognized that: "Sexual abuse of a child by a parent or by others while the child is under the parent's care or control may result in termination or restriction of visitation rights. In some circumstances, the court will terminate or deny visitation entirely." John P. McCahey et al., Child Custody & Visitation Law and Practice 16.10[1] (1996).

It is a rare instance in which a parent should be denied all contact with a child. An essential element of our cases involving allegations of abuse by a parent is the necessity for the family law master or circuit court to hold hearings to ascertain the most viable approach to the resolution of the difficult issues which will inevitably be inherent in such matters. In the instant case, it is of great concern that no hearings were held on the sexual abuse or the visitation issues. It is also of great concern that a parent's right to all contact with a very young child was extinguished without any meaningful hearing on the issue.

The Petitioner suggests the child has been abused and that his mother, at a minimum, failed to protect him. The Respondent suggests that the Petitioner has manipulated the child into creating the sexual abuse allegations in order to accomplish this result, and suggests that the extinguishment of all communications with the mother allows total manipulation of this very young child. Whether any of these allegations have merit, we do not know. We do know, however, that these issues certainly merit prompt and full hearing below and not the entry of orders upon mere allegations.

V. Additional Evaluation of the Child

In State v. Delaney, 187 W.Va. 212, 417 S.E.2d 903 (1992), we were confronted with the issue of multiple physical and psychological evaluations for seven- and eight-year-old victims. 187 W. Va. at 215-17, 417 S.E.2d at 906-08. In syllabus point three of that opinion, we enumerated the following factors for consideration: In order for a trial court to determine whether to grant a party's request for additional physical or psychological examinations, the requesting party must present the judge with evidence that he has a compelling need or reason for the additional examinations. In making the determination, the judge should consider: (1) the nature of the examination requested and the intrusiveness inherent in that examination; (2) the victim's age; (3) the resulting physical and/or emotional effects of the examination on the victim; (4) the probative value of the examination to the issue before the court; (5) the remoteness in time of the examination to the alleged criminal act; and (6) the evidence already available for the defendant's use.

Presented with a request for additional evaluation, the lower court in Delaney had concluded that additional inquiries were not necessary. 187 W. Va. at 216, 417 S.E.2d at 907. We agreed with the lower court's determination, reasoning that "[g]iven the effect of a probing mental interrogation on children of their tender years, . . .the probative value to the appellant was outweighed by the trauma and intrusiveness to the victims. . . .Since we cannot find that the appellant's need is greater or more compelling than the burden it would impose on the victims, the trial court did not abuse its discretion in denying the appellant's request." Id. at 217, 417 S.E.2d at 908 (footnote omitted); see also State v. Miller, 195 W. Va. 656, 466 S.E.2d 507 (1995).

In a criminal context, West Virginia Code 61-8B-14 (1992) dictates that "the court may provide by rule for reasonable limits on the number of interviews to which a victim who is a child who is eleven years old or less must submit for law enforcement or discovery purposes." In Burdette v. Lobban, 174 W.Va. 120, 323

S.E.2d 601 (1984), we recognized the necessity of providing protection for the child victim:

> A parent accused of sexual a buse by his minor child has a constitutional right to know of what his child accuses him in order to prepare his defense. B ut certainly the child victim has a conc urrent right t o be protected against un restrained private examination by adverse interests. Child victim s of sexual abuse doubtless have undergone a horrifying experience.

174 W. Va. at 121-22, 323 S.E.2d at 603; see generally, Alison R. McBurney, Note, Bitter Battles: The Use of Psychological Evaluations in Child Custody Disputes in West Virginia, 97 W. Va. L. Rev. 773 (1995).

With regard to the civil context, Rule 35(a) of the West Virginia Rules of Civil Procedure provides as follows:

> (a) Order for Examination .--When the mental or physical condition (including the blo od group) of a part y, or of a person in the custody or under t he legal control of a pa rty, is in c ontroversy, the c ourt i n which the action is pendi ng m ay or der the party to subm it to a physical or m ental exam ination by a physician or other qualified expert or t o pr oduce for exam ination the person in his custody or legal control. The order may be made only on motion for good cause shown and upon notice to the person to be examined and to all parties and shall specify the tim e, place, manner, conditions, and scope of the examination and the pers on or persons by whom it is to be made.

W. Va. R. Civ. P. 35(a). While Delaney was decided in the context of a criminal investigation of alleged abuse, the principles regarding additional evaluations of the victim are equally applicable in the civil context.

Based upon the foregoing, the writ of prohibition is granted as molded with respect to the issue of the additional evaluation, and this case is remanded to the Circuit Court of Kanawha County for further proceedings on the issues of modification of custody; supervised visitation, if merited; and expert evaluation of the child. The exploration of the expert evaluation issue on remand must include consideration of the factors enumerated in Delaney, and any order entered in connection with this matter should include findings of fact and conclusions of law in relation thereto. It appears that the lower court attempted to afford the Respondent mother visitation and contact in a manner that would protect the child from actual harm. The chief shortcoming of the supervised visitation order is that it was entered without benefit of a hearing, both as to whether it provided adequate contact for the parent and child to sustain a relationship and whether the child was adequately protected from emotional harm. The court should hold a full hearing on the visitation issue within ten days unless otherwise agreed upon by the parties, and the court should fashion a plan for temporary visitation and for custody.

Writ granted as moulded.

Footnote: 2 The child allegedly indicated to his father that, while residing in Tennessee with his mother, her boyfriend, and the boyfriend's eleven-year-old daughter, the following activities occurred: the boyfriend masturbated in front of the child; the boyfriend placed his hand in the child's pocket and touched the child's penis; the boyfriend's penis was called a "whip" because the child would be whipped with it as it became larger; the boyfriend would pinch the child's penis; and "white stuff" would come out of the boyfriend's penis. These activities allegedly occurred in the presence of the child's mother. In the mother's response to the petition for writ of prohibition, she denies she ever sexually abused the child or permitted such abuse, and denies that she ever resided with the man in question, who she characterizes as a "former boyfriend."

In an article entitled, "Gardner's Law; A Controversial Psychiatrist and Influential Witness Leads the Backlash Against Child Sex Abuse 'Hysteria,'" the author discussed Dr. Gardner's frequent appearance as an expert witness and media commentator representing the view that the United States is in a state of child-abuse hysteria. The article referenced Dr. Gardner's "Parental Alienation Syndrome," holding that some parents, afraid of losing custody, actively disparage the other parent and indoctrinate the child that abuse has occurred. Critics maintain that there is scant empirical evidence supporting many of Dr. Gardner's theories. SYLLABUS BY THE COURT

1. “Although conclusions of law reached by a circuit court are subject to de novo review, when an action, such as an abuse and neglect case, is tried upon the facts without a jury, the circuit court shall make a determination based upon the evidence and shall make findings of fact and conclusions of law as to whether such child is abused or neglected. These findings shall not be set aside by a reviewing court unless clearly erroneous. A finding is clearly erroneous when, although there is evidence to support the finding, the reviewing court on the entire evidence is left with the definite and firm conviction that a mistake has been committed. However, a reviewing court may not overturn a finding simply because it would have decided the case differently, and it must affirm a finding if the circuit court's account of the evidence is plausible in light of the record viewed in its entirety.” Syl. Pt. 1, In re Tiffany Marie S., 196 W. Va. 223, 470 S.E.2d 177 (1996).

2. Where there has been a prior involuntary termination of parental rights to a sibling, the issue of whether the parent has remedied the problems which led to the prior involuntary termination sufficient to parent a subsequently-born child must, at minimum, be reviewed by a court, and such review should be initiated on a petition pursuant to the provisions governing the procedure in cases of child neglect or abuse set forth in West Virginia Code §§ 49-6-1 to -12 (1998). Although the requirement that such a petition be filed does not mandate termination in all circumstances, the legislature has reduced the minimum threshold of evidence necessary for termination where one of the factors outlined in West Virginia Code § 49-6-5b(a) (1998) is present.

3. "Prior acts of violence, physical abuse, or emotional abuse toward other children are relevant in a termination of parental rights proceeding, are not violative of W. Va. R. Evid. 404(b), and a decision regarding the admissibility thereof shall be within the sound discretion of the trial court." Syl. Pt. 8, In re Carlita B., 185 W.Va. 613, 408 S.E.2d 365 (1991).

4. When an abuse and neglect petition is brought based solely upon a previous involuntary termination of parental rights to a sibling pursuant to West Virginia Code § 49- 6-5b(a)(3)(1998), prior to the lower court's making any disposition regarding the petition, it must allow the development of evidence surrounding the prior involuntary termination(s) and what actions, if any, the parent(s) have taken to remedy the circumstances which led to the prior termination(s).

5. Where an abuse and neglect petition is filed based on prior involuntary termination(s) of parental rights to a sibling, if such prior involuntary termination(s) involved neglect or non-aggravated abuse, the parent(s) may meet the statutory standard for receiving an improvement period with appropriate conditions, and the court may direct the Department of Health and Human Resources to make reasonable efforts to reunify the parent(s) and child. Under these circumstances, the court should give due consideration to the types of remedial measures in which the parent(s) participated or are currently participating and whether the circumstances leading to the prior involuntary termination(s) have been remedied.

6. "In a child abuse and neglect hearing, before a court can begin to make any of the dispositional alternatives under W.Va.Code, 49-6-5, it must hold a hearing under W.Va.Code, 49-6-2, and determine 'whether such child is abused or neglected.' Such a finding is a prerequisite to further continuation of the case." Syl. Pt. 1, State v. T.C., 172 W. Va. 47, 303 S.E.2d 685 (1983).

7. "The clear import of the statute [West Virginia Code § 49-6-2(d)] is that matters involving the abuse and neglect of children shall take precedence over almost every other matter with which a court deals on a daily basis, and it clearly reflects the goal that such proceedings must be resolved as expeditiously as possible." Syl. Pt. 5, In re Carlita B., 185 W.Va. 613, 408 S.E.2d 365 (1991).

Workman, Justice:

This case is before the Court upon the appeal of the West Virginia Department of Health and Human Resources ("DHHR"), as well as the appeal[See footnote 1] of the Guardian ad Litem on behalf of the infant, George Glen B., Jr.,[See footnote 2] from the March 12, 1999, order entered by the Circuit Court of Grant County, West Virginia, returning physical and legal custody of the infant child to the Appellee mother, Waneta J. H. The Appellants argue that the lower court erred: 1) in ordering the return of physical and legal custody of the infant child to the Appellee mother, because statutory law mandates that the DHHR pursue termination of parental rights where the Appellee mother previously had parental rights terminated to a sibling of the infant child;[See footnote 3] 2) in failing to set a preliminary hearing within the mandatory time frame of ten days as set forth in West Virginia Code § 49-6-3(a) (1998); 3) in making various factual findings;[See footnote 4] and 4) in granting visitation to the Appellee mother,[See footnote 5] because the DHHR is not required to make reasonable efforts to preserve the family unit in this case.[See footnote 6]

Based upon a review of the record, the parties' respective briefs and all other matters submitted before this Court, we reverse the lower court's decision and remand this case for further proceedings consistent with this opinion.

I. FACTS

George Glen B., Jr., was born on January 20, 1999, at Grant Memorial Hospital in Petersburg, West Virginia. George is the second child born to Waneta J. H. and George Glen B.,[See footnote 7] both of whom reside in Dorcas, Grant County, West Virginia. George Glen B., Jr., is the Appellee mother's third child.

On January 20, 1999, the DHHR filed a petition requesting emergency and extended custody of the infant child, as well as seeking termination of the parental rights of the Appellee mother and the Appellee father. The petition was based upon two prior cases of abuse and neglect against the Appellee mother[See footnote 8] which had been brought in Hardy County and which resulted in an involuntary termination of parental rights in one case[See footnote 9] and a voluntary relinquishment of both of the Appellees' parental rights in the other case.[See footnote 10] The DHHR removed the child from the Appellee mother's custody on January 22, 1999. The infant child was placed in a foster home with the other children of the Appellee mother, who are George Glen B., Jr.'s full and half siblings.

On January 25, 1999, the circuit court conducted a hearing to consider the merit of the DHHR's taking emergency custody of the infant child. By order dated January 28, 1999, the circuit court stated that custody of the infant child was to remain with the DHHR, "[p]ending the Court's decision," and "[t]hat the Court . . . [would] render a decision . . . within the next forty-eight hours." Even though the Court stated at the hearing on January 25, 1999, that "[w]e need to have a preliminary hearing in ten days . . . [,]" no other hearing regarding the petition filed by DHHR occurred until March 11, 1999.

At the March 11, 1999, hearing, Mr. Dennis V. Di Benedetto, the Prosecuting Attorney for Grant County and the DHHR's attorney in this matter, informed the lower court that it had never set a preliminary hearing date, and, thus far, the only evidence which had been presented in the case was in support of the emergency taking. Mr. Di Benedetto further told the court that the DHHR had not "present[ed] any extensive evidence of a preliminary hearing nature."

By order entered March 12, 1999, the circuit court made specific findings that there had been two prior cases involving abuse and neglect allegations brought by the DHHR against the Appellee mother in the first instance and both the Appellees in the second instance. The circuit court also found that "[i]n both previous cases, neither parent was capable of minimum acceptable parenting skills." The circuit court further found, however, that "[t]he fact that the Respondent, Waneta J. W[][.] H[][.], has had her parental rights terminated to two previous children, and the father George Glen B[][.] Sr., has had his rights terminated to one previous child, is not sufficient evidence, absent no showing of abuse or neglect to George Glen B[][.] Jr., the current child." The court also found that the prior termination was not sufficient to terminate parental rights. Finally, the court found "no evidence of abuse or neglect of the infant child, George Glen B[][.] Jr., by the mother, . . . or the biological father, . . . as the child was removed from the hospital after birth." Based upon these findings, the lower court ordered legal and physical custody of the infant child be returned to the Appellee mother[See footnote 11] and then dismissed the action court's docket.

The standard of review used by this Court when reviewing circuit court rulings in abuse and neglect cases is as follows:

> Although conclusions of law reached by a circuit court are subject to de novo review, when an action, such as an abuse and neglect case, is tried upon the facts without a jury, the circuit court shall make a determination based upon the evidence and shall make findings of fact and conclusions of law as to whether such child is abused or neglected. These findings shall not be set aside by a reviewing court unless clearly erroneous. A finding is clearly erroneous when, although there is evidence to support the finding, the reviewing court on the entire evidence is left with the definite and firm conviction that a mistake has been committed. However, a reviewing court may not overturn a finding simply because it would have decided the case differently, and it must affirm a finding if the circuit court's account of the evidence is plausible in light of the record viewed in its entirety.

Syl. Pt. 1, In re Tiffany Marie S., 196 W. Va. 223, 470 S.E.2d 177 (1996). It is with the above-mentioned standard of review in mind, that we now review the circuit court's order.

Because our decision turns on the legal conclusions made by the circuit court, our review is de novo. See id.

III. ISSUES

The crucial issue we address is whether the circuit court erred in returning the infant child to the Appellee mother and in dismissing the action, without first permitting an exposition of the evidence to determine whether this was the proper action. The DHHR argues that because the Appellee mother's parental rights to a sibling have previously been terminated, statutory law mandates that the DHHR undertake efforts to terminate the Appellee mother's parental rights to the newest child, in this case George Glen B., Jr. See W. Va. Code §49-6-5b (1998). Moreover, the lower court's failure to conduct a preliminary hearing pursuant to the statutorily-mandatedSee footnote 12 time frame of ten days denied the DHHR, as well as the Appellees, the opportunity to submit before the lower court evidence supportive of the parties' respective positions. The Appellees maintain that it is constitutionally impermissible to apply a presumption that the prior involuntary termination of the mother's parental rights to another child or the prior voluntary relinquishment of both parents' rights to another child proves imminent danger to the child, proves abuse or neglect of the child, or requires termination of the parental rights of the parents to the child.See footnote 13 The Appellees further maintain that the DHHR did not show the existence of imminent danger to the physical well-being of George Glen B., Jr., and the request for emergency and extended custody of this child was properly dismissed. Finally, the Appellees assert that the DHHR did not show abuse or neglect as required by statute in order to seek termination of parental rights as a dispositional alternative for this child and the request for termination of parental rights was properly dismissed.

A. DISMISSAL OF PETITION

It is axiomatic that West Virginia Code § 49-6-5b(a)(3) compels the DHHR to file a petition seeking termination of parental rights where, as in the instant matter, parental rights involving a sibling have previously been involuntarily terminated. West Virginia Code § 49-6-5b(a)(3) provides, in relevant part, that "[e]xcept as provided in subsection (b) of this section,See footnote 14 the department shall file or join in a petition or otherwise seek a ruling in any pending proceeding to terminate parental rights: . . . (3) . . . [where] the parental rights of the parent to a sibling have been terminated involuntarily."See footnote 15 Id. Quite clearly, the statute contemplates that a prior termination of parental rights to a sibling is, at least, some evidence of a child being threatened with abuse and neglect. The legislature has clearly determined that where there has been a prior involuntary termination of parental rights to a sibling, the issue of whether the parent has remedied the problems which led to the prior involuntary termination sufficient to parent a subsequently-born child must, at minimum, be reviewed by a court, and such review should be initiated on a petition pursuant to the provisions governing the procedure in cases of child neglect or abuse set forth in West Virginia Code §§ 49-6-1 to -12 (1998). Although the requirement that such a petition be filed does not mandate termination in all circumstances, the legislature has reduced the minimum threshold of evidence necessary for termination where one of the factors outlined in West Virginia Code § 49-6-5b(a) is present.

Moreover, this Court previously addressed the importance of prior acts of violence, physical abuse, and/or emotional abuse in the context of abuse and neglect proceedings in held in In re Carlita B., 185 W.Va. 613, 408 S.E.2d 365 (1991) . In syllabus point eight of Carlita B., we held that "[p]rior acts of violence, physical abuse, or emotional abuse toward other children are relevant in a termination of parental rights proceeding, are not violative of W. Va. R. Evid. 404(b), and a decision regarding the admissibility thereof shall be within the sound discretion of the trial court."See footnote 16 185 W. Va. at 616, 408 S.E.2d at 368.

Therefore, we hold that when an abuse and neglect petition is brought based solely upon a previous involuntary termination of parental rights to a sibling pursuant to West Virginia Code § 49-6-5b(a)(3), prior to the lower court's making any disposition regarding the petition, it must allow the development of evidence surrounding the prior involuntary termination(s) and what actions, if any, the parent(s) have taken to remedy the circumstances which led to the prior termination(s). Where an abuse and neglect petition is filed based on prior involuntary termination(s) of parental rights to a sibling, if such prior involuntary termination(s) involved neglect or non-aggravated abuse, the parent(s) may meet the statutory standard for receiving an improvement period with appropriate conditions,See footnote 17 and the court may direct the DHHR to make reasonable efforts to reunify the parent(s) and child. Under these circumstances, the court should give due consideration to the types of remedial measures in which the parent(s) participated or are currently participating and whether the circumstances leading to the prior involuntary termination(s) have been remedied. Where there was aggravated abuse, however, such as the murder or serious injury of a sibling, the court may be justified in ordering termination without the use of intervening less restrictive alternatives. See Syl. Pt. 2, In re R.M.J., 164 W. Va. 496, 266 S.E.2d 114 (1980).

In the instant case, the lower court erred in dismissing the abuse and neglect petition outright, without first allowing the development of evidence regarding the prior terminations at issue and whether the parents had taken steps to remedy the circumstances which caused their ability to parent to be so deficient as to have had their rights to prior children permanently terminated.

B. FAILURE TO CONDUCT HEARINGS

Prior to the order returning custody to the Appellee mother, which in effect made a disposition of the case pursuant to West Virginia Code § 49-6-5 (1998), the lower court not only failed to conduct the mandatedSee footnote 18 preliminary hearing See footnote 19 set forth in Rule 22 of the West Virginia Rules of Procedure for Child Abuse and NeglectSee footnote 20 and West Virginia Code § 49-6-3 (a),See footnote 21 but also failed to conduct an adjudicatory hearing as set forth in Rule 25 of the West

Virginia Rules of Procedure for Child Abuse and NeglectSee footnote 22 and West Virginia Code § 49-6-2 (1998).See footnote 23

In syllabus point one of State v. T.C., 172 W. Va. 47, 303 S.E.2d 685 (1983), this Court held that

[i]n a child abuse and neglect hearing, before a court can begin to make any of the dispositional alternatives under W.Va.Code, 49-6-5, it must hold a hearing under W.Va.Code, 49-6-2, and determine 'whether such child is abused or neglected.' Such a finding is a prerequisite to further continuation of the case.

172 W. Va. at 48, 303 S.E.2d at 686.

It is clear from the minuscule record in this case that the lower court's consideration of the abuse and neglect proceeding was inadequate. Mandated hearings did not occur, evidence was not taken, yet a determination to dismiss the petition and return custody to the Appellee mother was made. Thus, the lower court's action in this case was not in compliance with pertinent statutes, rules, and case law. As this Court has previously stated on numerous occasions:

The clear import of the statute [West Virginia Code § 49-6-2(d)] is that matters involving the abuse and neglect of children shall take precedence over almost every other matter with which a court deals on a daily basis, and it clearly reflects the goal that such proceedings must be resolved as expeditiously as possible.

Syl. Pt. 5, In re Carlita B., 185 W.Va. 613, 408 S.E.2d 365 (1991). Subsequent to the initial hearing in this case, almost two months passed before another hearing occurred, and even that hearing was not the preliminary hearing. According to the statute and the rule, a preliminary hearing should have occurred within ten days from the January 25, 1999, hearing. See W. Va. Code § 49-6-3(a) and W. Va. R. P. Child Abuse & Neglect Pro. 22. The parties to an abuse and neglect proceeding must be given a meaningful opportunity to introduce substantive evidence in support of their respective positions, before a circuit court makes its final dispositional decision, and the guiding force behind such decision must be what was in the best interests of the child. See Michael K.T. v. Tina L.T., 182 W. Va. 399, 405, 387 S.E.2d 866, 872 (1989) ("[T]he best interests of the child is the polar star by which decisions must be made which affect children.").

IV. CONCLUSION

Accordingly, based on the foregoing, we conclude that the lower court erred not only in dismissing the abuse and neglect petition and returning custody outright to the Appellee mother, but also in failing to conduct mandated hearings. We, therefore, reverse and remand this case to the circuit court. We direct the circuit court to reinstate the abuse and neglect petition. We further order the lower court to conduct a preliminary hearing within ten days of receipt of this opinion. All other necessary hearings shall also be conducted on an expedited basis and should provide a meaningful opportunity to the parties to produce evidence of the circumstances involved in the instant case. After hearing the pertinent evidence, the court should make specific findings of fact relating to the prior terminations and the current parenting abilities of the mother and father. Even if the court determines, upon appropriate motion, to grant an improvement period with appropriate conditions, concurrent planningSee footnote 24 should begin for the child's permanent placement in the event that efforts at reunification fail. Finally, any decision rendered by the lower court should encompass the parental rights of both the Appellee mother and the Appellee father.

Reversed and remanded with directions.

Footnote: 1 The Guardian ad Litem's brief is virtually identical to the brief submitted by the DHHR. Consequently, for purposes of this opinion, we refer to both appealing parties collectively as the Appellants.

Footnote: 2 Consistent with our practice in cases concerning juveniles, we use only the initial of the juvenile's last name. See Benjamin R. v. Orkin Exterminating Co., 182 W.Va. 615, 390 S.E.2d 814 n. 1 (1990) (citing In re Johnathan P., 182 W.Va. 302, 303, 387 S.E.2d 537, 538 n. 1 (1989)); State v. Murray, 180 W.Va. 41, 44, 375 S.E.2d 405, 408 n. 1 (1988).

Footnote: 3 We note at the outset that in the petition brought by the DHHR, termination of the parental rights of the Appellee father was also sought. It is clear that the Appellee father did not have a prior involuntary termination, only a prior voluntary relinquishment of parental rights. Thus, there was no statutorily-mandated filing requirement with regard to the DHHR's seeking termination of the Appellee father's parental rights. See W. Va. Code § 49- 6-5b(a)(3)(1998) and Section III(A) of this opinion infra. The lower court, on remand, however, should also clarify the status of the Appellee father's parental rights.

Footnote: 4 Because we are reversing the lower court's decision and remanding the case so that the petition can be reinstated and the necessary hearings can be held, we decline to address the alleged factual error raised by the DHHR.

Footnote: 5 The Appellants also contest the lower court's order, entered March 26, 1999. That order granted supervised visitation to the Appellee mother during the pendency of the sixty- day stay, which was also granted by the lower court pursuant to the DHHR's motion that the lower court stay its decision returning physical and legal custody of the infant child to the Appellee mother pending appeal. The lower court, in granting supervised visitation to the Appellee mother, directed that physical custody of the infant child remain with the DHHR for the period of the stay. Because the stay was for the sixty-day period beginning March 12, 1999, this Court, on May 11, 1999, continued the stay until June 15, 1999. In that order, this Court also ordered that visitation by the Appellee mother continue pursuant to the conditions outlined in the March 26, 1999, order. Based on our decision regarding the dismissal of the action, and because the visitation was only for the limited period of the stay, we need not address the visitation issue.

Footnote: 6 The DHHR relies upon West Virginia Code § 49-6-5(a)(7)(C)(1998) and § 49-6- 3(d)(3) (1998) as support for this position. West Virginia Code § 49-6-5 (a)(7) provides:

(7) For purposes of the court's consideration of the disposition custody of a child pursuant to the provisions of this subsection the department is not required to make reasonable efforts to preserve the family if the court determines:

(A) The parent has subjected the child to aggravated circumstances which include, but are not limited to, abandonment, torture, chronic abuse and sexual abuse;

(B) The parent has:

(i) Committed murder of another child of the parent;

(ii) Committed voluntary manslaughter of another child of the parent;

(iii) Attempted or conspired to commit such a murder or voluntary manslaughter or been an accessory before or after the fact to either such crime; or

(iv) Committed a felonious assault that results in serious bodily injury to the child or to another child of the parent;

(C) The parental rights of the parent to a sibling have been terminated involuntarily.

Id. Similarly, West Virginia Code § 49-6-3(d) is virtually identical to the provisions of West Virginia Code § 49-6-5 (a)(7)(C), but governs the circuit court's consideration of temporary custody. West Virginia Code § 49-6-3(d)(3), in relevant part, provides that for the purposes of the trial court's consideration of temporary custody, the DHHR need not make reasonable efforts to preserve family unit where the court determines that prior involuntary termination of parental rights to sibling has occurred. Id.

Footnote: 7 The Appellee mother and the Appellee father have married since the institution of this action.

Footnote: 8 Only one of these prior cases actually involved the Appellee father, George Glen B. The Appellee mother's first child, Daisy, was fathered by another individual who is not a party to this action.

Footnote: 9 On September 18, 1995, the Circuit Court of Hardy County terminated the parental rights of the Appellee mother and father with regard to the infant child, Daisy, after almost a year of services and proceedings before the lower court. The circuit court found that the parents had "demonstrated inadequate capacities to solve problems of abuse and neglect on their own or with assistance; and . . . incurred mental deficiency of such duration and nature as to render them incapable of exercising proper parenting skills or sufficiently improving the adequacy of such skills." The DHHR initially took custody of Daisy when she was eleven weeks old. While the record in the instant case is devoid of the grounds behind the abuse and neglect petition regarding Daisy, the DHHR's petition for appeal indicates that

[s]ome of the Respondent's conduct resulting in the imminent danger petition included the mother yelling and screaming at the child because she had vomited, picking the child up by her clothing, leaving her unattended on a dryer, table and the floor, grabbing her by the arms and smacking her on the legs.

Footnote: 10 The DHHR took custody of the Appellees' infant child, Monica, when that child was only ten days old. The child was born on January 16, 1997. Again, the record in the instant case is devoid as to what abuse and neglect allegations necessitated the DHHR's intervention regarding Monica. The DHHR's petition of appeal provides that the Department took emergency custody of the child based in part on the involuntary termination of the mother's parental rights to Daisy. . . . The petition alleged that the Respondent mother became intoxicated and involved in an altercation with her own mother and her mother's boyfriend which put the child in physical danger and left them without a place to live, that the Respondent yelled and swore at the child for crying because she needed to be fed and changed, that the Respondent moved the child to a place where living conditions were deplorable, that the Respondent's mother threatened to leave the county with the child, and, that the Respondent, in the opinion of a medical professional, did not possess the mental capability to properly care for Monica.

That proceeding resulted in both of the Appellees voluntarily relinquishing their respective parental rights to the child. The Appellee father, however, was granted a three-month preadjudicatory improvement period on or about the time of his preliminary hearing. Further, parenting services were also put into place for the Appellee father, including anger control counseling. The Appellee father, nevertheless, ultimately voluntarily relinquished his parental rights, when the infant child was eight months old. Further, the DHHR notes that termination of parental rights appeared to be impending with regard to both parents prior to their voluntary relinquishments of custody to the DHHR.

Footnote: 11 The Court made no reference to the custodial rights of the Appellee father.

Footnote: 12 See W. Va. Code § 49-6-3(a) and Rule 22 of the West Virginia Rules of Procedure for Child Abuse and Neglect.

Footnote: 13 The Appellees assert a constitutional attack on the validity of the West Virginia Code § 49-6-5b(a)(3) for the first time on appeal. The Appellees never objected or brought to the lower court's attention any argument concerning the constitutional validity of the relevant statute. Because we are ordering further proceedings in this matter, we decline to address this argument at this time. See Cochran v. Appalachian Power Co., 162 W.Va. 86, 93, 246 S.E.2d 624, 628 (1978) ("The almost universal rule is that an appellate court need not consider grounds of [an] objection not presented to the trial court."). Finally, we note that the DHHR has never argued that the pertinent statutory provision mandating that the petition be filed relieves the DHHR of its burden of proving the abuse and neglect averments contained within the petition by "clear and convincing" evidence. W. Va. Code § 49-6-2(c) (1998). The DHHR does argue that this Court has upheld termination of parental rights without the need for reunification services or other less restrictive alternatives when it is found that there is no reasonable likelihood under West Virginia Code § 49-6-5(b) that the conditions of abuse and neglect can be substantially corrected based upon the evidence before the court that the abusing adults have demonstrated an inadequate capacity to solve the problems of abuse and neglect with or without help. See Syl. Pt. 2, In re R.M.J., 164 W. Va. 496, 266 S.E.2d 114 (1980) ("Termination of parental rights, the most drastic remedy under the statutory provision covering the disposition of neglected children, W.Va.Code, 49-6-5 [1977] may be employed without the use of intervening less restrictive alternatives when it is found that there is no reasonable likelihood under W.Va.Code, 49-6-5(b) [1977] that conditions of neglect or abuse can be substantially corrected."); see also In re Danielle T., 195 W. Va. 530, 466 S.E.2d 189 (1995); In re Jeffrey R. L., 190 W. Va. 24, 435 S.E.2d 162 (1993). The DHHR, however, further argues that "[t]he lack of the preliminary hearing in this action deprived the Department of its ability to place complete evidence on the record regarding the danger to George Jr.'s health, safety, and welfare based upon the parents' past behavior."

Footnote: 14 West Virginia Code § 49-6-5b(a) dictates when efforts to terminate parental rights are required by the DHHR. Subsection (b) of that statute sets forth the following three exceptions to the mandatory requirement that the DHHR seek termination in certain instances:

(b) The department may determine not to file a petition to terminate parental rights when:

(1) At the option of the department, the child has been placed with a relative;

(2) The department has documented in the case plan made available for court review a compelling reason, including, but not limited to, the child's age and preference regarding termination or the child's placement in custody of the department based on any proceedings initiated under article five [§ 49-5-1 et seq.] [concerning juvenile proceedings] of this chapter, that filing the petition would not be in the best interests of the child; or

(3) The department has not provided, when reasonable efforts to return a child to the family are required, the services to the child's family as the department deems necessary for the safe return of the child to the home.

W. Va. Code § 49-6-5b(b). When an exception exists, however, only the mandatory filing requirement of an abuse and neglect petition is eliminated as the DHHR still retains the discretion to file an abuse and neglect petition. Id. None of the exceptions apply to the instant case.

Footnote: 15 The other instances wherein the DHHR is required to seek termination of parental rights are as follows:

(1) If a child has been in foster care for fifteen of the most recent twenty-two months as determined by the earlier of the date of the first judicial finding that the child is subjected to abuse or neglect or the date which is sixty days after the child is removed from the home;

(2) If a court has determined the child is abandoned; or

(3) If a court has determined the parent has committed murder or voluntary manslaughter of another of his or children; has attempted or conspired to commit such murder or voluntary manslaughter or has been an accessory before or after the fact of either crime; has committed unlawful or malicious wounding resulting in serious bodily injury to the child or to another of his or children . . . .

Footnote: 16 See W. Va. Code § 49-6-3 (a) (providing that "[i]n a case where there is more than one child in the home, or in the temporary care, custody or control of the alleged offending parent, the petition shall so state, and notwithstanding the fact that the allegations of abuse or neglect may pertain to less than all of such children, each child in the home for whom relief is sought shall be made a party to the proceeding. Even though the acts of abuse or neglect alleged in the petition were not directed against a specific child who is named in the petition, the court shall order the removal of such child, pending final disposition, if it finds that there exists imminent danger to the physical well-being of the child and a lack of reasonable available alternatives to removal"); see also supra n.6.

Footnote: 17 See W. Va. § 49-6-12 (1998) (regarding improvement periods in cases of child neglect or abuse).

Footnote: 18 The Appellees argue that the DHHR failed to comply with the minimum five days actual notice requirement prior to the January 25, 1999, hearing. See W. Va. R. P. Child Abuse & Neglect Pro. 20. Rule 20 provides for actual notice of "at least five (5) days" prior to the preliminary hearing. Id. The January 25, 1999, hearing, however, was not the preliminary hearing in this case. Rather, that hearing was conducted in accordance with West Virginia Code § 49-6-3(c), so that the circuit court could enter an order confirming the emergency custody decision made by the magistrate and entered on January 22, 1999.

Footnote: 19 Contrary to the Appellees' position, the lower court did initially make the determination that the DHHR was justified in taking emergency custody of the infant child. This is evinced by the lower court's January 28, 1999, order directing that custody of the infant child remain with the DHHR. It was this decision which triggered other statutorily- mandated hearings and time-frames.

Footnote: 20 Rule 22 of the West Virginia Rules of Procedure for Child Abuse and Neglect Proceedings provides, in pertinent part, that "[i]f at the time the petition was filed, the court placed or continued the child in the emergency custody of the Department . . . , a preliminary hearing on emergency custody shall be initiated within ten (10) days after the continuation or transfer of custody is ordered as required by W. Va. Code § 49-6-3(a)." W. Va. R. P. Child Abuse & Neglect Pro. 22.

Footnote: 21 West Virginia Code § 49-6-3 (a) provides, in pertinent part, that "[u]pon the filing of a petition, the court may order that the child alleged to be an abused or neglected child be delivered for not more than ten days into the custody of the state department . . . pending a preliminary hearing . . . ." Id.

Footnote: 22 Rule 25 of the West Virginia Rules of Procedure for Child Abuse and Neglect Proceedings provides, in pertinent part, that [w]hen a child is placed in the temporary custody of the Department . . . pursuant to W. Va. Code § 49-6-3(a), the final adjudicatory hearing shall commence within thirty (30) days of temporary custody order entered following the preliminary hearing and must be given priority on the docket unless a preadjudicatory improvement period has been ordered.

W. Va. R. P. Child Abuse & Neglect Pro. 25.

Footnote: 23 West Virginia Code § 49-6-2 (c) provides:

In any proceeding pursuant to the provisions of this article, the party or parties having custodial or other parental rights or responsibilities to the child shall be afforded a meaningful opportunity to be heard, including the opportunity to testify and to present and cross-examine witnesses. The petition shall not be taken as confessed. . . . At the conclusion of the hearing the court shall make a determination based upon the evidence and shall make findings of fact and conclusions of law as to whether such child is abused or neglected. . . .
Id.

Footnote: 24 Rule 28 of the Rules of Abuse and Neglect Proceedings requires the DHHR to prepare the child's case plan. The following information should comprise a part of that case plan:

(c) When the Department's recommendation includes placement of the child away from home, whether temporarily or permanently, the report also shall include:

(1) An explanation why the child cannot be protected from the identified problems in the home even with the provision of service or why placement in the home is not in the best interest of the child;

(2) Identification of relatives or friends who were contacted about providing a suitable and safe permanent placement for the child;

(3) A description of the recommended placement or type of home or institutional placement in which the child is to be placed, including its distance from the child's home and whether or not it is the least restrictive (most family-like) one available and including a discussion of the appropriateness of the placement and how the agency which is responsible for the child plans to assure that the child receives proper care and that services are provided to the parents, child and foster parents in order to improve the conditions in the parent's(s')/respondent's('s) home, facilitate return of the child to his or her own home, or the permanent placement of the child;

(4) A suggested visitation plan including an explanation of any conditions be placed on the visits;

(5) A statement of the child's special needs and the ways they should be met while in placement;

(6) The location of any siblings and, if siblings are separated, a statement of the reasons for the separation and the steps required to unite them as quickly as possible and to maintain regular contact during the separation if it is in the child's best interest . . . .

JUSTICE STARCHER delivered the Opinion of the Court.

SYLLABUS BY THE COURT

1. When the parental rights of a parent to a child have been involuntarily terminated, W.Va. Code, 49-6-5b(a)(3) [1998] requires the Department of Health and Human Resources to file a petition, to join in a petition, or to otherwise seek a ruling in any pending proceeding, to terminate parental rights as to any sibling(s) of that child.

2. While the Department of Health and Human Resources has a duty to file, join or participate in proceedings to terminate parental rights in the circumstances listed in W.Va. Code, 49-6-5b(a)(3) [1998], the Department must still comply with the evidentiary standards established by the Legislature in W.Va. Code, 49-6-2 [1996] before a court may terminate parental rights to a child, and must comply with the evidentiary standards established in W.Va. Code, 49-6-3 [1998] before a court may grant the Department the authority to take emergency, temporary custody of a child.

3. "Where there has been a prior involuntary termination of parental rights to a sibling, the issue of whether the parent has remedied the problems which led to the prior involuntary termination sufficient to parent a subsequently-born child must, at minimum, be reviewed by a court, and such review should be initiated on a petition pursuant to the provisions governing the procedure in cases of child neglect or abuse set forth in West Virginia Code §§ 49-6-1 to -12 (1998). Although the requirement that such a petition be filed does not mandate termination in all circumstances, the legislature has reduced the minimum threshold of evidence necessary for termination where one of the factors outlined in West Virginia Code § 49-6-5b(a) (1998) is present." Syllabus Point 2, In re George Glen B., Jr., 205 W.Va. 435, 518 S.E.2d 863 (1999).

4. "When an abuse and neglect petition is brought based solely upon a previous involuntary termination of parental rights to a sibling pursuant to West Virginia Code § 49-6-5b(a)(3) (1998), prior to the lower court's making any disposition regarding the petition, it must allow the development of evidence surrounding the prior involuntary termination(s) and what actions, if any, the parent(s) have taken to remedy the circumstances which led to the prior termination(s)." Syllabus Point 4, In re George Glen B., Jr., 205 W.Va. 435, 518 S.E.2d 863 (1999).

5. The presence of one of the factors outlined in W.Va. Code, 49-6-5b(a)(3) [1998] merely lowers the threshold of evidence necessary for the termination of parental rights. W.Va. Code, 49-6-5b(a)(3) [1998] does not mandate that a circuit court terminate parental rights merely upon the filing of a petition filed pursuant to the statute, and the Department of Health and Human Resources continues to bear the burden of proving that the subject child is abused or neglected pursuant to W.Va. Code, 49-6-2 [1996].

6. "It is a traumatic experience for children to undergo sudden and dramatic changes in their permanent custodians. Lower courts in cases such as these should provide, whenever possible, for a gradual transition period, especially where young children are involved. Further, such gradual transition periods should be developed in a manner intended to foster the emotional adjustment of the children to this change and to maintain as much stability as possible in their lives." Syllabus Point 3, James M. v. Maynard, 185 W.Va. 648, 408 S.E.2d 400 (1991).

7. When a circuit court determines that a gradual change in permanent custodians is necessary, the circuit court may not delegate to a private institution its duty to develop and monitor any plan for the gradual transition of custody of the child(ren).

Starcher, Justice:

This appeal from the Circuit Court of Grant County raises the question of whether a circuit court may terminate parental rights to a child solely on the basis that, several years prior to the child's birth, the parental rights to siblings of the child had been terminated. We also consider whether it is mandatory that the Department file a petition to terminate the current parental rights of a parent who has previously had parental rights to another child terminated by the court. We hold that while the Department does have a mandatory duty to file a petition, a circuit court may not terminate parental rights without additional evidence of abuse or neglect of the current child.

I.
Factual Background

George Glen B., Jr. was born on January 20, 1999. George is the second child born to appellees Waneta B. and George Glen B., Sr.; he is the third child born to Waneta B.

The day after George was born, the Department filed a petition in the Circuit Court of Grant County requesting emergency custody of the child, as well as seeking to terminate the parental rights of the appellee mother and appellee father. The petition was filed on the basis of two previous cases of abuse and neglect filed regarding siblings of George against the appellee mother. In the first case, filed in 1994, 13 weeks after a sibling was born, the appellee mother's parental rights were involuntarily terminated. In the second case, filed in 1996, the Department took custody of a sibling 10 days after her birth; the appellee mother and appellee father later voluntarily agreed to relinquish their parental rights to the child. In the instant case, relying upon a "temporary custody" order, the Department removed George from the hospital on January 22, 1999.

On January 25, 1999, the circuit court conducted a hearing to consider the merit of the Department's taking emergency custody of George. By order dated January 28, 1999, the circuit court stated that custody of the child was to remain with the Department, "[p]ending the Court's decision," and "[t]hat the Court . . . [would] render a decision . . . within the next forty-eight hours." Unfortunately, no additional orders were issued, and no other hearings occurred until a brief hearing was held on March 11, 1999.

By an order dated March 12, 1999, the circuit court made specific findings that there had been two prior cases involving allegations of abuse and neglect brought by the Department against the appellee mother in the first instance, and against both appellees in the second instance. The circuit court also found that "[i]n both previous cases, neither parent was capable of minimum acceptable parenting skills," and that both cases were resolved with the termination of the appellees' parental rights.

However, the circuit court declined to terminate the appellees' parental rights or proceed any further on the petition, concluding that a prior termination of parental rights, without more, was not a sufficient ground to terminate parental rights. The court found that:

> The fact that the Respondent, Waneta [B.] . . . , has had her parental rights terminated to two previous children, and the father George Glen B[][.] Sr., has had his rights terminated to one previous child, is not sufficient evidence, absent no showing of abuse or neglect to George Glen B[][.] Jr., the current child.

The circuit court concluded that it would be improper "to terminate parental rights of the mother and father absent any showing of abuse or neglect of this child." Based upon these findings, the circuit court dismissed the abuse and neglect petition, and ordered the Department to return George to the custody of the appellees "in a manner that is in the best interests of the infant child."

The Department appealed the circuit court's March 12, 1999 order to this Court. In an opinion issued on July 12, 1999, we reversed the circuit court's order and remanded the case for further hearings. We held that the circuit court had erred in dismissing the abuse and neglect petition outright without allowing the Department an opportunity to present evidence regarding the circumstances surrounding the prior terminations of parental rights, and without allowing the parties to develop evidence concerning whether the appellee parents had taken steps to remedy the circumstances which resulted in the prior abuse and neglect petitions. See In re George Glen B., 205 W.Va. 435, 443, 518 S.E.2d 863, 871 (1999). We also directed the circuit court to hold its future hearings pursuant to the procedures contained in the West Virginia Rules of Procedure for Child Abuse and Neglect and W.Va. Code, 49-6-2 [1998]. 205 W.Va. at 444-45, 518 S.E.2d at 871-72.

Upon remand, the circuit court conducted hearings on July 28 and 29, 1999, and allowed the parties to present a total of over 9 hours of testimony and argument. From this testimony as well as several hundred pages of exhibits, the circuit court issued two orders dated August 5, 1999 and August 30, 1999.

In its orders, the circuit court concluded that "there is no neglect or abuse of George Glen B[][.] Jr. by anyone, now or has there ever been." Accordingly, the court held that the Department had failed to show abuse or neglect by the appellee parents sufficient to warrant the termination of their parental rights.

In its findings, the circuit court found that the appellees had "substantially remedied the circumstances surrounding the prior terminations" of their parental rights.[1] The circuit court also found that the Department "has become so emotionally involved in this case that they cannot be objective," noting that the Department provided the appellee parents with no services, including visitation with George, without being ordered to do so by the court. In sum, the circuit court's order chastised the Department for only seeking termination and not considering other alternatives.

However, the circuit court concluded that George "may be at risk if he is returned to the [appellees] without appropriate supervision." The circuit court therefore ordered that while the Department would technically retain physical custody of George, a private company, Action Youth Care, was ordered to provide supervision for a gradual transition to ensure an appropriate transfer of George to the custody of his parents. The court placed full responsibility and authority for the transition and its timing on Action Youth Care:

> The primary responsibility of Action Youth Care is to ensure the safety of George Glen B[][.] Jr. Overnight visitation shall begin as soon as Action Youth Care determines it is in the best interests of the child. Action Youth

[1]The circuit court's order states, in pertinent part:

> [T]he Court finds that Waneta H[][.] B[][.] and George Glen B[][.] have established a stable home which provides appropriate shelter and environment for George Glen B[][.] Jr.; that Waneta H[][.] B[][.] and George Glen B[][.] have established their ability to work together as a married couple to provide appropriate parenting for George Glen B[][.] Jr., including the ability to perform basic parenting needs such as feeding and diapering, and to provide nurturing suitable for his development; that Respondents have voluntarily sought parenting education which has resulted in learning and application of appropriate parenting skills; and that Respondents are actively addressing their needs to control anger and depression.

> Care may remove the child from the custody of his parents without further Order of this Court if they determine it necessary for his protection.
> In the event the efforts at reunification should fail, Action Youth Care shall notify the Court and the Court will take such action . . . as may be appropriate.

The Department now appeals the circuit court's August 5 and August 30, 1999 orders.

II.
Standard of Review

The standard of review used by this Court when reviewing circuit court rulings in abuse and neglect cases is as follows:

> Although conclusions of law reached by a circuit court are subject to de novo review, when an action, such as an abuse and neglect case, is tried upon the facts without a jury, the circuit court shall make a determination based upon the evidence and shall make findings of fact and conclusions of law as to whether such child is abused or neglected. These findings shall not be set aside by a reviewing court unless clearly erroneous. A finding is clearly erroneous when, although there is evidence to support the finding, the reviewing court on the entire evidence is left with the definite and firm conviction that a mistake has been committed. However, a reviewing court may not overturn a finding simply because it would have decided the case differently, and it must affirm a finding if the circuit court's account of the evidence is plausible in light of the record viewed in its entirety.

Syllabus Point 1, In re Tiffany Marie S., 196 W.Va. 223, 470 S.E.2d 177 (1996). It is with the above-mentioned standard of review in mind that we now review the circuit court's orders.

Discussion
A.

The Duties Imposed by W.Va. Code, 49-6-5b

The Department contends that W.Va. Code, 49-6-5b(a)(3) [1998] mandates that the Department file a petition to terminate parental rights where there has been an involuntary termination of parental rights to a sibling in a prior proceeding. W.Va. Code, 49-6-5b(a)(3) states, in pertinent part and with emphasis added:

> (a) . . . [T]he department shall file or join in a petition or otherwise seek a ruling in any pending proceeding to terminate parental rights:

The Department further argues that the circuit court erred in finding that the Department was required to use W.Va. Code, 49-6-5b(a)(3) with "sound discretion," and, in essence, erred in concluding that the Department abused its discretion by pursuing termination of the appellees' parental rights in this case.

The appellees, however, contend that if the Court adopts the Department's reading of W.Va. Code, 49-6-5b(a)(3), then the Department will be allowed to take temporary custody of a child and demand the termination of an individual's parental rights by showing that there has been a prior involuntary termination of parental rights -- and without a showing of actual or imminent abuse or neglect of the current child. The appellees argue that the abuse and neglect statutes must be read together, and that to allow the Department to take emergency custody of a child and to seek the termination of parental rights without showing any abuse and neglect of the child would be constitutionally impermissible.

A reading of the plain language of the statute indicates that the Legislature intended to impose a mandatory duty upon the Department to initiate or join termination proceedings when certain circumstances exist. The application of the statute in situations such as the instant case is clear: When the parental rights of a parent to a child have been involuntarily terminated, W.Va. Code, 49-6-5b(a)(3) requires the Department of Health and Human Resources to file a petition, to join in a petition, or to otherwise seek a ruling in any pending proceeding, to terminate parental rights as to any sibling(s) of that child.

The Legislature has created procedures and levels of proof that the Department must follow in every abuse and neglect case. When the Department files a petition with a court alleging that a parent is abusing or neglecting a child, W.Va. Code, 49-6-2(c) [1996] imposes upon the Department the duty to prove its case by "clear and convincing proof" and "based upon conditions existing at the time of the filing of the petition."[2] If the Department seeks to take temporary custody of a child upon the filing of a petition on an "emergency" basis, without giving the parent the opportunity to be heard, W.Va. Code, 49-6-3(a) [1998] requires the Department to show that there exists an "imminent danger to the physical well-being of the child," and that there are no reasonably available alternatives to removing the child from the parent's custody.[3]

[2]W.Va. Code, 49-6-2(c) [1996] states:

> In any proceeding pursuant to the provisions of this article, the party or parties having custodial or other parental rights or responsibilities to the child shall be afforded a meaningful opportunity to be heard, including the opportunity to testify and to present and cross-examine witnesses. The petition shall not be taken as confessed. A transcript or recording shall be made of all proceedings unless waived by all parties to the proceeding. The rules of evidence shall apply. Where relevant, the court shall consider the efforts of the state department to remedy the alleged circumstances. At the conclusion of the hearing the court shall make a determination based upon the evidence and shall make findings of fact and conclusions of law as to whether such child is abused or neglected, which shall be incorporated into the order of the court. The findings must be based upon conditions existing at the time of the filing of the petition and proven by clear and convincing proof.

[3]W.Va. Code, 49-6-3(a) [1998] states:

> Upon the filing of a petition, the court may order that the child alleged to be an abused or neglected child be delivered for not more than ten days into the custody of the state department or a responsible person found by the court to be a fit and proper person for the temporary care of the child pending a preliminary hearing, if it finds that: (1) There exists imminent danger to the physical well-being of the child; and (2) there are no reasonably available alternatives to removal of the child, including, but not limited to, the provision of medical, psychiatric, psychological or homemaking services in the child's present custody: Provided, That where the alleged abusing person, if known, is a member of a household, the court shall not allow placement pursuant to this section of the child or children in said home unless the alleged abusing person is or has been precluded from visiting or residing in said home by judicial order. In a case where there is more than one child in the home, or in the temporary care, custody or control of the alleged offending parent, the petition shall so state, and notwithstanding the fact that the allegations of abuse or neglect may pertain to less than all of such children, each child in the home for whom relief is sought shall be made a party to the proceeding. Even though the acts of abuse or neglect alleged in the petition were not directed against a specific child who is named in the petition, the court shall order the removal of such child, pending final disposition, if it finds that there exists imminent danger to the physical well-being of the child and a lack of reasonable available alternatives to removal. The initial order directing such custody shall contain an order appointing counsel and scheduling the preliminary hearing, and upon its service shall require the immediate transfer of custody of such child or children to the department or a responsible relative which may include any parent, guardian, or other custodian. The court order shall state: (1) That continuation in the home is contrary to the best interests of the child and why; and (2) whether or not the department made reasonable efforts to preserve the family and

These procedural statutes must be read in pari materia with W.Va. Code, 49-6-5b(a)(3). So, while the Department has a duty to file, join or participate in proceedings to terminate parental rights in the circumstances listed in W.Va. Code, 49-6-5b(a)(3), the Department must still comply with the evidentiary standards established by the Legislature in W.Va. Code, 49-6-2 before a court may terminate parental rights to a child, and must comply with the evidentiary standards established in W.Va. Code, 49-6-3 before a court may grant the Department the authority to take emergency, temporary custody of a child.

In our earlier opinion in this case, we stated that when a prior involuntary termination of parental rights to a sibling has occurred, the Department's "minimum threshold of evidence necessary for termination" is reduced. We held, in Syllabus Point 2 of In re: George Glen B., Jr., 205 W.Va. 435, 518 S.E.2d 863 (1999):

> Where there has been a prior involuntary termination of parental rights to a sibling, the issue of whether the parent has remedied the problems which led to the prior involuntary termination sufficient to parent a subsequently-born child must, at minimum, be reviewed by a court, and such review should be initiated on a petition pursuant to the provisions governing the procedure in cases of child neglect or abuse set forth in West Virginia Code §§ 49-6-1 to -12 (1998). Although the requirement that such a petition be filed does not mandate termination in all circumstances, the legislature has reduced the minimum threshold of evidence necessary for termination where one of the factors outlined in West Virginia Code § 49-6-5b(a) (1998) is present.

> prevent the placement or that the emergency situation made such efforts unreasonable or impossible. The order may also direct any party or the department to initiate or become involved in services to facilitate reunification of the family.

Furthermore, we also held in our prior decision in this case that, when the Department brings a petition to terminate parental rights based solely upon the prior involuntary termination of parental rights of a sibling, the circuit court must allow the parties to develop any evidence regarding the actions taken by the parent or parents to alleviate the conditions surrounding the prior termination. We stated, at Syllabus Point 4:

> When an abuse and neglect petition is brought based solely upon a previous involuntary termination of parental rights to a sibling pursuant to West Virginia Code § 49-6-5b(a)(3) (1998), prior to the lower court's making any disposition regarding the petition, it must allow the development of evidence surrounding the prior involuntary termination(s) and what actions, if any, the parent(s) have taken to remedy the circumstances which led to the prior termination(s).

Having closely examined the language used by the Legislature in W.Va. Code, 49-6-5b(a)(3), we do not believe that the Legislature intended to eliminate the Department's burden of proving the presence of current or imminent abuse or neglect of a child when the parental rights to a sibling have been previously involuntarily terminated, and our previous holding in George Glen B. should not be construed as eliminating the Department's burden of proof. We also do not believe that the Legislature intended to eliminate the circuit court's discretion over whether or not to terminate a party's parental rights. The presence of one of the factors outlined in W.Va. Code, 49-6-5b(a)(3) merely lowers the threshold of evidence necessary for the termination of parental rights. W.Va. Code, 49-6-5b(a)(3) does not mandate that a circuit court terminate parental rights merely upon the filing of a petition filed pursuant to the statute, and the Department continues to bear the burden of proving that the subject child is abused or neglected pursuant to W.Va. Code, 49-6-2.

Having carefully examined the extensive record and testimony in this case, we conclude that the Department properly filed the instant action to investigate and develop evidence regarding whether the appellee parents had alleviated the conditions surrounding the prior terminations of their parental rights to George's siblings. However, we also find substantial evidence that the appellees have remedied the circumstances which prompted the filing of the previous two abuse and neglect petitions. We therefore conclude that the circuit court did not err in finding that the appellees had corrected the conditions leading to the prior terminations of parental rights. The circuit court was therefore correct in holding that, because of the absence of any evidence of current or threatened abuse or neglect, George should be returned to his parents' custody.

B.
Delegation of Duties to a Private Agency

In its orders, the circuit court concluded that the Department "has become so emotionally involved in this case that they cannot be objective," and criticized the Department for "want[ing] to terminate parental rights or do nothing." To address this problem, the circuit court delegated responsibility to a private agency, Action Youth Care, to establish and carry out a plan for reunifying George with the appellee parents.[4]

The Department appeals the circuit court's orders contending that our abuse and neglect statutes, W.Va. Code, 49-6-1, et seq., place any decisions about the safety of at-risk children solely

[4]As the circuit court stated in its August 30, 1999 order:

> Action Youth Care shall be the controlling agency in carrying out the transition of the infant from DHHR custody to the parents' custody. If there are any difference of opinion or disagreement as to appropriate treatment of the infant between DHHR and Action Youth Care, the Action Youth Care's position shall prevail.

within the discretion of the circuit court once a petition has been filed. The Department argues that the circuit court cannot delegate that authority to another agency, particularly a private company. We agree.

This Court has repeatedly stated that when a petition alleging abuse and neglect has been filed, a circuit court has a duty to safeguard the child and provide for his or her best interests. See, e.g., State ex rel. Paul B. v. Hill, 201 W.Va. 248, 257-58, 496 S.E.2d 198, 207-8 (1997) (circuit courts have an obligation to consider the "best interests of the child [as] paramount," and a circuit court "cannot ... ignore its parens patriae duty to protect the best interests of [the child]."). Furthermore, circuit courts are statutorily charged with promptly ruling upon the merits of an abuse and neglect petition, W.Va. Code, 49-6-2 [1996], and if abuse or neglect is found, crafting a disposition to achieve an appropriate placement of an abused and/or neglected child. W.Va. Code, 49-6-5 [1998].

In the instant case, the circuit court concluded that George could be at risk if quickly returned to the custody of his parents, and determined that a gradual transition period was needed to give George, and the appellees, a sufficient "adjustment" period. We have previously approved of gradual changes in the custody of children. For example, in Honaker v. Burnside, 182 W.Va. 448, 450-51, 388 S.E.2d 322, 324 (1989), a case where there were no allegations of abuse or neglect, we approved of a gradual, 6-month transition of custody of a child between her step-father and natural father when the child's natural mother had died.

Similarly, in James M. v. Maynard, 185 W.Va. 648, 408 S.E.2d 400 (1991), we required the circuit court to establish a plan for the gradual shift of custody for children found to be abused and neglected to their natural father. We held, at Syllabus Point 3, that:

> It is a traumatic experience for children to undergo sudden and dramatic changes in their permanent custodians. Lower courts in cases such as these should provide, whenever possible, for a gradual transition period, especially where young children are involved. Further, such gradual transition periods should be developed in a manner intended to foster the emotional adjustment of the children to this change and to maintain as much stability as possible in their lives.

Explicit in both Honaker v. Burnside and James M. v. Maynard is the principle that the circuit court, and not the Department or a private agency, bears the burden of crafting a plan for the gradual transition of custody.

We therefore hold that when a circuit court determines that a gradual change in permanent custodians is necessary, the circuit court may not delegate to a private institution its duty to develop and monitor any plan for the gradual transition of custody of the child(ren).[5]

Accordingly, we find that the circuit court erred in delegating to Action Youth Care all responsibility regarding the reunification of George with his parents, and reverse the circuit court's orders on this point. On remand, the circuit court must establish a concrete transition plan for reunification, and must oversee the execution of that plan.[6]

C.
Procedural Questions

---

[5]Nothing prevents a circuit court from requiring an agency to submit a proposed reunification plan for the circuit court's consideration. However, the circuit court is charged with adopting and monitoring the implementation of such a proposed plan.

[6]We conclude, however, that the circuit court retains discretion in establishing how the plan will be carried out, and what agencies will act as intermediaries.

The Department argues that the circuit court erred in finding that the Department was prejudiced against the parents, and argues that the Department, and not a private agency, should retain the authority to oversee any reunification efforts. However, after examining the record, we cannot conclude that the circuit court abused its discretion in removing the Department from the oversight of George's welfare.

The Department challenges the circuit court's de facto granting of an improvement period to the appellee parents, arguing that an improvement period may be granted only after a party makes a motion for an improvement period. See W.Va. Code, 49-6-2(b) [1996]. The Department contends that the appellees never asked for an improvement period. Furthermore, the Department contends that the de facto improvement period is not being conducted in accordance with a family case plan[7] developed by the Department, because none was created.

In our examination of W.Va. Code, 49-6-5 [1998], we find that the right of a parent to an improvement period, and the Department's duty to create a case plan governing that improvement period, only arises after the circuit court has determined that a child has been abused or neglected. W.Va. Code, 49-6-5(a) states, in pertinent part:

> Following a determination . . . wherein the court finds a child to be abused or neglected, the department shall file with the court a copy of the child's case plan, including the permanency plan for the child. The term case plan means a written document that includes, where applicable, the requirements of the family case plan . . . .

In the instant case, the circuit court specifically found no evidence of abuse or neglect by the appellees against George. Accordingly, there was no need for the creation of a case plan by the Department, nor a need for a formal improvement period. We therefore find no error on this point by the circuit court. However, as we previously discussed, the circuit court properly acted within its discretion

[7]A family case plan provides the parties with an organized, realistic means of identifying family problems and the steps to be used in resolving or lessening the problems. The Department creates a family case plan only after the circuit court grants the parent(s) an improvement period. See, e.g., W.Va. Code, 49-6-5 [1998]; State ex rel. DHHR v. Cheryl M., 177 W.Va. 688, 356 S.E.2d 181 (1987).

in allowing for a gradual transition of custody and reunification of George with his parents. See Syllabus Point 3, James M. v. Maynard, discussed supra.

The Department also challenges the circuit court's failure to hold a final adjudicatory hearing within 30 days of the July 28-29, 1999 preliminary hearing.

Rule 25 of the Rules of Procedure for Child Abuse and Neglect [1997] requires circuit courts to hold an adjudicatory hearing within 30 days of any temporary custody order entered following the preliminary hearing. The rule states, in pertinent part:

> When a child is placed in the temporary custody of the Department or a responsible person . . . the final adjudicatory hearing shall commence within thirty (30) days of the temporary custody order entered following the preliminary hearing and must be given priority on the docket unless a preadjudicatory improvement period has been ordered. . . .

In the instant case, the circuit court entered orders on August 5 and August 30, 1999 placing George in the temporary custody of the Department (but, as previously mentioned, gave Action Youth Care complete authority over George's reunification with his parents). Rule 25 of the Rules of Procedure for Child Abuse and Neglect mandates that a hearing should have occurred no later than 30 days after the August 30, 1999 order. However, the circuit court stated, in its orders, that it would "set an adjudicatory hearing within 90 days to determine what future proceedings are needed." This ruling, as well as the circuit court's failure to hold an adjudicatory hearing by September 30, 1999, was in error.

Accordingly, we reverse the circuit court's finding that it was authorized to schedule a hearing 90 days after its order upon the preliminary hearing, and remand the case for further proceedings. We direct that, on remand, the circuit court is to act immediately to develop and oversee a plan for the expeditious reunification of George with his parents.

IV.
Conclusion

As set forth above, we affirm in part and reverse in part the circuit court's August 5 and August 30, 1999 orders. On remand, we direct that the circuit court act immediately to develop and oversee a concrete plan for the expeditious reunification of George with his parents.

Affirmed in part, Reversed in part, and Remanded.

CHIEF JUSTICE MAYNARD delivered the Opinion of the Court.
JUSTICE STARCHER concurs and reserves the right to file a concurring opinion.

SYLLABUS BY THE COURT

1. "A defendant on trial has the right to be accorded a full and fair opportunity to fully examine and cross-examine the witnesses." Syllabus Point 1, State v. Crockett, 164 W.Va. 435, 265 S.E.2d 268 (1979).

2. "Several basic rules exist as to cross-examination of a witness. The first is that the scope of cross-examination is coextensive with, and limited by, the material evidence given on direct examination. The second is that a witness may also be cross-examined about matters affecting his credibility. The term 'credibility' includes the interest and bias of the witness, inconsistent statements made by the witness and to a certain extent the witness' character. The third rule is that the trial judge has discretion as to the extent of cross-examination." Syllabus Point 4, State v. Richey, 171 W.Va. 342, 298 S.E.2d 879 (1982).

3. "The discretion of the trial court in ruling on the propriety of argument by counsel before the jury will not be interfered with by the appellate court, unless it appears that the rights of the complaining party have been prejudiced, or that manifest injustice resulted therefrom." Syllabus Point 3, State v. Boggs, 103 W.Va. 641, 138 S.E. 321 (1927).

4. "Evidence of other crimes, wrongs, or acts is not admissible to prove the character of a person in order to show that he acted in conformity therewith. It may, however, be admissible for other purposes, such as proof of motive, opportunity, intent, preparation, plan, knowledge, identity, or absence of mistake or accident." Syllabus Point 1, State v. Edward Charles L., 183 W.Va. 641, 398 S.E.2d 123 (1990).

5. "When a trial court grants a pre-trial discovery motion requiring the prosecution to disclose evidence in its possession, non-disclosure by the prosecution is fatal to its case where such non-disclosure is prejudicial. The non-disclosure is prejudicial where the defense is surprised on a material issue and where the failure to make the disclosure hampers the preparation and presentation of the defendant's case." Syllabus Point 2, State v. Grimm, 165 W.Va. 547, 270 S.E.2d 173 (1980), modified, Syllabus Point 1, State v. Johnson, 179 W.Va. 619, 371 S.E.2d 340 (1988).

6. "When offering evidence under Rule 404(b) of the West Virginia Rules of Evidence, the prosecution is required to identify the specific purpose for which the evidence is being offered and the jury must be instructed to limit its consideration of the evidence to only that purpose. It is not sufficient for the prosecution or the trial court merely to cite or mention the litany of possible uses listed in Rule 404(b). The specific and precise purpose for which the evidence is offered must clearly be shown from the record and that purpose alone must be told to the jury in the trial court's instruction." Syllabus Point 1, State v. McGinnis, 193 W.Va. 147, 455 S.E.2d 516 (1994).

7. "Collateral acts or crimes may be introduced in cases involving child sexual assault or sexual abuse victims to show the perpetrator had a lustful disposition towards the victim, a lustful disposition towards children generally, or a lustful disposition to specific other children provided such evidence relates to incidents reasonably close in time to the incident(s) giving rise to the indictment. To the extent that this conflicts with our decision in State v. Dolin, [176] W.Va. [688], 347 S.E.2d 208 (1986), it is overruled." Syllabus Point 2, State v. Edward Charles L., 183 W.Va. 641, 398 S.E.2d 123 (1990).

8. Omissions from a trial transcript warrant a new trial only if the missing portion of the transcript specifically prejudices a defendant's appeal.

Maynard, Chief Justice:

The defendant below, appellant, Richard Lee Graham, was charged with sexual abuse in the first degree of A.W.,[1] an eleven-year-old female, in violation of W.Va. Code § 61-8B-7 (1984).[2] Following a jury trial on December 10, 1998 in the Circuit Court of Mercer County, the defendant was found guilty. On appeal to this Court, he assigns several errors seeking reversal of his conviction. For the reasons that follow, we affirm.

I.

FACTS

A thumbnail sketch of the relevant facts is as follows. At trial, eleven-year-old A.W. testified that on March 27, 1998, she had disembarked the school bus and was walking the long drive way to her hilltop house when her neighbor, twenty-two-year-old Richard Lee Graham,[3] grabbed her from behind, pushed her against him, and rubbed her buttocks with his erect penis through their clothing. A.W. screamed, broke loose, and ran home. The defendant retreated toward his house at the bottom of the hill.

[1]Consistent with our practice in cases involving sensitive matters, we use the victim's initials. See State v. Edward Charles L., 183 W.Va. 641, 645 n. 1, 398 S.E.2d 123, 127 n. 1 (1990).

[2]W.Va. Code § 61-8B-7 (1984) states in pertinent part that "[a] person is guilty of sexual abuse in the first degree when . . . [s]uch person, being fourteen years old or more, subjects another person to sexual contact who is eleven years old or less."

[3]The defendant is mentally retarded and lives with his mother and siblings.

The victim's mother, Yvette G., testified concerning the events following the incident including her daughter's fear of men as a result of the attack. The investigating officer, Detective Sergeant Darrell Bailey of the Mercer County Sheriff's Department, testified that the defendant was convicted of first degree sexual abuse for an incident in 1994 in which he fondled and kissed the breasts, and maybe the vaginal area, of another 11-year-old girl.[4]

The defendant offered the testimony of his younger brother and mother that he had been at home when the incident occurred. Several friends of the defendant's family corroborated this testimony or rebutted the victim's testimony concerning what the defendant was wearing on the day of the attack.

Upon his conviction for sexual abuse in the first degree, the defendant was sentenced to one to five years in the penitentiary. The sentence was suspended, and the defendant was placed on probation for a period of five years with the conditions that he serve ninety days in the Southern Regional Jail and, upon release from jail, be placed in a residential treatment center for the treatment of his "mental and sexual deviations and that he remain in such placement until it is determined that he can return to society."

II.

DISCUSSION

[4]The defendant served time in the penitentiary for the 1995 conviction and was released on September 5, 1997.

First, the defendant avers that the circuit court erred in precluding his cross-examination of Yvette G., the victim's mother, concerning domestic violence petitions she filed against her husband, the victim's stepfather, to rebut the inference that the victim was afraid of men because of the defendant's attack.[5] Specifically, the defendant sought to cross-examine the victim's mother concerning several instances from 1996 through 1998 in which her husband, Doug G., verbally and physically abused her and made threats against her and her children. The defendant argues, inter alia, that the preclusion of this evidence deprived him of his right to introduce rebuttal evidence and to challenge the credibility of the witness.

This Court has stated that "[a] defendant on trial has the right to be accorded a full and fair opportunity to fully examine and cross-examine the witnesses." Syllabus Point 1, State v. Crockett, 164 W.Va. 435, 265 S.E.2d 268 (1979). However, this right is not unbridled.

> Several basic rules exist as to cross-examination of a witness. The first is that the scope of cross-examination is coextensive with, and limited by, the material evidence given on direct examination. The second is that a witness may also be cross-examined about matters affecting his credibility. The term "credibility" includes the interest and bias of the witness, inconsistent statements made by the witness and to a certain extent the witness' character. The third rule is that the trial judge has discretion as to the extent of cross-examination.

[5]In July 1996 and July 1998, the victim's mother filed family violence petitions against her husband, Doug G., the victim's stepfather, in which she alleged verbal and physical abuse. At trial, the victim's mother testified that she is now separated from her husband and that divorce proceedings are pending.

Syllabus Point 4, State v. Richey, 171 W.Va. 342, 298 S.E.2d 879 (1982).[6] We have opined that the trial court's decision to exclude or permit questions on cross-examination "is not reviewable except in case of manifest abuse or injustice." Syllabus Point 4, in part, State v. Carduff, 142 W.Va. 18, 93 S.E.2d 502 (1956). With these standards to guide us, we now review the first issue raised by the defendant.

On direct examination, Yvette G., A.W.'s mother, testified that since the incident with the defendant, A.W. is "terrified of men." Specifically, the victim avoids men when possible and she is withdrawn in their company. Yvette G. testified on cross-examination that she is now separated from A.W.'s stepfather, but prior to the separation A.W. was comfortable around her stepfather. At that point, defendant's counsel sought to question Yvette G. concerning domestic disputes between her and her estranged husband and was precluded from doing so by the trial court.

We find that the circuit court did not err in precluding this cross-examination. First, it seems clear that the victim's fear of men is collateral to the main issues surrounding the defendant's culpability. This evidence concerns the victim's response to the sexual abuse and is not a matter that directly weighs upon the guilt or innocence of the defendant. In other words, even if the defendant established that A.W. feared men prior to the incident of sexual abuse by the defendant, this would not have changed the defendant's guilt or innocence. Second, the domestic violence petitions filed by Yvette G. do not contradict her testimony on direct examination. The record reveals that on several instances in 1996 and 1998, A.W.'s stepfather allegedly verbally and physically abused A.W.'s mother, sometimes in front of A.W. and her siblings. From these petitions, however, it cannot be discerned whether the victim did or did not fear men as a result of her stepfather's alleged conduct. Also, nothing in these petitions directly refutes Yvette G.'s testimony on cross-examination that A.W. was comfortable around her stepfather when he lived with the family. Finally, the defendant was not completely precluded from questioning Yvette G. concerning A.W.'s relationship with her stepfather. Accordingly, we conclude that the circuit court's preclusion of the cross-examination of the victim's mother concerning domestic violence does not amount to manifest abuse or injustice.

As his second assignment of error, the defendant contends that the circuit court erred in allowing the prosecutor to argue in closing that A.W. is afraid of men because of the defendant's attack, after denying the defendant the opportunity to cross-examine Yvette G. concerning the domestic violence petitions.

In reviewing allegedly improper comments made by a prosecutor during closing argument, we are mindful that "[c]ounsel necessarily have great latitude in the argument of a case," State v. Clifford, 58 W.Va. 681, 687, 52 S.E. 864, 866 (1906) (citation omitted), and that "[u]ndue restriction should not be placed on a prosecuting attorney in his argument to the jury." State v. Davis, 139 W.Va. 645, 653, 81 S.E.2d 95, 101 (1954), overruled, in part, on other grounds, State v. Bragg, 140 W.Va. 585, 87 S.E.2d 689 (1955). Accordingly, "[t]he discretion of the trial court in ruling on the propriety of argument by counsel before the jury will not be interfered with by the appellate court, unless it appears that the rights of the complaining party have been prejudiced, or that manifest injustice resulted therefrom." Syllabus Point 3, State v. Boggs, 103 W.Va. 641, 138 S.E. 321 (1927).

At the close of the trial, the prosecutor argued in support of the reliability of the victim's testimony and stated,

> Why would an eleven year old make this up and how would she know how to act after something like this happened if she had made it up? . . . How reliable is it that she did this for days. That she clung to her mother. She wouldn't go out on the porch. That she was afraid of men after that.

The defendant argues that this was unfairly prejudicial because the prosecutor remarked on the defendant's failure to challenge Yvette G.'s testimony concerning A.W.'s fear of men. According to the defendant, the prosecutor also unfairly stated that the only reason for A.W.'s fear of men is the defendant's sexual abuse of the victim.

"A prosecutor may argue all reasonable inferences from the evidence in the record." Syllabus Point 7, in part, State v. England, 180 W.Va. 342, 376 S.E.2d 548 (1988). It is clear that the comments at issue constitute a reasonable inference from the evidence adduced from the testimony of Yvette G. Also, a prosecutor is not prohibited from commenting on the credibility of witnesses.[7] See State v. England, 180 W.Va. 342, 376 S.E.2d 548 (1988). Finally, this Court has carefully read the prosecutor's closing argument and we find no references to the defendant's failure to challenge Yvette G.'s testimony concerning A.W.'s fear of men, nor do we find the statement that there could be no other reason for the victim's fear but the defendant's sexual abuse. Accordingly, we believe that the prosecutor's comments do not result in prejudice or manifest injustice to the defendant. We conclude, therefore, that the circuit court did not abuse its discretion in allowing the comments.

[7]It is improper, however, for a prosecutor to assert his personal opinion as to the credibility of a witness. Syllabus Point 8, State v. England, supra.

Next, the defendant complains that the circuit court erred in precluding the defendant from cross-examining Detective Bailey concerning his lack of investigation in order to show bias, presumption of guilt, and lack of any attempt to corroborate the victim's allegation.

A review of the trial transcript reveals that defense counsel questioned Detective Bailey at length concerning the manner in which he conducted his investigation including Detective Bailey's failure to examine the place where the sexual abuse occurred, the fact that he did not ask the victim to identity the defendant from a photo array, his failure to determine whether there were any other witnesses at the defendant's residence at the time of the offense, and his failure to ask the defendant's mother if she had been at the house during the time period in which the sexual abuse occurred. In light of this, we find no merit to this assignment of error.

The fourth issue raised by the defendant is whether the circuit court improperly allowed evidence of the defendant's prior conviction. The record reveals that in a pre-trial conference order dated June 15, 1998, the circuit court set the trial date for September 9, 1998, and ordered the State to file requests, pre-trial motions, and notices by June 29, 1998. On August 26, 1998, the State filed its notice of intent, > to use evidence of Defendant's prior conviction on January 6, 1995 in State of West Virginia v. Richard Graham, Case Number 94-F-172 and the circumstances attendant to that conviction, pursuant to Rule 404(b) . . . to prove Defendant's lustful disposition to children, his motive, opportunity, intent, preparation, plan, knowledge, identity, and/or absence of mistake or accident.

On August 27, 1998, the defendant filed an objection to the use of this evidence because of the untimeliness of the notice, the State's previous failure to notify the defendant of the use of the evidence in response to the defendant's motion for discovery and inspection, and the State's failure to state witnesses, facts, or evidence relative to this evidence. The trial was ultimately continued until December 10, 1998. On the morning of the trial, both sides argued the issue, and the circuit court admitted the evidence for the purpose of showing the defendant's lustful disposition.

This Court has stated:

> Evidence of other crimes, wrongs, or acts is not admissible to prove the character of a person in order to show that he acted in conformity therewith. It may, however, be admissible for other purposes, such as proof of motive, opportunity, intent, preparation, plan, knowledge, identity, or absence of mistake or accident. W.Va. R.Evid. 404(b).

Syllabus Point 1, State v. Edward Charles L., 183 W.Va. 641, 398 S.E.2d 123 (1990).

> The standard of review for a trial court's admission of evidence pursuant to Rule 404(b) [of the West Virginia Rules of Evidence] involves a three-step analysis. First, we review for clear error the trial court's factual determination that there is > sufficient evidence to show the other acts occurred. Second, we review de novo whether the trial court correctly found the evidence was admissible for a legitimate purpose. Third, we review for an abuse of discretion the trial court's conclusion that the "other acts" evidence is more probative than prejudicial under Rule 403.

State v. LaRock, 196 W.Va. 294, 310-311, 470 S.E.2d 613, 629-630 (1996) (footnote and citations omitted).

First, we address the timeliness of the State's disclosure of its intent to use the Rule 404(b) evidence.

> When a trial court grants a pre-trial discovery motion requiring the prosecution to disclose evidence in its possession, non-disclosure by the prosecution is fatal to its case where such non-disclosure is prejudicial. The non-disclosure is prejudicial where the defense is surprised on a material issue and where the failure to make the disclosure hampers the preparation and presentation of the defendant's case.

Syllabus Point 2, State v. Grimm, 165 W.Va. 547, 270 S.E.2d 173 (1980), modified, Syllabus Point 1, State v. Johnson, 179 W.Va. 619, 371 S.E.2d 340 (1988).[8] The instant case does not concern non-disclosure but rather disclosure outside the original time frame mandated by the circuit court. Despite this untimeliness, the defendant still received notice of the State's intent to use the evidence approximately three months and fourteen days prior to trial. Further, the defendant fails to explain how he was prejudiced by the untimely disclosure of the evidence. Therefore, we conclude that the notice was sufficiently timely to prevent surprise and to give the defendant the opportunity to prepare his defense.

[8]"Although Grimm was written prior to the adoption of the West Virginia Rules of Criminal Procedure, the standard for determining whether failure to comply with court-ordered discovery is fatal remains the same as that which we announced in Grimm." State v. Gary F., 189 W.Va. 523, 527 n. 4, 432 S.E.2d 793, 797 n. 4 (1993). "The modification [of Grimm] . . . does not affect the substance of the standard; merely its form." Id.

Concerning the sufficiency of the notice, this Court has said:

> When offering evidence under Rule 404(b) of the West Virginia Rules of Evidence, the prosecution is required to identify the specific purpose for which the evidence is being offered and the jury must be instructed to limit its consideration of the evidence to only that purpose. It is not sufficient for the prosecution or the trial court merely to cite or mention the litany of possible uses listed in Rule 404(b). The specific and precise purpose for which the evidence is offered must clearly be shown from the record and that purpose alone must be told to the jury in the trial court's instruction.

Syllabus Point 1, State v. McGinnis, 193 W.Va. 147, 455 S.E.2d 516 (1994). The text of the notice specifically contains the style, the date, and the case number of the defendant's prior conviction. It also states that the purpose of the evidence is, inter alia, to prove the defendant's lustful disposition toward children. This was sufficient to give the defendant notice of both the nature and the purpose of the Rule 404(b) evidence.

As for the admission of the evidence, it is clear that there is sufficient evidence to show the other acts occurred. Also, we believe the trial court correctly found the evidence admissible for a legitimate purpose. In Syllabus Point 2 of State v. Edward Charles L., supra, we stated:

> Collateral acts or crimes may be introduced in cases involving child sexual assault or sexual abuse victims to show the perpetrator had a lustful disposition towards the victim, a lustful disposition towards children generally, or a lustful disposition to > specific other children provided such evidence relates to incidents reasonably close in time to the incident(s) giving rise to the indictment. To the extent that this conflicts with our decision in State v. Dolin, [176] W.Va. [688], 347 S.E.2d 208 (1986), it is overruled.

Finally, we find that the circuit court did not abuse its discretion in concluding that the other acts evidence is more probative than prejudicial under Rule 403.

Next, the defendant claims that the record does not reflect that a proper limiting instruction was given concerning the admission of the Rule 404(b) evidence.[9] We disagree. The trial transcript shows that the circuit court gave the following instruction when the Rule 404(b) evidence was admitted.

> I'm going to give you what is called precautionary instructions that tell you how to treat the evidence you've just received. The Court instructs the jury that it has heard evidence that the Defendant was previously convicted of sexual abuse in the 1st degree against an 11 year old girl under somewhat similar circumstances. Such evidence of a collateral crime is not to be considered as proof of the Defendant's guilt on the present part but may be considered in deciding whether the Defendant had a (unclear) disposition for children and that his actions were intentional and were done (unclear).

In the jury charge contained in the record, the above instruction is recorded in its entirety. In place of the first "unclear" is the phrase "lustful disposition toward children." The second "unclear" is replaced with the phrase, "for his sexual gratification." Superimposed on this typed instruction is the trial judge's handwriting which states that the instruction was "[r]ead to Jury at 1:28 p.m. on 12/10/98 in trial of State v. Richard

[9]The defendant's brief is inconsistent on this point. On the previous page the defendant states that "[c]ounsel believes the Court probably did give an adequate instruction."

Graham 98-FE 121 1C." This notation is followed by the trial judge's signature. We conclude from this that the circuit court gave an adequate limiting instruction.

Last, the defendant asserts that the trial transcript is so incomplete as to deny him a record for his appeal. Specifically, the defendant complains of the numerous times in which the trial transcript contains the word "unclear" in place of what was actually said at trial. The State agrees that the transcript contains a disturbing number of unclear passages,[10] but avers that there is no identifiable error or prejudice shown by the defendant requiring reversal of his conviction. We agree.

Although we have not specifically addressed this issue, other courts have held that "omissions from a trial transcript only warrant a new trial if 'the missing portion of the transcript specifically prejudices [a defendant's] appeal.'" U.S. v. Brown, 202 F.3d 691, 696 (4th Cir. 2000), quoting United States v. Gillis, 773 F.2d 549, 554 (4th Cir. 1985); United States v. Huggins, 191 F.3d 532, 536 (4th Cir. 1999), cert. denied, ___ U.S. ___, 120 S.Ct. 1968, 146 L.Ed.2d 799 (2000). See also State v. Clark, 644 So.2d 1130, 1131 (La.App. 4 Cir. 1994), writ denied, 651 So.2d 287 (La. 1995) ("a defendant is not necessarily entitled to have his conviction reversed just because there is no trial transcript available for review . . . . [but] where a defendant's right of review was prejudiced . . . the defendant was given relief"). This is in accord with our own law. In State v. Mayle, 178 W.Va. 26, 357 S.E.2d 219 (1987), the defendant claimed that his due process rights were violated because more than two years elapsed before his transcript was supplied to him so that he could complete his appeal. This Court disagreed, explaining that "we have allowed him his appeal, and he has shown no prejudice by the delay of two years." Mayle, 178 W.Va. at 30, 357 S.E.2d at 223. Despite the regrettable number of unclear passages, we believe that the transcript in no way prejudices the defendant's right to a meaningful appeal. This Court had no difficulty in assessing the defendant's alleged errors in light of the record.

III.

CONCLUSION

For the foregoing reasons, we find no merit in the assignments of error raised by the defendant. Accordingly, the judgment of the Circuit Court of Mercer County is affirmed.

Affirmed.

Starcher, J., concurring:

I concur because the evidence is strong that this defendant has serious physical and psychological problems and needs care and intensive treatment -- both to protect society, and to protect the defendant. The circuit judge's commendable creative sentence is a serious and appropriate step in this direction, and I simply would not tamper with that sentence.

However, in considering the trial that led to the defendant's appropriate sentence, I write separately to note my continuing dismay at the erosion of the integrity of our criminal processes, an erosion that the majority blindly approves.

In a criminal trial, evidence of "prior bad acts" is usually so unfairly prejudicial that we don't let it go before the jury, unless there's a special reason for its admission under W.Va. Rule of Evidence 404(b) -- for example, to show plan or motive, etc. As I stated in my dissent in State v. McIntosh, ___ W.Va. ___, ___ S.E.2d ___, No. 26849, 2000 WL 966149, July 14, 2000:

> Where a defendant admits touching a child on their sexual areas, but denies that the touching was for a sexual purpose, other instances of clearly non-accidental sexual touching might be admissible under 404(b) -- to show the defendant's actual plan or motive. That appears to be the case in the Yager case cited by the majority, where the court held that such evidence was admissible "to establish that it was no accident that [the defendant] touched the victim's penis." But in the instant case, the defendant denied all touching, so his motive was not a separate issue. Under these circumstances "other crimes" evidence should not be admissible under 404(b).

> One could write a dissertation on how Rule 404(b), McGinnis [193 W.Va. 147, 455 S.E.2d 516 (1994)], and now Edward Charles L. [183 W.Va. 641, 398 S.E.2d 123 (1990)] have become a "runaway train" in some of our courts, when judges are tempted to abandon their proper gatekeeper role by over-zealous prosecutors. We have moved far away from the original purpose for permitting such evidence. The standard now seems to be: Will it help the prosecutor?

In most cases, as soon as a jury hears about a defendant's prior sex offense, a defendant is dead meat. Why even have a trial? I await the day when this Court can stops this runaway train. We can and will apply common sense to this currently confused area of law. When that happens, criminal trials in sex offense cases will be conducted fairly and in accord with the rules of evidence.

Per Curiam:

This is an appeal by J.P. (hereinafter "the petitioner")[1] from a final order of the Circuit Court of Hancock County, West Virginia, awarding grandparent visitation to S.R. (hereinafter "the respondent"). The petitioner contends that the circuit court erred in awarding grandparent visitation rights to the respondent. Upon thorough review of the appendix record, briefs, arguments of counsel, and applicable precedent, this Court reverses the decision of the lower court and remands this matter for entry of an order denying grandparent visitation rights to the respondent.

I. Factual and Procedural History

The petitioner's daughter, A.P., was born on May 8, 2009.[2] For the first two and one-half months of A.P.'s life, she and the petitioner lived with the petitioner's mother, the respondent S.R. During that portion of A.P.'s infancy, the respondent interacted with A.P. on a daily basis and provided extensive childcare.[3] On July 23, 2009, the petitioner and the child moved out of the respondent's home, and the child and the respondent continued to have several visits per week and multiple overnight visits between July 2009 and December 2009. The relationship between the petitioner and the respondent deteriorated by December 2009, and visitation gradually decreased thereafter. In April 2010, the petitioner prohibited further visitation between the child and the respondent.

[1]Due to the sensitive nature of this case, this Court uses only the initials of the affected parties. See In re D.P., 230 W.Va. 254, 737 S.E.2d 282 (2012).

[2]The petitioner is unmarried. The record indicates that the child's father lives in Florida and has minimal contact with the child, with no court-ordered visitation.

[3]The respondent was employed as a teacher; thus, she was able to provide childcare to A.P. during her vacation time in the summer of 2009.

The respondent filed a petition for grandparent visitation on June 23, 2010. Subsequent to a hearing, the family court directed the petitioner and the respondent to meet for lunch on certain days each month. The family court held another hearing on January 25, 2011, and entered an August 4, 2011, order awarding grandparent visitation to S.R. In that order, the family court found that the respondent had been a significant caretaker for the first several months of the child's life and had formed a bond with the child. Further, the family court found that the best interests of the child would be served by a continuation of the relationship with the respondent. The family court ordered visitation as follows: once a month for five hours; a period of time on Easter weekend; four hours of visitation the day before Thanksgiving; four hours every December 23; and three hours near the child's birthday.

The family court, acknowledging concerns the petitioner had raised regarding the respondent's negativity and general disparaging comments,[4] ordered the respondent to refrain from making any negative comments within the hearing distance of the child. The family court also held that the petitioner had the right to be present during all periods of visitation. The petitioner appealed that family court's decision to the circuit court, which affirmed the family court's order on December 6, 2011. The petitioner now appeals to this Court.

This Court's standard of review for appeals arising from family court decisions is as follows:

> In reviewing a final order entered by a circuit court judge upon a review of, or upon a refusal to review, a final order of a family court judge, we review the findings of fact made by the family court judge under the clearly erroneous standard, and the application of law to the facts under an abuse of discretion standard. We review questions of law de novo.

Syllabus, Carr v. Hancock, 216 W.Va. 474, 607 S.E.2d 803 (2004). In syllabus point one of Chrystal R.M. v. Charlie A.L., 194 W.Va. 138, 459 S.E.2d 415 (1995), this Court also stated that "[w]here the issue on an appeal from the circuit court is clearly a question of law or involving an interpretation of a statute, we apply a de novo standard of review."

[4]The family court noted that the petitioner and the respondent disagreed over the petitioner's significant other and that the respondent had made disparaging comments in the presence of the child. In weighing the opposing interests, the family court observed that the respondent had spent every day with the child while the petitioner and the child resided with the respondent. The family court also noted that family members had testified that the respondent had formed a bond with the child and had provided significant childcare.

III. Discussion

This Court has specified that "[t]he Grandparent Visitation Act, W.Va. Code § 48-10-101 et seq. [2001], is the exclusive means through which a grandparent may seek visitation with a grandchild." Syl. Pt. 1, In re Hunter H., No. 12-0173 ___ W.Va. ___, ___ S.E.2d ___, 2013 WL 1113367 (W.Va. filed March 14, 2013). In syllabus point two of Hunter, this Court held that "[t]he best interests of the child are expressly incorporated into the Grandparent Visitation Act in W.Va. Code §§ 48-10-101, 48-10-501, and 48-10-502 [2001]." Moreover, this Court has explained that paramount consideration shall be accorded to the best interests of the child in an analysis of a grandparent visitation request. This Court identified that concern in syllabus point one of Petition of Nearhoof, 178 W.Va. 359, 359 S.E.2d 587 (1987), as follows: "A trial court, in considering a petition of a grandparent for visitation rights with a grandchild or grandchildren pursuant to W.Va. Code, 48-2-15(b)(1) [1986] or W.Va. Code, 48-2B-1 [1980], shall give paramount consideration to the best interests of the grandchild or grandchildren involved."

The statutory foundation for evaluation of grandparent visitation petitions is enunciated in West Virginia Code § 48-10-501 (2009). That statute provides that "[t]he circuit court shall grant reasonable visitation to a grandparent upon a finding that visitation would be in the best interests of the child and would not substantially interfere with the parent-child relationship." Factors to be considered in making a decision regarding grandparent visitation are listed in West Virginia Code § 48-10-502 (2009), as follows:

> (1) The age of the child;
> (2) The relationship between the child and the grandparent;
>
> (3) The relationship between each of the child's parents or the person with whom the child is residing and the grandparent;
>
> (4) The time which has elapsed since the child last had contact with the grandparent;
>
> (5) The effect that such visitation will have on the relationship between the child and the child's parents or the person with whom the child is residing;
>
> (6) If the parents are divorced or separated, the custody and visitation arrangement which exists between the parents with regard to the child;
>
> (7) The time available to the child and his or her parents, giving consideration to such matters as each parent's employment schedule, the child's schedule for home, school and community activities, and the child's and parents' holiday and vacation schedule;
> (8) The good faith of the grandparent in filing the motion or petition;

> (10) Whether the child has, in the past, resided with the grandparent for a significant period or periods of time, with or without the child's parent or parents;
> (11) Whether the grandparent has, in the past, been a significant caretaker for the child, regardless of whether the child resided inside or outside of the grandparent's residence;
>
> (12) The preference of the parents with regard to the requested visitation; and
> (13) Any other factor relevant to the best interests of the child.

West Virginia Code § 48-10-702(b) (2009) creates a rebuttable presumption that a grandparent, filing a petition pursuant to West Virginia Code § 48-10-402 (2009),[5] is not entitled to court-ordered visitation privileges where the parent through whom the grandparent is related to the grandchild has custody of the child. Specifically, West Virginia Code § 48-10-702(b) provides as follows:

> If a petition is filed pursuant to section 10-402 [§ 48-10-402], there is a presumption that visitation privileges need not be extended to the grandparent if the parent through whom the grandparent is related to the grandchild has custody of the child, shares custody of the child, or exercises visitation privileges with the child that would allow participation in the visitation by the grandparent if the parent so chose. This presumption may be rebutted by clear and convincing evidence that an award of grandparent visitation is in the best interest of the child.

[5]West Virginia Code § 48-10-402 applies, as in the present case, when a proceeding for divorce, custody, legal separation, annulment, or establishment of paternity is not pending.

In reconciling the valid competing interests ensconced within a grandparent visitation determination, significant weight must be accorded to a fit parent's wishes. This principle is encompassed within West Virginia Code § 48-10-702(b), as quoted above, and is premised upon the recognition that a fit parent having custody of a child possesses distinct rights regarding the selection of individuals with whom that child may be affiliated. This principle was the determining factor in Troxel v. Granville, 530 U.S. 57 (2000), in which the United States Supreme Court held that a Washington state statute violated the substantive due process rights[6] of a parent by allowing visitation rights, over parental objection, even where such visitation served the best interests of the child. Id. at 61. The Supreme Court held that the Washington statute unconstitutionally infringed upon a parent's rights by failing to accord appropriate deference to "a parent's decision that visitation would not be in the child's best interest." Id. at 67. The Troxel Court further explained that > so long as a parent adequately cares for his or her children (i.e. is fit), there will normally be no reason for the State to inject itself into the private realm of the family to further question the ability of that parent to make the best decisions concerning the rearing of that parent's children.

[6]The Troxel Court stated that "[t]he liberty interest at issue in this case - the interest of parents in the care, custody and control of their children - is perhaps the oldest of the fundamental liberty interests recognized by this Court." 530 U.S. at 65.

Id. at 68-69. The Troxel Court, with Justice O'Connor writing for the plurality, held that some "special weight"[7] must be accorded to the parents' wishes concerning visitation, reasoning as follows:

> In an ideal world, parents might always seek to cultivate the bonds between grandparents and their grandchildren. Needless to say, however, our world is far from perfect, and in it the decision whether such an intergenerational relationship would be beneficial in any specific case is for the parent to make in the first instance. And, if a fit parent's decision of the kind at issue here becomes subject to judicial review, the court must accord at least some special weight to the parent's own determination.

Id. at 70.

In discussing the rationale of Troxel, this Court has observed that the Supreme Court "instructs that a judicial determination regarding whether grandparent visitation rights are appropriate may not be premised solely on the best interests of the child analysis." Cathy L.M. v. Mark Brent R., 217 W.Va. 319, 327-28, 617 S.E.2d 866, 874-75 (2005) Rather, the evaluating court "must also consider and give significant weight to the parents' preference, thus precluding a court from intervening in a fit parent's decision making on a best interests basis." Id.

[7]Although Troxel does not define "special weight," state courts attempting to interpret and apply Troxel have reasoned that "special weight" indicates considerable deference. In In re M.W., 292 P.3d 1158 (Colo. App. 2012), for instance, the Colorado Court of Appeals explained that "[g]iving special weight means that the presumption favoring the parent's decision can be rebutted only by clear and convincing evidence that granting parental responsibilities to the nonparent is in the child's best interests." Id. at 1161. Interestingly, that is the same standard statutorily mandated by this state in West Virginia Code § 48-10-702(b). As the Court of Appeals of Wisconsin aptly noted, creating such a rebuttable presumption is "the legal means" of according special weight to the parent's wishes. In re Nicholas L., 731 N.W.2d 288, 293 (Wis. Ct. App. 2007).

In State ex rel. Brandon L. v. Moats, 209 W.Va. 752, 551 S.E.2d 674 (2001), this Court indicated that it was not identifying "the amount of weight that should attach to the factor of parental preference. . . ." Id. at 763, 551 S.E.2d at 685. The Brandon Court noted, however, that "in light of the Troxel decision it is clear that 'the court must accord at least some special weight to the parent's own determination' provided that the parent has not been shown to be unfit." Id. (quoting Troxel, 530 U.S. at 70).

In the present case, the petitioner contends that the family court and circuit court erred in failing to properly consider specific statutorily-prescribed factors relevant to this case, including the young age[8] of the child; the significance of the limited time the child lived with the respondent; and the extent of the child's relationship[9] with the respondent. The petitioner further asserts that the lower tribunals erred by finding that the respondent had rebutted the statutory presumption against awarding visitation privileges and argues that proper weight was not accorded to her wishes, as a fit parent.[10]

This Court has recognized that "[t]he profound benefits of a child's relationship with grandparents have been deservedly acclaimed." Cathy L.M., 217 W.Va. at 327, 617 S.E.2d at 874. In that vein, this Court explained as follows in Nearhoof:

> It is biological fact that grandparents are bound to their grandchildren by the unbreakable links of heredity. It is common human experience that the concern and interest grandparents take in the welfare of their grandchildren far exceeds anything explicable in purely biological terms. A very special relationship often arises and continues between grandparents and grandchildren. The tensions and conflicts which commonly mar relations between parents and children are often absent between those very same parents and their grandchildren. Visits with a grandparent are often a precious part of a child's experience and there are benefits which devolve upon the grandchild from the relationship with his grandparents which he cannot derive from any other relationship. Neither the Legislature nor this Court is blind to human truths which grandparents and grandchildren have always known.

178 W.Va. at 364, 359 S.E.2d at 592 (quoting Mimkon v. Ford, 66 N.J. 426, 332 A.2d 199, 204-05 (1975)).

Perhaps in recognition of these immeasurable benefits flowing from a grandparent/grandchild relationship, the family court in the present case attempted to structure a schedule of visitation which would foster reconciliation between the petitioner and the respondent. These attempts were regrettably unsuccessful, and this Court is now presented with the question of whether the lower tribunals erred in analyzing the statutory factors, applying the statutory presumption against grandparent visitation, and according appropriate weight to the fervent wishes of the fit parent in this case. The petitioner testified extensively regarding her concerns that the respondent's negativity will have an adverse impact upon her daughter. She expressed her strong opposition to subjecting her child to those detrimental influences. While this Court acknowledges that a judicial tribunal cannot, with absolute certainly, assess the degree to which the petitioner's concerns may be unwarranted, the petitioner's status as a fit parent is uncontested, and her expressed preferences regarding visitation must consequently be accorded special weight in the determination of the appropriateness of court-ordered grandparent visitation.[11]

The respondent contends that the petitioner's wishes were given appropriate weight, according to the requirements of Troxel. She further contends that she successfully rebutted the statutory presumption against an award of grandparent visitation rights by presenting clear and convincing evidence that visitation was in the best interests of the child, based upon the substantial relationship she had developed with the child. Additionally, the respondent argues that the lower tribunals properly weighed the young age of the child and that such consideration was the basis for the court's decision to grant limited visitation to her.

This Court's resolution of the matter must be premised upon the directives of Troxel, the statutory presumption against grandparent visitation, and the factors enumerated for consideration in grandparent visitation matters. The mandates of Troxel require that the wishes of the petitioner, as a fit parent presumed capable of rational choices concerning the relationships to be enjoyed by her child, be accorded special weight.[12] As the Supreme Court stated in Troxel, there is "a presumption that fit parents act in the best interest of their children." 530 U.S. at 69.

Moreover, West Virginia Code § 48-10-702(b) creates a presumption against grandparent visitation under the circumstances of the present case, rebuttable only upon a demonstration by clear and convincing evidence that visitation is in the best interests of the child. The best interests factor is also included in the factors enumerated in West Virginia Code § 48-10-502. The parties introduced evidence regarding the factors most relevant to this case. Those included the young age of the child; the relationship between the child and the respondent; the relationship between the petitioner and the respondent; the parental preference; the respondent's prior duties as a caretaker for the child; and the period of time the child and the petitioner resided with the respondent.

It is apparent that the young age of the child and the brevity of the period in which the child resided in the respondent's home militate against a finding that visitation is to be mandated. Although the petitioner and A.P. spent a significant portion of A.P.'s first year of life with the respondent, the petitioner moved out of the respondent's home when A.P. was two and one-half months old. The respondent and A.P. continued to maintain a substantial relationship until the petitioner decided to terminate further visitation privileges when the child was approximately eleven months old. The respondent presented testimony regarding the substantial relationship she had enjoyed with the child, including such things as general childcare, play, and reading. However, considering the statutory factors, the statutory presumption against grandparent visitation, and the requirements of Troxel, this Court concludes that the lower tribunals erred in finding that the respondent rebutted the presumption by clear and convincing evidence that an award of grandparent visitation is in the best interest of the child

Based upon the foregoing, this Court reverses the order of the lower court and remands this matter for entry of an order denying grandparent visitation rights to the respondent.

Reversed and remanded, with directions.

Syl. Pt. 3, State ex rel. Brandon L. v. Moats, 209 W.Va. 752, 551 S.E.2d 674 (2001).

Per Curiam:

This is an appeal by Mark and Carla R.[1] (hereinafter "Appellants") from an order of the Circuit Court of Harrison County granting grandparent visitation rights to Cathy R. M. (hereinafter "Appellee") and her husband, Robert M. The lower court held that grandparent visitation would not substantially interfere with the parent-child relationship and would serve the best interests of the child, Cassidy R. The Appellants, as the adoptive parents of Cassidy R., appeal the lower court's decision, contending that grandparent visitation was erroneously granted and that the best interests of Cassidy R. are not served by visitation with Cassidy's biological grandmother, Appellee Cathy R. M. Upon thorough review of the record, briefs, arguments of counsel, and applicable precedent, this Court reverses the decision of the lower court and remands this matter for entry of an order denying grandparent visitation rights to the Appellee and her husband.

I. Factual and Procedural History

Cassidy R. was born on February 13, 1999, to biological parents Jasper R. and Shanna R. Cassidy's biological father, Jasper R., is the Appellee's son. The record reflects that the Appellee frequently visited with Cassidy during the first two and one-half years of Cassidy's life, and Cassidy resided with the Appellee during many weekends and holidays during that period of time. In September 2001, Jasper R. and Shanna R., as biological parents, consented to the adoption of Cassidy by the Appellants. Appellant Mark R. is the biological uncle of Jasper R. and the biological great-uncle of Cassidy.[2] The decree of adoption was entered by the Circuit Court of Harrison County on May 23, 2002. While the adoption was pending, the Appellants apparently determined that it was not in Cassidy's best interests to continue a relationship with the Appellee. Thus, the Appellants did not permit the Appellee to have any contact with Cassidy after April 2002.

[1]As in all sensitive matters involving the rights of children, we use only initials in reference to the last names of the individuals involved. See In the Matter of Scottie D., 185 W.Va. 191, 406 S.E.2d 214 (1991).

In April 2003, the Appellee filed a petition with the Family Court of Harrison County seeking grandparent visitation based upon her biological relationship to Cassidy, the fact that she had been a significant care giver to Cassidy prior to the adoption proceedings, and the assertion that it would be in Cassidy's best interests to restore a relationship with the Appellee. Guardian ad litem Ashley A. Lawson was appointed on October 21, 2003, and she submitted her report on December 4, 2003. In that report, Ms. Lawson recommended that the Appellants, as adoptive parents, should "have the sole determination of who [the adopted child] may spend time with. . . ." Ms. Lawson recommended that grandparent visitation rights be denied.

[2]Jasper R.'s father, Bob R., is Mark R.'s brother. Appellee Cathy R. M. (Jasper's mother) is no longer married to Bob R. and is now married to Robert M.

On January 20, 2004, the Family Court Judge entered an order granting grandparent visitation rights to the Appellee. The Appellants appealed this ruling to the lower court, and that appeal was denied without hearing on February 17, 2004.[3] They now appeal to this Court, contending that the family court erred in finding that visitation was in the best interests of Cassidy; that the family court unjustly interfered with the rights of the adoptive parents in ordering visitation over their objection; that the family court failed to apply the presumption that visitation privileges need not be granted; that the family court abused its discretion by failing to follow the guardian ad litem's recommendations; and that the Appellee failed to justify grandparent visitation.

II. Standard of Review

This Court's review of the issues presented is de novo. "Where the issue on an appeal from the circuit court is clearly a question of law or involving an interpretation of a statute, we apply a de novo standard of review." Syl. Pt. 1, Chrystal R.M. v. Charlie A.L., 194 W.Va. 138, 459 S.E.2d 415 (1995).

[3]Guardian ad litem Ashley Lawson relocated her legal practice to the state of Kentucky, and Guardian ad litem D. Andrew McMunn was thereafter appointed. Mr. McMunn has filed a brief with this Court, asserting one assignment of error. Mr. McMunn asserts that the family court abused its discretion "by awarding grandparent visitation to Appellee when, pursuant to the factors set forth in W. Va. Code §48-10-502, the visitation was not in the best interests of [Cassidy]."

III. Discussion

At common law, "grandparents possessed no legal right to custody or visitation of a grandchild over the parent's objection. Syl. pt. 1, Brotherton v. Boothe, 161 W.Va. 691, 250 S.E.2d 36 (1978); Jeffries v. Jeffries, 162 W.Va. 905, 907, 253 S.E.2d 689, 691 (1979)." Petition of Nearhoof, 178 W.Va. 359, 361-62, 359 S.E.2d 587, 589-90 (1987) (footnote omitted). In 1980, the West Virginia Legislature enacted West Virginia Code § 48-2B-1 (1980) (Repl. Vol. 1992), the precursor to the statute which provides guidance in the present case. The 1980 grandparent visitation statute provided for grandparent visitation with the child of a deceased child of such grandparent. The Nearhoof Court recognized that this statute "change[d] the common law rule in West Virginia as to the right of grandparents' visitation." 178 W.Va. at 362, 359 S.E.2d at 590.

This Court explained as follows in syllabus point one of Nearhoof: "A trial court, in considering a petition of a grandparent for visitation rights with a grandchild or grandchildren pursuant to W.Va. Code, 48-2-15(b)(1) [1986] or W.Va. Code, 48-2B-1 [1980], shall give paramount consideration to the best interests of the grandchild or grandchildren involved." This requirement has been sustained through all subsequent alterations to the grandparent visitation statute and is predicated upon the guiding principle that "[a] court, in defining a parent's right to visitation, is charged with giving paramount consideration to the welfare of the child involved." Syl. Pt. 1, Ledsome v. Ledsome, 171 W.Va. 602, 301 S.E.2d 475 (1983).

In Nearhoof, this Court encountered the issue of whether the grandparent visitation act, as written at that time, conflicted with the adoption statutes. The Nearhoof Court found that the principles expressed in the adoption and visitation statutes were not at variance with one another and, in so holding, observed that "had the legislature intended the adoption statute to limit the statute providing for grandparents' visitation, the statutes could have reflected that intention." 178 W.Va. at 364, 359 S.E.2d at 592 (citation omitted).

In addressing the parameters of the statutory authority granted by the grandparent visitation statute in Elmer Jimmy S. v. Kenneth B., 199 W.Va. 263, 483 S.E.2d 846 (1997), this Court found that despite the Legislature's failure to include any reference to a situation in which a grandparent seeks visitation rights subsequent to the termination of parental rights, the statute afforded circuit courts jurisdiction to consider such grandparent visitation requests. This Court stated:

> While W. Va.Code § 48-2B-1 et seq. is designated as the exclusive provision for grandparent visitation, it is silent with regard to grandparent visitation when the parental rights of the grandparent's child (the parent of the grandchild) have been terminated. In addition, we are not aware of any statute expressly prohibiting grandparent visitation under such circumstances. Thus, following the Court's reasoning in Nearhoof, we believe that had the legislature intended the termination of parental rights to affect the visitation rights of the corresponding grandparent, the statute could have reflected that intention.

This Court again emphasized the best interests analysis in Mary Jean H. v. Pamela Kay R., 198 W.Va. 690, 482 S.E.2d 675 (1996). This Court explained that "while the statute affords certain protections to the grandparent, it is in no measure a guarantee of the right to visitation." 198 W.Va. at 693, 482 S.E.2d at 678. "The best interests of the child must be given greatest priority, and the rights of the child are superior to those of the grandparent seeking visitation." Id. at 693, 482 S.E.2d at 678.

The grandparent visitation act was substantially enhanced in 2001, and it is that most recent version of the statute that applies in the present case. The best interests of the child issue is addressed in West Virginia Code § 48-10-101 (2001) (Repl. Vol. 2004), providing as follows:

> The Legislature finds that circumstances arise where it is appropriate for circuit courts of this state to order that grandparents of minor children may exercise visitation with their grandchildren. The Legislature further finds that in such situations, as in all situations involving children, the best interests of the child or children are the paramount consideration.

Further, in § 48-10-102 (2001) (Repl. Vol. 2004), the Legislature explicitly states: "It is the express intent of the Legislature that the provisions for grandparent visitation that are set forth in this article are exclusive." Section 48-10-203 (2001) (Repl. Vol. 2004) thereafter defines grandparent as follows: "'Grandparent' means a biological grandparent, a person married or previously married to a biological grandparent, or a person who has previously been granted custody of the parent of a minor child with whom visitation is sought."

West Virginia Code § 48-10-501 (2001) (Repl. Vol. 2004) provides that "[t]he circuit could shall grant reasonable visitation to a grandparent upon a finding that visitation would be in the best interests of the child and would not substantially interfere with the parent-child relationship." Factors to be considered in making a determination regarding grandparent visitation are listed in West Virginia Code § 48-10-502 (2001) (Repl. Vol. 2004), as follows:

> (1) The age of the child;
> (2) The relationship between the child and the grandparent;
>
> (3) The relationship between each of the child's parents or the person with whom the child is residing and the grandparent;
>
> (4) The time which has elapsed since the child last had contact with the grandparent;
>
> (5) The effect that such visitation will have on the relationship between the child and the child's parents or the person with whom the child is residing;
>
> (6) If the parents are divorced or separated, the custody and visitation arrangement which exists between the parents with regard to the child;
>
> (7) The time available to the child and his or her parents, giving consideration to such matters as each parent's employment schedule, the child's schedule for home, school and community activities, and the child's and parents' holiday and vacation schedule;
> (8) The good faith of the grandparent in filing the motion or petition;

> (9) Any history of physical, emotional or sexual abuse or neglect being performed, procured, assisted or condoned by the grandparent;
>
> (10) Whether the child has, in the past, resided with the grandparent for a significant period or periods of time, with or without the child's parent or parents;
> (11) Whether the grandparent has, in the past, been a significant caretaker for the child, regardless of whether the child resided inside or outside of the grandparent's residence;
>
> (12) The preference of the parents with regard to the requested visitation; and
> (13) Any other factor relevant to the best interests of the child.

West Virginia Code § 48-10-702 (2001) (Repl. Vol. 2004) provides guidance regarding the level of proof required in a case such as the present one, in which an action is not pending for divorce, custody, legal separation, annulment, or the establishment of paternity. That statute provides as follows:

> (a) If a petition is filed pursuant to section 10-402 [§ 48-10-402] when the parent through whom the grandparent is related to the grandchild does not: (1) Have custody of the child; (2) share custody of the child; or (3) exercise visitation privileges with the child that would allow participation in the visitation by the grandparent if the parent so chose, the grandparent shall be granted visitation if a preponderance of the evidence shows that visitation is in the best interest of the child.
> (b) If a petition is filed pursuant to section 10-402 [§ 48-10-402], there is a presumption that visitation privileges need not be extended to the grandparent if the parent through whom the grandparent is related to the grandchild has custody of the child, shares custody of the child, or exercises visitation privileges with the child that would allow participation in the > visitation by the grandparent if the parent so chose. This presumption may be rebutted by clear and convincing evidence that an award of grandparent visitation is in the best interest of the child.

The Appellants in the present case did not challenge the underlying decision on the issue of the standing of a biological grandmother to seek grandparent visitation rights with a biological grandchild who has been adopted. In their appeal, the Appellants state: "In this case the natural Grandmother filed a Petition for Visitation with the adopted child, which appears to be within the statutory guidelines." This Court addressed this issue of grandparents' standing to seek visitation under this state's statutory scheme in State ex rel. Brandon L. v. Moats, 209 W.Va. 752, 551 S.E.2d 674 (2001). In that case, this Court evaluated the rights of paternal grandparents to visit a biological grandchild subsequent to adoption by the child's step-father and held that "there are no limitations on when a petition may be filed by a grandparent . . ." and that "the act does not proscribe consideration of petitions seeking visitation to only pre-adoption situations." 209 W.Va. at 756, 551 S.E.2d at 678 (footnote omitted). The Court found that the adoption statutes did not negate the visitation rights granted in the grandparent visitation statute, recognizing this Court's prior decision in Nearhoof regarding the potential conflict between adoption and visitation statutes and also acknowledging the Legislature's specifically articulated intention that the "grandparent Act, by its own express declaration, is the exclusive statutory scheme for resolving issues of grandparent visitation." 209 W.Va. at 755, 551 S.E.2d at 677.

Significantly, it is well established that "[t]he Legislature, when it enacts legislation, is presumed to know its prior enactments.' Syllabus Point 12, Vest v. Cobb, 138 W.Va. 660, 76 S.E.2d 885 (1953)." Syl. Pt. 5, Pullano v. City of Bluefield, 176 W.Va. 198, 342 S.E.2d 164 (1986). "As a general rule of statutory construction, if several statutory provisions cannot be harmonized, controlling effect must be given to the last enactment of the Legislature." Syl. Pt. 2, State ex rel. Dept. of Health and Human Resources v. West Virginia Pub. Employees Ret. Sys., 183 W.Va. 39, 393 S.E.2d 677 (1990).

Further, the inclusion of West Virginia Code § 48-10-902 (2001) (Repl. Vol. 2004) within the grandparent visitation statutory structure indicates that the Legislature distinguishes between adoptions occurring within the family and those occurring outside the family with respect to the appropriateness of continued visitation between a grandparent and a grandchild who has been adopted.[4] In that section, the Legislature specified as follows: "If a child who is subject to a grandparent visitation order under this article is later adopted, the order for grandparent visitation is automatically vacated when the order for adoption is entered, unless the adopting parent is a stepparent, grandparent or other relative of the child."

[4]As observed by the Brandon Court, the inclusion of this provision "makes clear that the Legislature both contemplated and approved the continuation of visitation rights following an adoption in those instances where the adoption occurs within the immediate family, as opposed to outside the family." 209 W.Va. at 757, 551 S.E.2d at 679.

While the child in the present case was not subject to a grandparent visitation order prior to her adoption, and therefore the statute does not definitively resolve this issue, the statute does provides guidance regarding the legislative conception regarding the circumstances under which adoption should sever all visitation between adopted children and their biological grandparents. Cassidy was adopted by her great-uncle in the present case; thus, if a grandparent visitation order had been in place prior to Cassidy's adoption by her great-uncle, the visitation order would not have been automatically vacated pursuant to the provisions of West Virginia Code § 48-10-902.

It is also of significance that despite vigorous debate, evident within the majority and dissenting opinions in Brandon as well as this Court's earlier opinion in Nearhoof, regarding the interplay between adoption statutes and visitation statutes, the Legislature has not altered or enhanced the grandparent visitation statute to more clearly express its intentions since the Nearhoof and Brandon opinions were issued in 1987 and 2001, respectively. Other states' grandparent visitation statutes include more detailed guidance regarding the effect of adoption upon the rights of a biological grandparent. In North Carolina, for instance, North Carolina General Statutes § 50-13.2A (1985) (Repl. Vol. 2001) contains the following detailed explanation:

> A biological grandparent may institute an action or proceeding for visitation rights with a child adopted by a stepparent or a relative of the child where a substantial relationship exists between the grandparent and the child. Under no circumstances shall a biological grandparent of a child > adopted by adoptive parents, neither of whom is related to the child and where parental rights of both biological parents have been terminated, be entitled to visitation rights. A court may award visitation rights if it determines that visitation is in the best interest of the child. An order awarding visitation rights shall contain findings of fact which support the determination by the judge of the best interest of the child. Procedure, venue, and jurisdiction shall be as in an action for custody.

The West Virginia Legislature has not provided such additional direction regarding this issue since this Court's decisions in Nearhoof and Brandon. In Knight-Ridder Broadcasting, Inc. v. Greenberg, 511 N.E.2d 1116 (N.Y. 1987), the court observed as follows:

> [I]t is a recognized principle that where a statute has been interpreted by the courts, the continued use of the same language by the Legislature subsequent to the judicial interpretation is indicative that the legislative intent has been correctly ascertained (Matter of Curtin v. City of New York, 287 N.Y. 338, 342, 39 N.E.2d 903; Matter of Gilmore v. Preferred Acc. Ins. Co., 283 N.Y. 92, 97, 27 N.E.2d 515; *Transit Commn. v. Long Is. R.R. Syllabus point three of Brandon[6] concluded as follows:

> The West Virginia Grandparent Visitation Act, West Virginia Code §§ 48-2B-1 to -12 (1998) (Repl. Vol. 1999), by its terms, does not violate the substantive due process right of liberty extended to a parent in connection with his/her right to exercise care, custody, and control over his/her child[ren] without undue interference from the state.

209 W. Va. at 753, 551 S.E.2d at 675. Having so concluded, however, this Court in *Brando*n cautioned that "a grandparent who seeks to avail him or herself of this statutorily-granted mechanism for seeking visitation must be able to demonstrate that the visitation being sought will be in the best interest of the child[ren] and will not substantially interfere with the parent-child relationship." Id. at 765, 551 S.E.2d at 687. "This will be very difficult to do in cases where adoptions have preceded the petitions seeking visitation unless the petitioning grandparent[s] can demonstrate . . . that such visitation is likely to be a positive factor in the child's life and will not unduly disrupt the child's relationship with his/her parent(s)." Id. at 765, 551 S.E.2d at 687.

[6]West Virginia Code §§ 48-2B-1 to -12 (1998) (Repl. Vol. 1999), as referenced in Brandon, are now codified at West Virginia Code §§ 48-10-101 to -1201 (2001) (Repl. Vol. 2004).

Thus, as recognized in Brandon, a grandparent such as the Appellee in the present case faces a substantial challenge in attempting to demonstrate the grandparent visitation should be ordered. The Appellants in the present case allege that the lower court erred in its analysis of the § 48-10-502 statutory factors to be considered in this case. Specifically, the Appellants assert that the lower court failed to accord proper weight to the parents' wishes regarding visitation. In Brandon, this Court specified that it was not assessing "the amount of weight that should attach to the factor of parental preference. . . ." 209 W.Va. at 763, 551 S.E.2d at 685. However, "in light of the Troxel decision it is clear that 'the court must accord at least some special weight to the parent's own determination' provided that the parent has not been shown to be unfit." Id. at 763, 551 S.E.2d at 685 (quoting Troxel v. Granville, 530 U.S. 57, 70 (2000)).

The parents and the guardian ad litem in the present case[7] contend that the best interests of Cassidy are not served by permitting visitation with the Appellee. In their respective briefs, the parties and the guardian ad litem analyzed each of the factors enumerated in West Virginia Code § 48-10-502 applicable to the present case. Evaluating each of these arguments regarding these numerous factors, this Court first finds that Cassidy's young age mitigates against the requested visitation. The Appellee had not had visitation with Cassidy since she was three years old. Visitation was ordered to resume[8] near Cassidy's fifth birthday. Second, the relationship between the Appellee and Cassidy has been limited. While the Appellee cared for Cassidy every weekend during the first two and one-half years of Cassidy's life, their association since the adoption was pending has been

[7]Although this Court agrees with the Appellants' ultimate contentions regarding the best interests analysis, the Appellants' arguments relating to the application of West Virginia Code § 48-10-702 are without merit. The Appellants contend that subsection (b) of the act applies, presenting a presumption that visitation privileges need not be extended to the grandparent and permitting rebuttal of such presumption only by clear and convincing evidence presented by the grandparent that an award of visitation is in the best interests of the child. The Appellants maintain that subsection (b) applies because the statutory phrase "parent through whom the grandparent is related to the grandchild" refers to the adoptive father, Mark R., and the Appellee is related to Mark R. as a former sister-in-law. A careful reading of that statute, however, reveals that the reference to "the parent through whom the grandparent is related to the grandchild" is designed to ascertain whether the grandparent's child (parent of grandchild) has custody, shares custody, or exercises visitation privileges. Thus, it is Jasper R. through whom the Appellee (Jasper's mother) is related to Cassidy. Because Jasper R. does not have custody, share custody, or exercise visitation privileges, subsection (a) of the statute applies, providing that the Appellee "shall be granted visitation if a preponderance of the evidence shows that visitation is in the best interest of the child." W. Va. Code § 48-10-702(a).

[8]The visitation order entered by the lower court has not been stayed and, to the best of this Court's knowledge, visitation has continued during the pendency of this appeal.

very infrequent. Third, the relationship between the Appellants and the Appellee also mitigates against visitation. The Appellants do not want Cassidy to continue a relationship with the Appellee, preferring to raise Cassidy without intervention from the Appellee.

With regard to the fourth statutory consideration, we find that extensive time has elapsed between Cassidy's regular visitation with the Appellee in the first two and one-half years of her life and the imposition of the visitation order when Cassidy was almost five. The fifth statutory factor involves whether the visitation with the Appellee would be likely to adversely affect the relationship between Cassidy and the Appellants. There does not appear to be any credible evidence that the Appellee's visitation with Cassidy would affect Cassidy's relationship with her parents.

The sixth factor of the statutory list of considerations, dealing with divorce of the parents, is not applicable to this case. Regarding the time available to Cassidy and the Appellants, as referenced in the seventh factor, we find no credible evidence that time is limited or that visitation would be problematic for the Appellants' schedule. The eighth factor, assessing the good faith of the grandparent seeking visitation, mitigates in favor of the Appellee. The record reveals that she and her husband, Robert M., have demonstrated their good faith and commendable intentions during these proceedings. The ninth factor, regarding history of abuse or neglect, is inapplicable. The tenth and eleventh factors, regarding prior time residing with the grandparent, are in the Appellee's favor. The Appellee cared for Cassidy during significant portions of Cassidy's first two and one-half years.

The twelfth factor is the preference of the parents. Based upon the recognition by the United States Supreme Court in Troxel, as referenced above, and by this Court in Brandon that the parental preference should be given "some special weight," this Court must recognize the Appellants' fervent desire to prevent visitation between the Appellee and Cassidy. Troxel, 530 U.S. at 70. The Appellants have indicated that they do not want Cassidy's true parentage revealed to her at these early stages of her life. Additionally, they do not want to risk involvement with Jasper R., Cassidy's biological father, and they fear that visitation with the Appellee, Jasper's mother, would be detrimental to these goals. The lower court was presented with these considerations and found that the Appellants' concerns about the Appellee's involvement in Cassidy's life were "unwarranted and unfounded."

The profound benefits of a child's relationship with grandparents have been deservedly acclaimed. As observed by this Court in Nearhoof,

> It is biological fact that grandparents are bound to their grandchildren by the unbreakable links of heredity. It is common human experience that the concern and interest grandparents take in the welfare of their grandchildren far exceeds anything explicable in purely biological terms. A very special relationship often arises and continues between grandparents and grandchildren. The tensions and conflicts which commonly mar relations between parents and children are often absent between those very same parents and their > grandchildren. Visits with a grandparent are often a precious part of a child's experience and there are benefits which devolve upon the grandchild from the relationship with his grandparents which he cannot derive from any other relationship. Neither the Legislature nor this Court is blind to human truths which grandparents and grandchildren have always known.

178 W.Va. at 364, 359 S.E.2d at 592 (quoting Mimkon v. Ford, 332 A.2d 199, 204-05 (N.J. 1975)).

Despite the recognition of the importance of relationships between children and grandparents and continuity of relationships generally, the constitutional admonitions of Troxel must be observed. In Troxel, the United States Supreme Court held that a Washington state statute providing that any person could petition for visitation at any time, allowing the court to order visitation rights for any person when visitation served the best interests of the child, violated the substantive due process rights of the child's mother. The mother had objected to the court's order permitting paternal grandparents to exercise visitation rights, following the death of the children's father. 530 U.S. at 61. The United States Supreme Court observed that the Washington statute did not accord proper deference to "a parent's decision that visitation would not be in the child's best interest." Id. at 67. "The problem here is not that the Washington Superior Court intervened, but that when it did so, it gave no special weight at all to [the mother's] determination of her daughters' best interests." Id. at 69. Thus, Troxel instructs that a judicial determination regarding whether grandparent visitation rights are appropriate may not be premised solely on the best interests of the child analysis. It must also consider and give significant weight to the parents' preference, thus precluding a court from intervening in a fit parent's decision making on a best interests basis.

Devoting appropriate weight to the Appellants' preferences in this very difficult case and based upon our review of statutory authority and applicable precedent, we find that grandparent visitation should not have been granted in this case. The preferences of the parents were not adequately considered by the family court, and proper weight was not given to those preferences. The concerns of the parents appear to have been considered and dismissed by the family court, primarily upon the basis of the court's disagreement with the parents regarding the degree of family strain to be occasioned by visitation and the court's perception that visitation would not seriously undermine any plans the parents envisioned for Cassidy or her familial associations. This is precisely the type of situation outlined by the United States Supreme Court in Troxel, as it invalidated the Washington statute: "[T]he Washington statute places the best-interest determination solely in the hands of the judge. Should the judge disagree with the parent's estimation of the child's best interests, the judge's view necessarily prevails." 530 U.S. at 67.

While we emphasize that the objection of a parent would not serve to defeat a grandparent's attempt to seek visitation in every instance,[9] the preponderance of the evidence in the present case, when the parents' wishes are properly incorporated in the analysis, does not indicate that visitation is in the best interests of Cassidy. We consequently reverse the order of the lower court and remand this matter for entry of an order denying grandparent visitation rights to the Appellee and her husband.

[9]As recognized in Roberts v. Ward, 493 A.2d 478 (N.H. 1985),

> It would be shortsighted indeed, for this court not to recognize the realities and complexities of modern family life, by holding today that a child has no rights, over the objection of a parent, to maintain a close extra-parental relationship which has formed in the absence of a nuclear family.

SUPREME COURT OF APPEALS

Davis, J., concurring:

I fully concur with the majority's Opinion in this case. Nevertheless, I feel compelled to write separately to reiterate my concern enunciated in my dissent in State ex rel. Brandon L. v. Moats, 209 W. Va. 752, 766, 551 S.E.2d 674, 688 (2001) (Davis, J., dissenting), that, once a child has been adopted, such adoption severs all ties between the child and the child's biological and/or former adoptive relatives[1] so as to foreclose the right to grandparent visitation otherwise permitted by statute. See W. Va. Code § 48-10-902 (2001) (Repl. Vol. 2004) ("If a child who is subject to a grandparent visitation order under this article is later adopted, the order for grandparent visitation is automatically vacated when the order for adoption is entered, unless the adopting parent is a stepparent, grandparent or other relative of the child."). In short, I wish to repeat my earlier admonition that the central aim of adoption is finality, finality in the severance of pre-existing relationships and finality

[1]Except, of course, in the case of stepparent adoption wherein the spouse of the stepparent, who is also the child's biological or adoptive parent, retains his/her relationship with the child as do the parents of that parent. See W. Va. Code § 48-22-703(a) (2001) (Repl. Vol. 2004) (stating that, "[u]pon the entry of such order of adoption, any person previously entitled to parental rights, any parent or parents by any previous legal adoption, and the lineal or collateral kindred of any such person, parent or parents, except any such person or parent who is the husband or wife of the petitioner for adoption, shall be divested of all legal rights . . . " (emphasis added)).

in the creation of new adoptive relationships, which breeds certainty for adopted children and their adoptive parents, alike, in their new adoptive relationship. See Brandon L., 209 W. Va. at 766, 551 S.E.2d at 688 (Davis, J., dissenting) ("'Finality is of the utmost importance in an adoption.'" (quoting State ex rel. Smith v. Abbot, 187 W. Va. 261, 266, 418 S.E.2d 575, 580 (1992))).

Moreover, I applaud the majority's recognition and application of these principles in the case sub judice, and encourage my brethren to continue to proceed with caution where claims for grandparent visitation have been tainted by the subject child's adoption and the grandparents' resultant divestiture of their grandparental status and attendant standing to seek visitation in such capacity.

For the foregoing reasons, I respectfully concur with the Opinion of the Court.

KURT MATHEW HALLER, Defendant Below, Appellant

No. 23472

Submitted: September 18, 1996

Filed: December 19, 1996

1. "In reviewing challenges to findings made by a family law master that were also adopted by a circuit court, a three-pronged standard of review is applied. Under these circumstances, a final equitable distribution order is reviewed under an abuse of discretion standard; the underlying factual findings are reviewed under a clearly erroneous standard; and questions of law and statutory interpretation are subject to a de novo review." Syl. Pt. 1, Burnside v. Burnside, 194 W. Va. 263, 460 S.E.2d 264 (1995).

2. "When serious allegations of child abuse or neglect are made in a custody case, the family law master and circuit judge should direct the Department of Health and Human Resources to intervene and conduct home studies and the court should make full inquiry into these allegations. Furthermore, where serious allegations of abuse and neglect arise, the protections afforded children under abuse and neglect law should apply." Syl. Pt. 2, Boarman v. Boarman, 190 W. Va. 533, 438 S.E.2d 876 (1993).

3. "W. Va. Code 48-2-15 (1993) grants the circuit court in a divorce proceeding plenary power to order and enforce a noncustodial parent's visitation rights with his or her children. W. Va. Code 48-2-15(b)(1)(1993), the subsection specifically dealing with visitation, provides, in pertinent part:

The court may provide for the custody of minor children of the parties, subject to such rights of visitation, both in and out of the residence of the custodial parent or other person or persons having custody, as may be appropriate under the circumstances. In every action where visitation is awarded, the court shall specify a schedule for visitation by the noncustodial parent...."

Syl. Pt. 2, Carter v. Carter, 196 W. Va. 239, 470 S.E.2d 193 (1996).

4. "Because of the extraordinary nature of supervised visitation, such visitation should be ordered when necessary to protect the best interests of the children. In determining the best interests of the children when there are allegations of sexual or child abuse, the circuit court should weigh the risk of harm of supervised visitation or the deprivation of any visitation to the parent who allegedly committed the abuse if the allegations are false against the risk of harm of unsupervised visitation to the child if the allegations are true." Syl. Pt. 3, Carter v. Carter, 196 W. Va. 239, 470 S.E.2d 193 (1996).

5. "If the protection of the children provided by supervised visitation is no longer necessary, either because the allegations that necessitated the supervision are determined to be without 'credible evidence' (Mary D. v. Watt, 190 W. Va. 341, 348, 438 S.E.2d 521, 528 (1992)) or because the noncustodial parent had demonstrated a clear ability to control the propensities which necessitated the supervision, the circuit court should gradually diminish the degree of supervision required with the ultimate goal of providing unsupervised visitation. The best interests of the children should determine the pace of any visitation modification to assure that the children's emotional and physical well being is not harmed." Syl. Pt. 4, Carter v. Carter, 196 W. Va. 239, 470 S.E.2d 193 (1996).

6. "In visitation as well as custody matters, we have traditionally held paramount the best interests of the child." Syl. Pt. 5, Carter v. Carter, 196 W. Va. 239, 470 S.E.2d 193 (1996).

7. "Under the clearly erroneous standard, if the findings of fact and the inferences drawn by a family law master are supported by substantial evidence, such findings and inferences may not be overturned even if a circuit court may be inclined to make different findings or draw contrary inferences." Syl. Pt. 3, Stephen L.H. v. Sherry L.H., 195 W. Va. 384, 465 S.E.2d 841 (1995).

Attorney for the Appellant

Per Curiam:
Appellant Kurt Mathew Haller seeks a reversal of an order entered by the Circuit Court of Summers County on November 16, 1995, which modified a prior custody order by terminating Appellant's visitation rights and continuing custody of the parties' minor children with Appellee Theresa Dodd Hale. Arguing that the circuit court failed to give full faith and credit to a Louisiana decree that modified the West Virginia custody decree and that his visitation rights were wrongly terminated, Appellant seeks a reversal of the circuit court's ruling. Upon consideration of the issues raised in conjunction with the record in this case, we See footnote 1 find that the West Virginia court did have jurisdiction and remand this case for further development regarding whether a guardian ad litem should be appointed; whether an independent investigation of child abuse charges should be ordered; whether family counseling should be ordered; and whether supervised visitation should be ordered.

I.
FACTS AND PROCEDURAL BACKGROUND

The parties were married on October 20, 1984. At the time they entered into a separation agreement on August 11, 1990, both of the parties were enlisted in the Air Force. The terms of the separation agreement provided for Appellee to have custody of the parties' daughters, Elizabeth, born January 6, 1986, and Kala, born August 26, 1988. The agreement further provided that the parties were to "use their utmost effort to insure" that Appellant would have "as much visitation with the children born of the marriage as possible."

In November 1990, Appellee brought criminal charges through the military court martial system, alleging that Appellant had engaged in sexual misconduct with Elizabeth. See footnote 2 Before the court martial proceeding was completed, the parties were divorced by order of the Circuit Court of Summers County, entered on December 3, 1990. At the time the divorce was granted, both of the parties were stationed in Louisiana. See footnote 3 Although the criminal allegations were still pending in Louisiana, the order of divorce made no reference to that issue. Appellee was awarded custody of both children and Appellant was awarded reasonable rights of visitation. The court expressly incorporated the separation agreement into the final divorce decree.

Alleging denial of visitation, Appellant initiated a contempt proceeding against Appellee in March of 1991 in Louisiana. Through this same proceeding, Appellant sought to modify the West Virginia divorce decree with regard to child support obligations, custody, and visitation. During the pendency of the Louisiana court proceedings, the court martial proceeding ended on May 30, 1991, with a finding of not guilty regarding the allegations that Appellant had abused his daughter, Elizabeth. By order entered December 22, 1992, the Louisiana trial court modified the West Virginia divorce decree by changing the custody award to joint custody with Appellee declared as the domiciliary parent. The Louisiana court granted Appellant reasonable visitation rights, but required his visitations to be supervised by his mother, brother, sister-in-law, sister, or brother-in-law. The Louisiana order incorporated a "joint custody plan" that specifically provides that Appellant "is not to be left alone with the children at any time." An additional visitation restriction included in the joint custody plan required that Charles Yoder, the maternal grandfather, was limited to supervised visits with the girls and was prohibited from having overnight visitation. See footnote 4 Appellant states that the visitation limitations included in the Louisiana order resulted from an agreement between the parties, rather than from a court finding of abuse. See footnote 5

The children had an extended visitation with their father from June 15 to July 15, 1993, at his residence in Michigan. See footnote 6 Upon returning home to her mother, Elizabeth allegedly complained again to Appellee that Appellant had hurt her. Appellee responded to her daughter's complaint by filing a sexual abuse report with the Louisiana Child Protective Services, alleging that Appellant had committed sexual abuse against his daughter. See footnote 7 In August of 1993, Appellee moved with the girls to West Virginia See footnote 8 without providing notice to Appellant. See footnote 9

The West Virginia Department of Health and Human Resources ("DHHR") received a referral in August 1993, indicating that the parties' children were being abused by Charles Yoder. See footnote 10 Mary Treece, the DHHR worker who interviewed the children, concluded that Elizabeth had been sexually molested and recommended that Appellant be prohibited from further contact with the children pending completion of sexual offender treatment. See footnote 11

On November 19, 1993, Appellee filed a petition for modification in the Circuit Court of Summers County, alleging that "a repeated incident of sexual conduct occurred with both children" during a visitation with their father in the summer of 1993. Through her petition, Appellee requested that a social service representative be present during any visitation between Appellant and his children pending a determination regarding the allegations of sexual abuse. In response to Appellee's petition, Appellant denied the allegations of misconduct, requested court-ordered psychological evaluations of the parties and the children, See footnote 12 and moved to dismiss the petition claiming that West Virginia did not have jurisdiction.

Appellee obtained an ex parte family violence protective order from the Summers County Magistrate in March of 1994 by citing allegations of sexual abuse that occurred in July 1993. Appellee sought the order to prevent Appellant from having visitation with the girls during the summer of 1994.See footnote 13 Appellant filed a petition for appeal of the family violence protective order in April 1994, alleging that venue was improper. See footnote 14

The Summers County Circuit Court determined that it had jurisdiction of the issue of petition for modification, by order dated April 11, 1994, and referred the case to a family law master. The order reflects that Judge Irons had communicated with Judge Burchett, Jr., of Louisiana, and that the Louisiana judge concurred that West Virginia was the proper forum based on the residence of the children and one parent in West Virginia since June 1993; the presence of substantial evidence in West Virginia regarding the matter; and the residence of all the available witnesses in either West Virginia or Michigan. The West Virginia court concluded that it had jurisdiction over the matter pursuant to West Virginia Code § 48-10-3(a)(2)(1996).See footnote 15

Appellant responded to the Appellee's petition for modification by filing a counter- petition on September 9, 1994, in which he sought a change of custody. On October 14, 1994, the family law master, Edwin Wiley, heard evidence regarding the issues raised in the petition and counterpetition. In his recommended decision, the family law master found that West Virginia had jurisdiction to modify and that the Louisiana modification proceeding was not res judicata as to the issues currently before the Summers County Circuit Court. Regarding the charges of child abuse, the family law master determined that "there has been credible expert testimony from two persons practicing in the field[.]" Despite the fact that the expert testimony was "somewhat rebutted by the testimony of the sister of the . . . [Appellant]," the family law master stated that the expert testimony could not be "arbitrarily rejected" and concluded that child abuse had occurred. The family law master recommended a denial of Appellant's request for custody and denied any visitation to Appellant "[s]ince credible expert evidence exists that one instance of abuse occurred during a period of visitation supervised by members of his [Appellant's] family."

After hearing argument regarding the parties' exceptions to the family law master's report, the circuit court entered its order on November 16, 1995, adopting the findings of the family law master. Indicating that it conferred with the Louisiana court regarding the Louisiana tribunal's decision not to take jurisdiction of this proceeding, the Summers County Circuit Court stated that West Virginia has jurisdiction over this proceeding based on its continuing jurisdiction to modify prior custody decrees. The circuit court expressly recognized that the evidence was controverted regarding the allegations of child abuse, but deferred to the credibility determinations made by the law master. Finding that "there is substantial evidence to support this finding of child abuse;" the circuit court adopted the family law master's recommendation that Appellant be denied any visitation based on the finding of child abuse.

II.
DISCUSSION
A. Standard of Review and Jurisdiction

The standard of review applicable to this case was established in syllabus point one of Burnside v. Burnside, 194 W. Va. 263, 460 S.E.2d 264 (1995):

> In reviewing challenges to findings made by a family law master that were also adopted by a circuit court, a three-pronged standard of review is applied. Under these circumstances, a final equitable > distribution order is reviewed under an abuse of discretion standard; the underlying factual findings are reviewed under a clearly erroneous standard; and questions of law and statutory interpretation are subject to a de novo review.

Appellant attempts to frame this matter as one involving issues of full faith and credit. However, this was not a proceeding initiated in West Virginia to enforce the order entered by the Louisiana court, and principles of full faith and credit are therefore not dispositive regarding the issue of the circuit court's jurisdiction. See footnote 16 See 28 U.S.C. § 1738A (1995) (applying full faith and credit principles to child custody determinations); see also Sheila L. v. Ronald P.M., 195 W. Va. 210, 465 S.E.2d 210 (1995) (discussing applicability of full faith and credit doctrine). In this case, the circuit court, as discussed above, immediately conferred with the Louisiana court to determine whether the West Virginia proceeding should continue since an issue, pertaining exclusively to child support, was then currently pending in Louisiana. The conference between the West Virginia and Louisiana judges apparently resulted in the following conclusions: (a) since Louisiana was not currently entertaining issues specifically pertaining to the custody dispute, a jurisdictional conflict under the Uniform Child Custody Jurisdiction Act did not exist; See footnote 17 and (b) West Virginia was the proper forum for resolution of the modification of custody issues due to the significant contacts of Appellee and the parties' two children with this State.

Thus, the justification for West Virginia's jurisdiction was deemed two-fold. First, the circuit court properly assumed jurisdiction pursuant to the UCCJA based on the availability of evidence and witnesses, and a consideration of the best interests of the children involved. See W. Va. Code § 48-10-3(a)(2). Second, the circuit court's assumption of jurisdiction is properly premised upon principles of continuing jurisdiction over custody issues, based on its initial ruling of custody in this case. See W. Va. Code § 48-2-15(c) (1996). We find no error with regard to the circuit court's determination that West Virginia had jurisdiction over this matter, and note, in any event, that Louisiana essentially declined jurisdiction over the custody matter and deferred to West Virginia. See footnote 18

Neither the family law master's recommended decision nor the circuit court's order adopting the findings of the law master make any reference whatsoever to the modification ruling entered by the Louisiana court. See footnote 19 Because we determine that the Summers County Circuit Court did have jurisdiction to modify, the circuit court's failure to specifically reference the Louisiana decree does not warrant a reversal of the ruling issued below. See footnote 20

Upon remand, the circuit court should clarify its ruling regarding custody. The custody order, as currently written, addresses the custody issue only in terms of the denial of Appellant's request for custody. An affirmative statement that custody remains with or is granted to Appellee is conspicuously absent. While this Court can only surmise that the circuit court was operating under the assumption that Appellee would retain custody based upon the original divorce decree, the lack of a specific statement on this crucial matter creates substantial confusion and irresolution. On remand, the circuit court should acknowledge the existence of the Louisiana decree and expressly state that West Virginia has properly assumed jurisdiction to modify that prior joint custody award.

B. Lack of Guardian Appointment

This Court has stated in syllabus point two of Boarman v. Boarman, 190 W. Va. 533, 438 S.E.2d 876 (1993) that:

> When serious allegations of child abuse or neglect are made in a custody case, the family law master and circuit judge should direct the Department of Health and Human Resources to intervene and conduct home studies and the court should make full inquiry into these allegations. Furthermore, where serious allegations of abuse and neglect arise, the protections afforded children under abuse and neglect law should apply.

One of those protections afforded children in abuse and neglect proceedings is the appointment of a guardian ad litem. See W. Va. Code § 49-6-2(a) (1996); Syl. Pt. 5, In re Jeffrey R.L., 190 W. Va. 24, 435 S.E.2d 162 (1993) (stating trial court rule requiring guardian ad litem participation and adopting Guidelines For Guardians Ad Litem in Abuse and Neglect Cases). We are seriously troubled by the fact that a guardian ad litem was never appointed to represent the interests of the children involved in this case. Since the allegations of sexual abuse were the essence of the custody dispute, this Court's holding in Boarman required the appointment of a guardian ad litem and consideration of the need for a referral to the DHHR. See 190 W. Va. at 537, 438 S.E.2d at 880-81. The record reveals that Appellant, in his response to Appellee's petition for modification, expressly requested that the circuit court involve the DHHR. See footnote 21 Yet, the circuit court refused to act upon both Appellant's request and this Court's mandate in Boarman that such procedure be followed. See id. Upon remand, the circuit court must address the appointment of a guardian ad litem as well as the possible need for an independent investigation of the sexual abuse charges. This seems especially important where, as here, more than one relative has been accused of sexual abuse, necessitating close examination of the need for additional measures specifically designed to protect the children.

C. Visitation Rights

Based upon the family law master's conclusion that there was credible evidence of sexual abuse during supervised visitation and that supervised visitation thus could not eliminate the possibility of future acts of abuse, the circuit court agreed with the law master's recommendation that Appellant should be stripped of his visitation rights. Appellant argues that the termination of his visitation rights was the equivalent of a termination of his parental rights. See footnote 22 While this Court has upheld the complete termination of parental rights in specified instances, a review of the record presented in this case raises several serious concerns with regard to the circuit court's total denial of visitation. See, e.g., Jeffrey R.L., 190 W. Va. at 35, 435 S.E.2d at 173 (approving termination of parental rights upon clear and convincing proof of abuse combined with finding of no reasonable likelihood of correcting conditions of abuse).

With regard to the circuit court's power to formulate the visitation arrangements for a noncustodial parent, we recently explained as follows in syllabus point two of Carter v. Carter, 196 W. Va. 239, 470 S.E.2d 193 (1996):

> W. Va.Code 48-2-15 (1993) grants the circuit court in a divorce proceeding plenary power to order and enforce a noncustodial parent's visitation rights with his or her children. W. Va.Code 48-2-15(b)(1)(1993), the subsection specifically dealing with visitation, provides, in pertinent part:
>
> The court may provide for the custody of minor children of the parties, subject to such rights of visitation, both in and out of the residence of the custodial parent or other person or persons having custody, as may be appropriate under the circumstances. In every action where visitation is awarded, the court shall specify a schedule for visitation by the noncustodial parent....

In syllabus point three of Carter, we continued:

> Because of the extraordinary nature of supervised visitation, such visitation should be ordered when necessary to protect the best interests of the children. In determining the best interests of the children when there are allegations of sexual or child abuse, the circuit court should weigh the risk of harm of supervised visitation or the deprivation of any visitation to the parent who allegedly committed the abuse if the allegations are false against the risk of harm of unsupervised visitation to the child if the allegations are true.
> 196 W. Va. at __, 470 S.E.2d at 195.

Regarding the gradual elimination of supervised visitation and the implementation of standard visitation, we explained the following in syllabus point four of Carter:

> If the protection of the children provided by supervised visitation is no longer necessary, either because the allegations that necessitated the supervision are determined to be without "credible evidence " (Mary D. v. Watt, 190 W. Va. 341, 348, 438 S.E.2d 521, 528 (1992)) or because the noncustodial parent had demonstrated a clear ability to control the propensities which necessitated the supervision, the circuit court should gradually diminish the degree of supervision required with the ultimate goal of providing unsupervised visitation. The best interests of the children should determine the pace of any visitation modification to assure that the children's emotional and physical well being is not harmed.

196 W. Va. at __, 470 S.E.2d at 195. Finally, in syllabus point five, we reiterated our longstanding guiding principle that "[i]n visitation as well as custody matters, we have traditionally held paramount the best interests of the child." Id. at __, 470 S.E.2d at 195.

The denial of visitation in the present case was expressly predicated on the finding of sexual abuse. Appellant contends that the family law master erred in reaching its finding of sexual abuse based, in part, on the law master's admission that the alleged abuse had been "somewhat rebutted by the testimony of the sister of the Defendant [Appellant.]" The law master continued, however, to reason:

> If this court must make a mistake in regard to child visitation such an error should be made on the side of seeking safety and security for the infant children. The testimony of the sister is insufficient to allow the Court to ignore such expert testimony and accordingly the charges of child abuse are found to have merit.
> The mere fact that the family law master referred to Appellant's sister's testimony as "somewhat rebutt[ing]" the allegations of abuse does not invalidate the law master's ultimate conclusion that abuse had occurred. This reference simply indicates that contradictory evidence was offered. As the family law master states in his recommended decision, the sister's testimony, while contradictory, "[wa]s insufficient to allow the Court to ignore such expert testimony." Like all triers of fact, the family law master had to balance conflicting evidence and make his ruling based on a weighing of the evidence, which necessarily involved credibility determinations.

As the circuit court properly stated in its order addressing Appellant's objections to the family law master's findings, the reviewing circuit court must review a family law master's findings subject to the following standard: "Under the clearly erroneous standard, if the findings of fact and the inferences drawn by a family law master are supported by substantial evidence, such findings and inferences may not be overturned even if a circuit court may be inclined to make different findings or draw contrary inferences." Syl. Pt. 3, Stephen L.H. v. Sherry L.H., 195 W. Va. 384, 465 S.E.2d 841 (1995). The circuit court concluded that the law master's finding of sexual abuse was supported by substantial evidence.

The evidence that the family law master found to be credible on the issue of sexual abuse appears to be that of Dr. William Grant, a forensic psychiatrist, who testified as Appellee's expert witness and Mary Treece, a DHHR protective service worker. See footnote 23 Appellant argues that the only relevant sexual abuse testimony is that which pertained to the abuse that allegedly occurred in the summer of 1993. Although the testimony of Ms. Treece clearly pertained to the allegations of abuse made subsequent to the summer 1993 visitation, Dr. Grant testified at the hearing before the family law master that he had not examined Elizabeth since the court martial proceeding was undertaken in 1990. Thus, his testimony was clearly related to a period of time prior to the allegations of abuse that prompted this modification proceeding. Although such evidence, in and of itself, obviously could not have been the basis for a finding of a change of circumstance since it related to a period prior to the Louisiana custody order, it could provide a factual backdrop to the more recent allegations that were alleged to constitute a change of circumstances.

Although we give deference to the family law master's finding that there was credible evidence of sexual abuse, we question whether the circuit court was correct in denying any visitation rights to Appellant. We have previously held that supervised visitation can be ordered following a finding of sexual abuse. Mary D., 190 W. Va. at 342, 438 S.E.2d at 522, Syl. Pt. 2, in part. Although the supervised visitation previously arranged in this matter was ultimately unsuccessful, the lower court should proceed with a reexamination of the nature of the supervised visitation and an evaluation of other types of supervised visitation which may potentially prove more appropriate for this unique situation. Perhaps, for instance, Appellee's suggestion of using a social services agent for the purpose of supervision could be considered.

We also explained in Mary D. that "[t]he family law master or circuit court may condition such supervised visitation upon the offending parent seeking treatment." Id. In this case, the circuit court's determination that supervised visitation was not appropriate was premised upon the occurrence of sexual abuse during a period of supervised visitation. Thus, subsequent to the lower court's reevaluation regarding the appropriateness of supervised visitation and the manner in which it should be exercised, the possibility of conditioning the visitation upon the father's submission to treatment should be explored.

Even if Appellant contends that he should not be required to participate in sexual offender treatment due to his continued assertion of innocence, another alternative that can be considered on remand is family counseling. As we explained in Mary Ann P. v. William R.P., Jr., __ W. Va. __ , 475 S.E.2d 1 (1996),

> When family problems involving children are of sufficient depth and duration that professional counseling is needed to heal the relationships of the child or children with the parent or parents, or to assist the child or children in dealing with such emotional estrangement, a circuit court may direct participation in such counseling and may in its discretion determine how the cost of such counseling shall be paid.
> Id. at __, 475 S.E.2d at 8.

Based on the foregoing, we remand this case to the Circuit Court of Summers County for further development regarding whether a guardian ad litem should be appointed; whether an independent investigation of child abuse charges should be ordered; whether family counseling and/or sexual offender treatment should be ordered; whether supervised visitation should be ordered; and whether any additional measures should be put in place to protect the children from abuse by other potential perpetrators, including their grandfather.

Remanded with directions.

Footnote: 1 The Honorable Arthur M. Recht resigned as Justice of the West Virginia Supreme Court of Appeals effective October 15, 1996. The Honorable Gaston Caperton, Governor of the State of West Virginia, appointed him Judge of the First Judicial Circuit on that same date. Pursuant to an administrative order entered by this Court on October 15, 1996, Judge Recht was assigned to sit as a member of the West Virginia Supreme Court of Appeals commencing October 15, 1996, and continuing until further order of this Court.

Footnote: 2 The incident alleged to have prompted the filing of the charges was Elizabeth's complaint to her mother in November 1990 that her bottom hurt. During this time, Appellee was attending college classes, and Appellant picked up the children at day care and took care of them over night. Appellee took Elizabeth to a pediatrician when her child's complaints about spending time with her father became more frequent. The child allegedly informed the pediatrician that Appellant had kissed her and caused her bottom to hurt.

Footnote: 3 Both parties were discharged from the military on February 29, 1992.

Footnote: 4 Charles Yoder testified at the hearing before the family law master that he had been convicted of sexual abuse "of some children."

Footnote: 5 The Louisiana court order that modified the West Virginia divorce decree does not identify any reasons for awarding the custody modification. The order, which is essentially a one-page document, incorporates an attached nine-page "Joint Custody Plan." Whether the custody plan was a document drafted solely by counsel for the parties, or whether the Louisiana trial court was involved in preparing the subject document, is unclear.

Footnote: 6 The Louisiana court order, through the joint custody plan, expressly provided that Appellant could exercise his visitation rights in Michigan or Florida.

Footnote: 7 Appellee testified before the family law master that in response to this complaint, Louisiana Child Protective Services interviewed both of her daughters, her current husband, and herself. While the record is devoid of any additional information regarding this complaint, Appellee's testimony that she moved to West Virginia with her daughters within three weeks after filing the complaint suggests a probable explanation for the absence of any apparent follow-up to the complaint.

Footnote: 8 While Appellee states in a brief that she moved to West Virginia in February 1992 upon being discharged, the record indicates that her move occurred in the summer of 1993.

Footnote: 9 The Louisiana order expressly required, through the Joint Custody Plan, that both parties were required to give each other a minimum of thirty days advance notice regarding any intended relocations.

Footnote: 10 There is a suggestion made that Appellant may have been the party who made the referral.

Footnote: 11 Appellant has refused to participate in a sexual offender treatment program.

Footnote: 12 The circuit court apparently did not order the psychological reports requested by Appellant.

Footnote: 13 Appellant's counsel represented during oral argument that he had not had visitation with his two daughters since the summer of 1993.

Footnote: 14 The West Virginia family law master notes that the record is devoid of any record regarding the disposition of Appellant's petition seeking to set aside the family violence protective order.

Footnote: 15 This provision of the Uniform Child Custody Jurisdiction Act states that:

(a) A court of this State which is competent to decide child custody matters has jurisdiction to make a child custody determination by initial or modification decree if:

. . . .

(2) It is in the best interest of the child that a court of this State assume jurisdiction because (i) the child and his parents, or the child and at least one contestant, have a significant connection with this State, and (ii) there is available in this State substantial evidence concerning the child's present or future care, protection, training and personal relationships[.]
W. Va. Code § 48-10-3(a)(2).

Some degree of confusion may result from references to two different proceedings in Louisiana. The first Louisiana proceeding altered West Virginia's custody determination and granted joint custody. That custody matter was no longer pending during these proceedings. At the time the circuit judges from West Virginia and Louisiana discussed the issue of which state should assume jurisdiction, a peripheral matter was pending in Lousiana involving the payment of child support.

Footnote: 16 Appellant's failure to plead the existence of the Louisiana decree in either his response to Appellee's petition to modify or in his counter petition suggests that Appellant did not seek to enforce the Louisiana modification decree in this State.

Footnote: 17 As we recently discussed in Rock v. Rock, __ W. Va. __, 475 S.E.2d 540 (1996), the Uniform Child Custody Jurisdiction Act requires a state to stay its exercise of jurisdiction if at the time of filing the petition a proceeding concerning the custody of the child was pending in a court of another state exercising jurisdiction substantially in conformity with this article, unless the proceeding is stayed by the court of the other state because this State is a more appropriate forum or for other reasons.

Id. at __, 475 S.E.2d at 545 (quoting West Virginia Code § 48-10-6). Since the proceeding pending in Louisiana apparently pertained to child support and definitely did not involve a custody determination, the provisions quoted above pertaining to simultaneous proceedings do not apply.

Footnote: 18 The UCCJA encourages discussion and collaboration between the judges in the courts which could potentially assume jurisdiction over the matter, as evidenced by its provisions regarding inconvenient forums and simultaneous proceedings in other states. West Virginia Code § 48-10-7(d) provides that a court, prior to determining whether to retain jurisdiction, "may communicate with a court of another state and exchange information pertinent to the assumption of jurisdiction by either court with a view to assuring that jurisdiction will be exercised by the more appropriate court and that a forum will be available to the parties." West Virginia Code § 48-10-6(c) specifies that if a court discovers, during the pendency of its own proceeding, the antecedent existence of a proceeding concerning custody in another state, "it shall stay the proceeding and communicate with the court in which the other proceeding is pending to the end that the issue may be litigated in the more appropriate forum and that information be exchanged in accordance with sections nineteen, twenty, twenty-one and twenty-two [§§ 48-10-19, 48-10-20, 48-10-21 and 48-10-22] of this article."

Footnote: 19 While Appellant argues that the circuit court, in its order denying Appellant's objections to the family law master's recommended decision, found that Louisiana did not have jurisdiction to modify the West Virginia decree and therefore refused to recognize the Louisiana decree, the record does not support this contention. Rather than denying that Louisiana had jurisdiction to modify a West Virginia decree, the circuit court avoided the issue by stating that "[t]he Court feels that jurisdiction in child custody proceedings is continuing, and the Court always has the inherent power to modify prior custody decrees."

Footnote: 20 The Louisiana decree was issued in accordance with West Virginia Code § 48-10-14 (1996) and is therefore subject to recognition by this State's courts. West Virginia Code § 48-10-14 provides that "[t]he courts of this State shall recognize and enforce an initial or modification decree of a court of another state which had assumed jurisdiction under statutory provisions substantially in accordance with this article or which was made under factual circumstances meeting the jurisdictional standards of this article. . . ." The Louisiana court complied with the jurisdictional requirements of West Virginia Code § 48-10-14 by virtue of the fact that Louisiana had been the home state of the children for more than six months before that proceeding had been initiated. See W. Va. Code § 48-10-3(a)(1) (1996); see also Sheila L., 195 W. Va. at __, 465 S.E.2d at 217-18 (discussing UCCJA provision regarding enforcement of out-of-state decrees).

Footnote: 21 In his prayer, Appellant asked "that the Department of Health and Human Resources be ordered to further investigate all of the circumstances regarding these allegations[.]"

Footnote: 22 The family law master's recommended order did grant to Appellant the non- custodial rights of notification regarding illnesses, medical emergencies, and grade notification as provided for by West Virginia Code § 48-2-13(h)(1)(A)-(F) (1996).

Footnote: 23 The family law master, in his recommended decision, refers to "credible expert testimony from two persons practicing in the field." From this reference, we conclude that he was referring to Dr. William Grant and Mary Treece.

SYLLABUS BY THE COURT

1. Foster parents who are granted standing to intervene in abuse and neglect proceedings by the circuit court are parties to the action who have the right to appeal adverse circuit court decisions.

2. "Implicit in the definition of an abused child under West Virginia Code § 49-1-3 (1995) is the child whose health or welfare is harmed or threatened by a parent or guardian who fails to cooperate in identifying the perpetrator of abuse, rather choosing to remain silent." Syllabus Point 1, W.Va. Dept. of Health & Human Resources v. Doris S., 197 W.Va. 489, 475 S.E.2d 865 (1996).

3. "'Although parents have substantial rights that must be protected, the primary goal in cases involving abuse and neglect, as in all family law matters, must be the health and welfare of the children.' Syl. pt. 3, In re Katie S., 198 W.Va. 79, 479 S.E.2d 589 (1996)." Syllabus Point 3, Matter of Taylor B., 201 W.Va. 60, 491 S.E.2d 607 (1997).

4. "Parental rights may be terminated where there is clear and convincing evidence that the infant child has suffered extensive physical abuse while in the custody of his or her parents, and there is no reasonable likelihood that the conditions of abuse can be substantially corrected because the perpetrator of the abuse has not been identified and the parents, even in the face of knowledge of the abuse, have taken no action to identify the abuser." Maynard, Justice:
Appellants, Keith and Kathleen St. Clair, as foster parents of the infant Harley C., appeal the order of the Circuit Court of Harrison County, West Virginia, which dismissed the petition filed in this matter and returned the infant to his biological parents. The St. Clairs contend the circuit court erred in failing to adjudicate Harley C. as an abused child; in failing to terminate the parental rights of the biological parents; and in failing to revoke the pre-adjudicatory improvement period. Upon a thorough review of this matter, we believe Harley C. is an abused child and the circuit court erred in failing to terminate parental rights. The circuit court's order which restored permanent custody to the biological parents is reversed.

Harley C. was born prematurely by caesarean section on February 8, 1997 and spent the first month of his life in the hospital. Due to concerns about bonding, especially with his mother, and the health and safety of the child, social services were provided to the parents, some of which continued until the date of the injury described below. Home health nursing services and basic parenting services, such as bathing, diaper changing, and feeding schedules, had also been provided to the parents.

Harley C. was injured on July 9, 1997, when he was five months old. Harley was taken to Ruby Memorial Hospital where he was diagnosed with a rotational fracture of the femur. He underwent a full skeletal x-ray, known as a "baby gram," which revealed a healing broken eighth rib and possibly a healing broken ninth rib on the right side. The infant was placed in a body cast. A referral was made to the Department of Health and Human Resources (DHHR) for suspected child abuse.

Harrison County Deputy Sheriff Albert Marano, with the assistance of Jennifer Gray, a child protective service worker for DHHR, took a statement from Mary C., Harley's mother. In her statement, Mary C. denied Harley had been injured in the past. Her only explanation for the broken rib(s) was that the fracture(s) might have occurred during birth. When questioned about the fracture to his leg, Mary C. reported that the infant had been lying on the couch with pillows above his head and below his feet when she left the living room to go to the bathroom. She stated that she heard Harley scream, and when she went to investigate, he was lying on the floor on his right side. See footnote 1 She also stated the couch that Harley fell from was about eighteen inches high, and the fall caused the fracture to his leg. Mary C. said she and her mother took Harley to the doctor in Bridgeport who told them Harley would have to go to the hospital in Morgantown. Kenneth L., Harley's father, was working that day. On the way to Morgantown, Mary C. and her mother stopped to pick up Kenneth L., so he could travel to Morgantown with them.

Kenneth L. also gave a statement to Deputy Marano and Jennifer Gray. He stated he was not home when Harley was injured. However, he supported Mary C.'s version of events. Kenneth L. denied that Harley had been hurt before.

The Ruby Memorial Hospital Emergency Department Record lists the diagnostic impression of Harley as: "(1) Right femur fracture; (2) Suspicion of child abuse; (3) Diaper rash." Dr. Murphy, a radiologist, was consulted by the Pediatrics Department concerning Harley's fracture. Dr. Murphy characterized the fracture as a "rotational injury" and added, "The issue of abuse in such a fracture must be addressed. . . .I would place child in protective custody until issue resolved."

Harley improved and was discharged from the hospital on July 11, 1997. However, based on the information provided to DHHR regarding Harley's injury, on July 15, 1997, DHHR filed a petition in circuit court alleging Harley was an abused child. Harley was immediately removed from his parents' home and placed in foster care with the St. Clairs, the appellants in this case.

The court held a preliminary hearing on July 25, 1997. Jennifer Gray and several doctors who had treated Harley testified at the hearing. Dr. Cathy Jones, Harley's pediatrician, testified that she saw Harley in her office on July 3, 1997. At that time she was concerned about bonding and growth issues. She testified that she called Child Protective Services (CPS) to express her concerns and to inquire as to whether Harley was being followed by the agency. She was assured Harley was being actively followed. Dr. Jones testified that the child was next seen in her office by her partner, Dr. Cogar, on July 9, 1997, the day Harley's leg was fractured. The parents were told their child could not be treated in the office and they opted to take Harley to Ruby Memorial Hospital in Morgantown. Dr. Jones testified that Dr. Cogar was suspicious of abuse and called DHHR to report her concerns. On cross-examination, Dr. Jones testified that the radiologist who reviewed Harley's x-ray called to inform her the x-ray indicated a rotational fracture. Dr. Jones stated that this immobile five-month old had his leg twisted until it broke. She explained that her recommendation was not to send the child home because he would be at greater risk now. He was in a cast from his waist to his toes with a femur fracture, he would not feel well and would cry, and she already had reservations about Harley's growth and the parenting skills of the biological parents.

Dr. Leah Rene Urbanosky, a resident in orthopedic surgery at Ruby Memorial Hospital, also testified at the preliminary hearing. Dr. Urbanosky testified that Harley was admitted to the hospital with a femur fracture of the right leg. The child was placed in a cast in the operating room under anesthesia. Dr. Urbanosky stated that Harley underwent a baby gram or full skeletal x-ray which showed an old healing fracture of the eighth rib and possibly the ninth rib on the right side. She stated that rib fractures during birth are uncommon, "probably one of the least common things because of the chest, the rib cage is so mobile." She also testified that if Harley suffered from an abnormality which caused his bones to break more easily than a normal child, the abnormality probably would have been diagnosed at birth. When asked if children of this age commonly suffer femur fractures, Dr. Urbanosky replied that "at least fifty percent of the time when a child this age presents with femur fracture of any sort, there is child abuse involved[.]"

Dr. Urbanosky was asked on cross-examination if she was aware of whether the hospital had an x-ray of Harley's chest on file which had been taken during his initial stay at Ruby Memorial Hospital. The doctor replied that she did not know because that was not part of her care of the child; there may have been because he was born premature with respiratory difficulties.

At the close of testimony, the circuit court expressed disbelief regarding whether the baby's leg could have been fractured according to the parents' explanation. The court was also concerned about the rib fractures, inadequate parenting skills, bonding, and the growth issue. These concerns were expressed in the court's order, which placed legal and physical custody of Harley with DHHR.

An adjudicatory hearing was scheduled for August 26, 1997. This hearing was continued with the caveat that an adjudicatory hearing would be held in two to four weeks or an agreed order granting a pre-adjudicatory improvement period would be submitted to the court. The parents requested a pre-adjudicatory improvement period. The motion was joined by DHHR and the guardian ad litem. The court entered an order on September 16, 1997, which granted a three-month pre-adjudicatory improvement period to both parents. The court reasoned the parents would likely fully participate in an improvement period because they had previously attended a multidisciplinary team meeting, had voluntarily underwent psychological evaluations, and had completed financial disclosure documents provided by DHHR. The court ordered DHHR to prepare and submit an individualized family case plan and, within sixty days, a progress report. A quarterly review hearing was held on December 19, 1997, wherein the court reviewed the progress reports and the status of the case and ordered the treatment team providers to submit biquarterly written reports to the case manager. These reports were to "include, but not be limited to, services provided and progress achieved during the preceding period."

Prior to the quarterly review hearing, on December 15, 1997, DHHR moved to revoke the improvement period of both parents. A hearing date was set for January 16, 1998. However, the motion was discussed at the status hearing held on January 14, 1998. The motion was therefore not brought before the court and an order was not entered; the parties and the guardian ad litem agreed it was unnecessary to conduct a hearing regarding revocation of the improvement period due to the fact that it had automatically expired. It was decided the case would proceed to adjudication and, if necessary, disposition. The court ordered increased visitation between Harley and his biological parents and scheduled the adjudicatory hearing and the dispositional hearing.

The adjudicatory hearing was held on March 11, 1998. Mary C. and Kenneth L. admitted neglect. Both denied abusing the child and stated they did not know who inflicted the physical abuse. The court found that Harley C. is a neglected child within the meaning of W. Va. Code § 49-1-3(h)(1) and that Mary C. and Kenneth L. are neglecting parents. The dispositional hearing was scheduled for April 7, 1998.

DHHR informed the court at the dispositional hearing that the department's position had changed; instead of recommending reunification of the family, the department was now seeking termination of parental rights. The stated reason for the change in position was that no explanation had been given for the injuries that had been inflicted upon Harley. In other words, no perpetrator had been identified. The psychologist who had been counseling the parents testified during cross-examination that he had been given no indication, during counseling sessions, as to who might have inflicted the injuries. At the close of testimony, DHHR made a motion to terminate the rights of the parents. This motion was made because the individual who caused Harley's injuries had not been identified, despite compliance with the family case plan. The motion was opposed by the parents and the guardian ad litem.

In its dispositional hearing order, the court stated that it "found that there was no evidence as a whole in this case to support a termination of the parental rights of the respondents[.]" The court ordered reunification of the child with his natural parents; ordered that Mary C. and Kenneth L. be referred to a community agency for assistance; and dismissed the petition. Counsel for DHHR then asked the court to stay the ruling pending appeal to this Court. The motion was denied.

The foster parents moved to intervene in the proceedings. The lower court ordered intervention and granted the foster parents the right to submit evidence in accordance with the rule set forth in In re Jonathan G., 198 W.Va. 716, 482 S.E.2d 893 (1996). However, the court denied the foster parents access to the court file. The foster parents then requested that this Court grant an emergency stay and access to the court file.
We stayed execution of the circuit court's order, ordered that Harley be returned immediately to the care and custody of the foster parents, allowed the biological parents to seek an order permitting supervised visitation, and allowed the foster parents "full and complete access to the official record on file in this case[.]" The foster parents now appeal the circuit court's dispositional order.

Preliminarily, we note that Mary C. and Kenneth L. and the guardian ad litem argue the foster parents have no standing to bring this appeal. They argue the foster parents are not parties to the action. Only DHHR or the guardian ad litem has standing to seek an appeal of the circuit court's decision. We disagree. This Court previously recognized the right of foster parents to bring an appeal of a circuit court's decision to return a foster child to the child's biological parents. In re Jonathan G., 198 W.Va. 716, 482 S.E.2d 893 (1996). In Jonathan G., the circuit court granted standing to the Stems, the foster parents of Jonathan G., and allowed them to intervene in the proceedings "in order to present another perspective on the best interests of the minor." Id. at 723, 482 S.E.2d at 900. Because the Stems were recognized as intervenors below, their right to seek an appeal of the lower court's order was not questioned. Their appeal was granted and their concerns were addressed by this Court.

In its April 28, 1998 order, the circuit court in the case sub judice unequivocally ordered that the St. Clairs "have standing to intervene in this matter[.]"

> By the very definition of intervention the intervenor is a party to the action. After intervention, he or she is as much a party to the action as the original parties, and renders himself vulnerable to complete adjudication of the issues in litigation between himself and the adverse party. To make his rights effectual he must necessarily have the same power as the original parties, subject to the authority of the court reasonably to control the proceedings in the case.

59 Am. Jur. 2d Parties § 170 (1987). As intervenors, the St. Clairs are parties to the action. They have all the rights and responsibilities of any other party to the action, including the right to appeal to this Court. We therefore hold that foster parents who are granted standing to intervene in abuse and neglect proceedings by the circuit court are parties to the action who have the right to appeal adverse circuit court decisions.See footnote 2

I.
Standard of Review

In this appeal, we are asked to reverse an order of the circuit court which found that Harley C. was a neglected child, but failed to find that he was an abused child within the meaning of the statute and prior opinions of this Court. We are asked to reverse the circuit court's ruling which reunited Harley with his biological parents instead of terminating their parental rights. The standard of review in such cases is succinctly stated in In Interest of Tiffany Marie S., 196 W.Va. 223, 470 S.E.2d 177 (1996).

Although conclusions of law reached by a circuit court are subject to de novo review, when an action, such as an abuse and neglect case, is tried upon the facts without a jury, the circuit court shall make a determination based upon the evidence and shall make findings of fact and conclusions of law as to whether such child is abused or neglected. These findings shall not be set aside by a reviewing court unless clearly erroneous. A finding is clearly erroneous when, although there is evidence to support the finding, the reviewing court on the entire evidence is left with the definite and firm conviction that a mistake has been committed. However, a reviewing court may not overturn a finding simply because it would have decided the case differently, and it must affirm a finding if the circuit court's account of the evidence is plausible in light of the record viewed in its entirety. Syllabus Point 1, id.

After thoroughly reviewing the briefs and the record submitted in this case, we are "left with the definite and firm conviction that a mistake has been committed."

II.
Adjudication of Abuse and Neglect

The St. Clairs argue on appeal that the circuit court erred in not adjudicating Harley C. as an abused child. In support of this alleged error, the St. Clairs point to the testimony of Dr. Jones, Dr. Urbanosky, and Dr. Murphy as evidence that Harley C. was abused. A review of this evidence and a close look at the statutory definitions of "abused" and "neglected" leads us to conclude that Harley C. has indeed been abused. A neglected child is defined by W.Va. Code § 49-1-3(h)(1)(A) (1998) as a child [w]hose physical or mental health is harmed or threatened by a present refusal, failure or inability of the child's parent, guardian or custodian to supply the child with necessary food, clothing, shelter, supervision, medical care or education, when such refusal, failure or inability is not due primarily to a lack of financial means on the part of the parent, guardian or custodian[.]

In contrast, an abused child is defined as "a child whose health or welfare is harmed or threatened by: (1) A parent, guardian or custodian who knowingly or intentionally inflicts, attempts to inflict or knowingly allows another person to inflict, physical injury or mental or emotional injury, upon the child or another child in the home[.]" W.Va. Code § 49-1-3(a)(1) (1998). This Court has enlarged this definition by stating that "[i]mplicit in the definition of an abused child under West Virginia Code § 49-1-3 (1995) is the child whose health or welfare is harmed or threatened by a parent or guardian who fails to cooperate in identifying the perpetrator of abuse, rather choosing to remain silent." Syllabus Point 1, W. Va. Dept. of Health and Human Resources v. Doris S., 197 W.Va. 489, 475 S.E.2d 865 (1996). Furthermore,

> [t]he term 'knowingly' as used in West Virginia Code § 49-1-3(a)(1) (1995) does not require that a parent actually be present at the time the abuse occurs, but rather that the parent was presented with sufficient facts from which he/she could have and should have recognized that abuse has occurred.

Syllabus Point 7, id. When presented with the medical testimony regarding Harley's injuries, we believe the parents should have known their child was abused and should have put forth a concerted effort to identify the abuser.

The medical evidence includes the testimony of Harley's pediatrician, Dr. Cathy Jones, who testified at the preliminary hearing that she was concerned about bonding and growth issues and had referred Harley to Child Protective Services even before the fracture injuries occurred. In fact, Dr. Jones testified that she was so concerned about Harley's failure to gain weight that she was going to admit him to the hospital to determine if he suffered from a complication such as reflux if he was not "showing better catch up growth at [his] next visit[.]" CPS was already actively following Harley at the time Dr. Jones contacted the agency.

Dr. Cogar, Dr. Jones' partner, examined Harley the day his leg was injured. Dr. Cogar was suspicious of abuse, and she reported her suspicions to DHHR. Dr. Murphy, a radiologist in Clarksburg who reviewed the x-ray of Harley's leg, called Dr. Jones to ask if Harley's case had been reported because he thought "this injury could be indicative of abuse and must be evaluated." Dr. Murphy believed that because of the rotation and nature of the injury, Harley's leg had been twisted until it broke. Due to the type of injury, Dr. Jones testified that she was "very concerned" about the child. When asked how the leg might have gotten twisted to the point that it broke, Dr. Jones answered one of the more common causes is that it is "inflicted;" grabbing the baby's leg and wrenching it would be consistent with a rotational injury. The doctor testified that theoretically, this type of injury rarely might possibly happen when a child falls off a couch. When questioned further regarding the possibility of the child getting his leg stuck between the cushions and falling off the couch, the doctor answered that one would still raise the issue of why the child was left on the couch unattended. Dr. Jones believes that femur fractures in five-month old children are very rare and are always suspicious.

Dr. Urbanosky, a resident in orthopedic surgery at Ruby Memorial Hospital, also testified at the preliminary hearing. Dr. Urbanosky stated that it is very unusual for a child of this age to suffer from a femur fracture, and, at least fifty percent of these injuries involve child abuse. See footnote 3 The doctor explained that these types of fractures generally occur in children who are involved in high energy types of activities, such as jumping, bouncing, or climbing. A child three months old, which would have been Harley's age at the time of the leg injury discounting for his premature birth, generally cannot roll over, scoot, or even sit up unattended. Consequently, the mother's explanation that Harley rolled over by himself and fell off the couch resulting in a rotational-type leg fracture greatly concerned Dr. Urbanosky.

Dr. Urbanosky also testified the baby gram revealed that Harley was suffering from one or more broken ribs. The only explanation the parents offered for the broken ribs was that perhaps the fracture(s) occurred during birth. Dr. Urbanosky testified that rib fractures are uncommon during birth as the chest is very mobile and soft. Furthermore, Harley was delivered by cesarean section, which Dr. Urbanosky testified is much more controlled than a vaginal delivery. Also, Harley's records did not indicate he had been injured at the time he was born.

Jennifer Gray testified that Harley was referred to her because of the fractured femur. She testified that she interviewed the parents in an effort to determine how the leg was broken. Mary C. said she left Harley on the couch, went to the bathroom, heard Harley crying, went back to the living room and Harley was on the floor. Kenneth L. was not home, but stated that Mary C. had related the same story to him. Ms. Gray reported that the seat of the couch is 18 to 20 inches off the floor, and the floor is carpeted.

Ms. Gray testified that from the time Harley was born, various services had been made available to the parents. These services were made available because Harley was premature and the hospital nurses identified bonding problems and limited knowledge of parenting. A home health nurse was assigned to the parents to provide services following Harley's initial release from the hospital. Right From the Start provided basic parenting training. The parents were also referred to the Early Intervention Program through the United Summit Center. Even though several appointments were made through the early intervention program, the parents attended only one session.

When questioned by the guardian ad litem as to whether Ms. Gray's position was that Harley was abused as opposed to neglected, Ms. Gray answered, "Since we are not positive that the fall from the couch is what caused his broken leg, then we feel that it is more an issue of abuse during - relating to that specific injury." Ms. Gray believed the explanation of falling from the couch was not consistent with the type of injury Harley suffered.

At the close of testimony, the judge stated that the broken leg, the growth issue, the bonding issues, and the rib fractures concerned him. He stated that he did not believe any of these problems individually would rise to the level of abuse; however, he also did not believe the rotational fracture was caused by the child falling off the couch. The fractures coupled with bonding and growth issues caused the judge to find that Harley was abused or neglected and to continue him in foster care.

The parties agreed that Mary C. and Kenneth L. should receive a three- month pre-adjudicatory improvement period. Close to the end of the improvement period, DHHR filed a motion to revoke the improvement period for lack of meaningful participation. The Department believed the parents could not identify and meet Harley's needs. The court determined the improvement period lapsed on its own terms and the parties should proceed to adjudication.

At the adjudication hearing, Mary C. and Kenneth L. admitted Harley received extensive injuries while in their custody and that a failure to protect constituted neglect. In its order, the court found the parents "were willing to admit that medical evidence showed that the above-named infant child had suffered physical abuse while in their custody as his parents, even though they denied abusing the child and did not know who inflicted the physical abuse." The court concluded that Harley was a neglected child and the parents were neglecting parents because the "infant child is harmed or threatened by a present failure or inability of the above-named infant child's parents to supply the child with necessary supervision, when such failure or inability is not due primarily to a lack of financial means on the part of the parents." Even though the parents admitted the child was abused while in their custody, the court failed to inquire into who inflicted the abuse and whether the parents made any effort to identify the abuser.

We are clearly convinced somebody severely injured this small child on two separate occasions. Injured him badly enough to break his bones. Even though this immobile child was constantly under adult supervision, no one seems to know who inflicted the abuse. In their briefs to this Court, the parents say they attempted to identify the abuser. However, both parents merely offer blanket conclusions; neither offers an explanation of the efforts he or she undertook to attempt to identify the perpetrator. The record contains no showing of any effort undertaken by either parent in an attempt to determine who inflicted this abuse on their child.

This Court has previously said: "'Although parents have substantial rights that must be protected, the primary goal in cases involving abuse and neglect, as in all family law matters, must be the health and welfare of the children.' Syl. pt. 3, In re Katie S., 198 W.Va. 79, 479 S.E.2d 589 (1996)." Syllabus Point 3, Matter of Taylor B., 201 W.Va. 60, 491 S.E.2d 607 (1997). Once again we reiterate that "[i]mplicit in the definition of an abused child under West Virginia Code § 49-1-3 (1995) is the child whose health or welfare is harmed or threatened by a parent or guardian who fails to cooperate in identifying the perpetrator of abuse, rather choosing to remain silent." Syllabus Point 1, W.Va. Dept. of Health & Human Resources v. Doris S., 197 W.Va. 489, 475 S.E.2d 865 (1996). As failure to attempt to identify the abuser is contained in the definition of "abuse," we believe the circuit court erred in determining Harley was neglected rather than abused. We also believe this child remains at risk if returned to the home of his parents.

III.
Disposition

The dispositional hearing was held on April 7, 1998. Between the time the adjudication and the dispositional hearings were held, the Court Appointed Special Advocate (CASA) appointed to serve on this case wrote a letter to the court expressing serious concerns about Harley's safety. Specifically, she wrote:

> It is also a concern that these injuries have been more or less ignored throughout these proceedings. We are very pleased that the parents have done so well in addressing the neglect issues in their improvement period, but it has been as if the injuries never happened. Has it been forgotten that the reason this child was removed was because of the injures--serious ones??

At the dispositional hearing, the Department moved for termination of parental rights due to the fact that the abuser or perpetrator had not been identified. Counsel for the mother stated that he believed it was "highly unlikely that either of these individuals [Mary C. or Kenneth L.] had any direct involvement with the injures." He went on to state that, "Notwithstanding we have no other viable explanation for how they may have occurred and notwithstanding also that none of the medical evidence that we have seen but not heard in the context of formal testimony under oath that would support really any other theory but that some active type of abuse was perpetrated upon the child." Nonetheless, counsel for Mary C. moved that custody be returned to these parents. Counsel for Kenneth L. and guardian ad litem also sought reunification.

The court determined there was no evidence to support termination even though he acknowledged he was probably the most skeptical person in this room when we saw pictures of the couch at the preliminary hearing and their surmising or suggesting that he fell and twisted and those sorts of things was the cause of the injury. There wasn't anybody that believed that less than I did and there isn't anybody including [the CASA's] worry on this that worries more about this than I do. . . . [B]ut it seems to me that there is no evidence that the court is aware of, looking at the record as a whole and I guess I am not limiting myself to what was produced today, nor has the State proffered any and I didn't ask for a proffer but it seems to me that there is no evidence that would substantiate a termination of these parents' rights[.]

The court ordered that Harley be returned to the physical and legal custody of Mary C. and Kenneth L.

The St. Clairs maintain the lower court erred in not terminating the parental rights of Mary C. and Kenneth L. We agree. This Court has said:

> Parental rights may be terminated where there is clear and convincing evidence that the infant child has suffered extensive physical abuse while in the custody of his or her parents, and there is no reasonable likelihood that the conditions of abuse can be substantially corrected because the perpetrator of the abuse has not been identified and the parents, even in the face of knowledge of the abuse, have taken no action to identify the abuser.

Syllabus Point 3, In re Jeffrey R.L., 190 W.Va. 24, 435 S.E.2d 162 (1993). The parents admit Harley suffered extensive physical abuse while in their custody. There is no evidence either one of them seriously attempted to identify the abuser. The evidence presented as to how the injuries may have occurred conflicts with the medical evidence.

Thus, the court erred in reuniting this child with his parents rather than terminating Mary C.'s and Kenneth L.'s parental rights.

IV.
Conclusion

For the foregoing reasons, we find the Circuit Court of Harrison County erred in not adjudicating Harley C. an abused child and in failing to terminate the parental rights of Mary C. and Kenneth L. The ruling of the circuit court is reversed and remanded to enter an order consistent with this opinion.

Reversed and remanded.

Per Curiam:

This case arises from a guardianship proceeding in the Circuit Court of Fayette County. The petitioner, Sybil J.[1], is the court-appointed guardian of Haylea G., who is eight years old. The respondents are Amber B. and Justin G., Haylea G.'s biological parents. By order entered September 21, 2012, the Circuit Court of Fayette County terminated the infant guardianship between Sybil J. and Haylea G. The circuit court also ordered Sybil J. to return certain funds paid to her by the Social Security Administration on behalf of Haylea G. and imposed a monetary sanction for each day the funds were not returned. After a careful review of the pleadings and record designated for review, the briefs and oral arguments of the parties, and for the reasons stated herein, we affirm the order as it relates to the termination of Sybil J.'s guardianship of Haylea G. We reverse the circuit court insofar as it ordered the return of funds and imposed a monetary sanction against Sybil J.

I.

FACTUAL AND PROCEDURAL BACKGROUND

Haylea G. is the now eight-year-old child of Amber B. and Justin G. Since Haylea G. was two years old and until the entry of the order being appealed she resided in the home of the petitioner, Sybil J., pursuant to an infant guardianship entered by the circuit court on May 1, 2008. The guardianship was established shortly before Amber B., the child's mother, went to prison for fraudulent use of a credit card and related misdemeanors.[2] Sybil J. was a friend of Amber B.'s family. At all times Justin G., the father of Haylea G. agreed that Sybil J. was an appropriate caregiver and guardian for his child. Amber B. objected to the establishment of the guardianship and requested that the child be placed with Justin G.'s mother. Despite this objection, the circuit court found that Sybil J. was a fit and proper person to perform the duties of guardian for Haylea G.

In 2010, in a related but separate proceeding, the Family Court of Fayette County ordered Amber B. to pay child support to Sybil J. for Haylea G. No child support award was entered against Justin G., but in May of 2012, the Social Security Administration ("SSA"), on behalf of Haylea G., awarded to Sybil J. monthly benefits derived from Haylea G.'s father's disability award.[3] In addition, SSA awarded back benefits in the approximate amount of $9,000.00 to Haylea G. Because Haylea G. was a minor, the SSA designated Sybil J. as the child's payee for past and future benefits.[4]

[2] Amber B.'s original sentence was suspended and she was placed on probation pursuant to a plea agreement. While on probation, however, she violated the special conditions of her sentence by possessing controlled substances. As a result, her probation was revoked and a prison sentence was imposed.

[3] Social Security benefits are payable to dependent children of persons eligible for disability insurance. 42 U.S.C.A. § 423 (2004).

[4] The procedure for appointing a representative payee is contained in 42 U.S.C.A. 405(7)(A) (2010).

Sybil J. testified that she used part of this money to repay a personal loan and placed the rest of the funds in a checking account in Sybil J.'s name.

In February of 2011 Amber B. was discharged from parole supervision. At that time Haylea G. was still residing with Sybil J. In November of 2011 Amber B. filed a handwritten letter with the court, seeking a termination of the guardianship of Sybil J. over Haylea G. In her letter, Amber B. stated as follows:

> I Amber B[.] am requesting custody back of my daughter Haylea J[.] G[.] who is in Sybil J[.]'s custody and has been since June 2008. I have been home from incarceration since January of 2010 & have completed my parole with no violations or incidents. In the time that I have been home my two older children Michael A[.] W[.] & Ashlea R[.] G[.] who are still in Tammy G[.]'s custody, but Ashlea now lives with me and Michael is with me every weekend & lived with me over the summer of 2011. I have only got to see Haylea very few times since I have been home, it seems that everytime I try to see her Sybil J[.] has given excuses for me not to see her. All I want is to be back in Haylea's life & to be in her brother & sister's life because Haylea doesn't ever get to see them either and I believe it's only right for us to be a family again. I am very capable of taking care of my children & providing for them with any of their needs. Please take this into consideration and grant me custody of my child, Haylea J[.] G[.]

A hearing was held in March of 2012, at which time Sybil J. objected to the return of the child to Amber B., arguing that Amber B. had not addressed the problems, including her continued use of drugs, which led to the need for the establishment of the guardianship. The circuit court took testimony and found that Amber B. was working, was participating in drug rehabilitation and also other counseling, including the use of Suboxone under medical supervision for the treatment of her drug addiction. The circuit court found that Amber B. had been living with her nine-year-old daughter as well as Amber B.'s mother in Fayetteville since January of 2010. The circuit court further found that Amber B.'s 11-year-old son stayed with his mother, grandmother and sister on weekends. [5] The court found that Amber B. earned money by babysitting for a friend. The court further ordered that the Department perform a study of Amber B.'s home.[6] The hearing was continued. On April 23, 2012, a guardian ad litem was appointed to protect Haylea G.'s interests.

The circuit court reconvened this hearing in June of 2012, at which time Sybil J. argued that Amber B. had not really improved her lifestyle and living conditions. Sybil J. proffered the testimony of three witnesses, including two of Haylea G.'s teachers and a friend of the Sybil J. These witnesses would have testified that the child was doing

[5] At a later hearing the Court heard testimony that Amber B. had regained custody of both of Haylea G.'s siblings.

[6] The order also contains findings regarding the testimony of an employee of the Department, who need not be identified for the purposes of this opinion, who appeared at the hearing in a seemingly official capacity and sat with Sybil J. during the hearing. The court appeared to have been acquainted with this person. When the court questioned this person about her involvement in this case, she revealed that she was a relative of Sybil J. and appearing not in her official capacity as a worker for the Department, but in a supportive role. The court found that it was "extraordinarily inappropriate, unprofessional and misleading" for this relative to speak favorably about the condition of Sybil J.'s home.

well in school and that Sybil J. was better able to care for, and provide for, Haylea G. The court assumed that the child was doing well and remarked that some of the witnesses' testimony about how Haylea G. was doing in the home of Sybil J. would be deemed cumulative.

The guardian ad litem filed a detailed report of his investigation. He found that Sybil J. became involved in Haylea G.'s life when the child was only three months old. Her care for the child increased and included overnight care. The guardian ad litem found that in January of 2007, Haylea G. began living primarily with Sybil J. The guardian ad litem reported that Amber B. had completed her parole, but that prior to being discharged from supervision, she relapsed into drug use. The guardian ad litem reviewed records from Amber B.'s medically supervised drug rehabilitation and reported that she did not appear at present to be using controlled substances. The guardian ad litem interviewed acquaintances of Amber B. who likewise believed that she was no longer using controlled substances. The guardian ad litem found no problems with Amber B.'s residence.

In terms of the relationship between Amber B. and Sybil J., the guardian ad litem reported that Sybil J. had placed conditions on Amber B.'s contact with Haylea G., including requiring that visitations occur at Sybil J.'s residence and involve no other persons, including Haylea G.'s siblings. As a result, contact between Amber B. and Haylea G. was infrequent.

The guardian ad litem reviewed medical records regarding the child's psychological treatment. He also interviewed the child, whom he deemed to be bright, intelligent, well-spoken, polite and mature for her age. He reported that the child enjoyed living with Sybil J. and wanted to remain in her care. He expressed "great concern" in his report to the court when he asked Haylea G. about her mother. He found that Haylea G.'s answers to the questions appeared to have been coached. The child told the guardian ad litem that she knew her mother used drugs and was trying to take her away from Sybil J. The child stated that she did not want to live with her mother because she smoked. Haylea G. admitted that Sybil J. was the source of her information about her mother.

The guardian ad litem recommended that the guardianship continue, as Sybil J. and Haylea G. had an established bond. He opined that it was in the best interests of the child to remain with Sybil J. and recommended that the guardianship be continued, but that a specific visitation scheduled should be created for Amber B. and Haylea G.

A caseworker for the Department performed a study of Amber B.'s home, and found it to be an appropriate placement for Haylea G. The home was found to be clean, in good repair and a suitable place for Haylea G., her siblings and her mother to live. She also testified that there had been no reports of child neglect or abuse involving Amber B. since she received custody of Haylea G.'s siblings. This caseworker testified that she believed in some respects it was apparent that Haylea G. had been prepared to speak to the caseworker. She reported that the child told of two incidents involving abuse at the hands of Amber B., but gave them little credibility.[7] This witness testified that while it was apparent that the child was well cared for by Sybil J., she saw no problems in the home of Amber B. or in her ability to care for Haylea G.

By order dated September 21, 2012, the circuit court found that Amber B. had corrected the problems that created the need for the guardianship in this case. The court found that Amber B. was now a fit and proper person to care for her child, and thus, was an appropriate caregiver. The court found that it was in Haylea G.'s best interests to be raised in a home with her siblings, by her mother, and the court terminated Sybil J.'s guardianship of the child. The circuit court concluded that in matters of appointing guardians for minor children, the parents of those children should be given priority. The circuit court further concluded that the right of a natural parent to custody of his or her child is paramount to any other person's right. While the order acknowledged that Sybil J. may well be perceived to be a psychological parent to Haylea G. as the term is defined by this Court,[8] the circuit court concluded that this did not extinguish the paramount right

[7] The caseworker believed that these events, if true, would have happened well before the child went to live with Sybil G. at a very young age.

[8] We have defined the phrase "psychological parent" as follows:

> A psychological parent is person who, on a continuing day-to-day basis, through interaction, companionship, interplay, of Amber B. to raise her daughter. The order further detailed a schedule of visitation between Amber B. and the child and a plan for reunification of Haylea G. into Amber B.'s home. In addition, the order was stayed by the circuit court until December 21, 2012, so that appellate review could be taken. This stay was modified by order entered November 5, 2012, such that the stay would remain in effect until the present appeal was concluded. The visitation components of the earlier orders remained in full force and effect.

The court also addressed the Social Security disability benefits for Haylea G., including the award of back benefits. The court found that Sybil J.'s "receipt, banking and expenditure of her ward's recent Social Security Administration award of approximately $9,000.00, or more, was shocking, if not criminal." The court criticized Sybil J.'s commingling of these funds with her personal money and Sybil J.'s use of the

The psychological parent may be a biological, adoptive, or foster parent, or any other person. The resulting relationship between the psychological parent and the child must be of substantial, not temporary, duration and must have begun with the consent and encouragement of the child's legal parent or guardian. To the extent that this holding is inconsistent with our prior decision of In the interest of Brandon L. E., 183 W. Va. 113, 394 S.E.2d 515 (1999) that case is expressly modified.

funds to repay a loan used to retain an attorney to defend Amber B.'s request for termination of the guardianship. The court ordered that Sybil J. pay to the guardian ad litem by the court all monies she received, and continued to receive on behalf of Haylea G., including the lump sum back pay award.

From this order Sybil J. pursues this appeal.[9]

STANDARD OF REVIEW

In In Re: Beth Ann B., 204 W.Va. 424, 513 S.E.2d 472 (1998), this Court indicated that in a child abuse and neglect case the Court employs the two-pronged standard of review set forth in Syl. pt. of McCormick v. Allstate Insurance Company, 197 W.Va. 415, 475 S.E.2d 507 (1996):

> When this Court reviews challenges to the findings and conclusions of the circuit court, a two-prong deferential standard of review is applied. We review the final order and the ultimate disposition under an abuse of discretion standard, [9] Subsequent to the entry of the order on appeal, the circuit court held another hearing on January 11, 2013, to address the repayment of the Social Security benefits. At this time Sybil J. was found in contempt for her failure to provide the approximately $9,000.00 in Social Security proceeds to the child's guardian ad litem. She was assessed a $100 per day monetary penalty for each day she failed to turn over the funds. That order is not directly on appeal to this Court but our ultimate conclusion of the present appeal renders the subsequent order moot.

> and we review the circuit court's underlying factual findings under a clearly erroneous standard.

With this standard of review in mind, we turn to the assigned errors.

III.

ANALYSIS

The petitioner assigns three grounds for error in these proceedings. First, the petitioner argues that the circuit court abused its discretion by terminating the guardianship. She argues that during the over five years the guardianship was in existence, she and Haylea G. developed a significant psychological bond. She also argues that it was an abuse of discretion for the circuit court to go against the stated recommendation of the guardian ad litem in maintaining this guardianship, that the best interests of the child mandated a continuation of the guardianship and that the circuit court failed to give her a meaningful opportunity to be heard.

Secondly, the petitioner argues that the court improperly found that she was not entitled to receive Social Security benefits, including a back pay award, for the child. The third assignment of error is that the circuit lacked subject matter jurisdiction to consider the reimbursement of the Social Security award. For the purposes of this opinion the second and third assignments of error are consolidated.

While the court found in 2008 that the guardianship was necessary and furthered the best interests of Haylea G., that order is subject to modification. W. Va. Code § 44-10-3(c) (2006) states,

> The court, the guardian or the minor may revoke or terminate the guardianship appointment when:
>
> (1) The minor reaches the age of eighteen and executes a release stating that the guardian estate was properly administered and that the minor has received the assets of the estate from the guardian;
>
> (2) The guardian or the minor dies;
>
> (3) The guardian petitions the court to resign and the court enters an order approving the resignation; or
> (4) A petition is filed by the guardian, the minor, an interested person or upon the motion of the court stating that the minor is no longer in need of the assistance or protection of a guardian.[10]

(Footnote added). The circuit court treated Amber B.'s handwritten letter as a petition by "another interested person" for termination of the guardianship because there was no longer a need for the guardianship to continue, pursuant to W. Va. Code § 44-10-3(c)(4) (1999).

The petitioner argues that the circuit court wrongfully ignored the bond established since 2008 between Haylea G. and Sybil J. and elevated the rights of Amber [10] The language of this statute is substantially similar to Rule 15 of the Rules of Practice and Procedure for Minor Guardianship Proceedings.

G. over those of the child. We disagree. In all instances the right of a fit parent to raise his or her children is a superior right to any other person's claim.

> In the law concerning custody of minor children, no rule is more firmly established than that the right of a natural parent to the custody of his or her infant child is paramount to that of any other person; it is a fundamental personal liberty protected and guaranteed by the Due Process Clauses of the West Virginia and United States Constitutions.

Syl. pt. 1, In re Willis, 157 W. Va. 225, 207 S.E.2d 129 (1973). Furthermore,

> A parent has the natural right to the custody of his or her infant child and, unless the parent is an unfit person because of misconduct, neglect, immorality, abandonment or other dereliction of duty, or has waived such right, or by agreement or otherwise has transferred, relinquished or surrendered such custody, the right of the parent to the custody of his or her infant child will be recognized and enforced by the courts.

Syl., Whiteman v. Robinson, 145 W.Va. 685, 116 S.E.2d 691 (1960). Therefore, the court had the authority to modify the guardianship upon sufficient proof.

The record clearly reflects that under Sybil J.'s guardianship, Haylea G. flourished. The issue before the circuit court was whether Amber B. had made the necessary changes so that the guardianship of Sybil J. was no longer necessary. The guardian ad litem and Sybil J. both argue that it is in the child's best interest to remain in the guardianship of Sybil J., because of how well the child is doing and because of the bond established between the two. The circuit court recognized and found, however, that the ability for another person to provide for a child does not thereby render a parent unfit to raise her child. We have held,

> While courts always look to the best interests of the child in controversies concerning his or her custody, custody should not be denied to a parent merely because some other person might possibly furnish the child a better home or better care.

Syl. pt. 3, Hammack v. Wise, 158 W. Va. 343, 211 S.E.2d 118 (1975).

We find no clear error in the circuit court's findings of fact in this case. The circuit court clearly recognized the superior right of Amber B., as the child's mother, to custody of her child. We find that the circuit court appropriately applied the applicable law to the facts of this case, without an abuse of its discretion, as it relates to the termination of the guardianship. We therefore affirm the order of the circuit on the issue of the guardianship.

We next turn to the portion of the order that dealt with the Social Security monies. The order mandated the return of $9,000.00 Sybil J. received from Social Security on behalf of Haylea G. The circuit court ordered that the entire amount be transferred to the child's guardian ad litem, pending further action by the court.

Sybil J. asserts that the circuit court is devoid of subject matter jurisdiction to address child support in this matter, citing Allen v. Allen, 226 W. Va. 384, 701 S.E.2d 106 (2009), for the premise that the family court has "original and continuing jurisdictions over matters of child support in domestic relations actions." Allen, 226 W. Va. 384 at ___, 701 S.E.2d 106 at ___.

However, this is not an instance where the circuit court was asked to establish, modify or enforce child support, all matters clearly within the specifically delegated jurisdiction of the family court and the concurrent jurisdiction of the circuit courts. Instead, the question deals with the use of funds awarded to Sybil J. on behalf of Haylea G. by a federal agency. The award was based upon existing federal statutes as well as federal administrative rules and regulations. Likewise, the use of the funds by Sybil J., as the representative payee for Haylea G., is based upon federal statutes and administrative rules and regulations.

The duties and responsibilities of the representative payee are contained in 20 C.F.R. § 404.2035 (2006). This section states,

> A representative payee has a responsibility to--
>
> (a) Use the benefits received on your behalf only for your use and benefit in a manner and for the purposes he or she determines, under the guidelines in this subpart, to be in your best interests;
> (b) Keep any benefits received on your behalf separate from his or her own funds and show your ownership of these benefits unless he or she is your spouse or natural or adoptive parent or stepparent and lives in the same household with you > or is a State or local government agency for whom we have granted an exception to this requirement;

> (c) Treat any interest earned on the benefits as your property;
>
> (d) Notify us of any event or change in your circumstances that will affect the amount of benefits you receive, your right to receive benefits, or how you receive them;
>
> (e) Submit to us, upon our request, a written report accounting for the benefits received on your behalf, and make all supporting records available for review if requested by us; and
> (f) Notify us of any change in his or her circumstances that would affect performance of his/her payee responsibilities.

Failure of the representative payee to properly handle the benefits received may lead to monetary sanction, criminal prosecution or both, according to 42 U.S.C. § 408(a)(5) (2006): "Whoever— . . . having made application to receive payment under this subchapter for the use and benefit of another and having received such a payment, knowingly and willfully converts such a payment, or any part thereof, to a use other than for the use and benefit of such other person; . . . shall be guilty of a felony and upon conviction thereof shall be fined under Title 18 or imprisoned for not more than five years, or both."

We share the circuit court's concerns with the guardian's stated use of and accounting for Haylea G.'s benefits. These actions, as noted by the circuit court, may have criminal or civil implications; however, we believe the circuit court acted outside of its jurisdiction when it determined that Sybil J. had wrongfully appropriated monies awarded to her by the SSA on behalf of Haylea G., and thus required the funds to be turned over to the guardian ad litem for further distribution by the circuit court. It is clear from the U.S.C. and the C.F.R. that the SSA is in the proper position to address this situation, either administratively or by referral to the appropriate authorities for prosecution under United States Code. The circuit court lacks jurisdiction to order that the funds be returned, or to mandate where they are to be distributed. As such, we reverse the portion of the circuit court's order that required Sybil J. to turn over the Social Security proceeds to the guardian ad litem. Although the subsequent order of the circuit court assessing a monetary penalty for each day that Sybil J. failed to give the funds to the guardian ad litem is not directly before us, we find that the order is moot in light of our reversal of the underlying requirement to return the funds.

IV.

CONCLUSION

For the foregoing reasons, the order of the Circuit Court of Fayette County entered September 21, 2012, is affirmed, insofar as the order terminated Sybil J.'s guardianship of Haylea G. The portions of the order requiring Sybil J. to turn over the proceeds of the Social Security award made to her on behalf of Haylea G. are reversed. We remand this case with directions to the Circuit Court to ensure that a reasonable reunification and transition for Haylea G. is made from the home of Sybil J. to her mother's residence.

Affirmed, in part, and reversed, in part, and remanded with directions.

Justice Ketchum, concurring, in part, and dissenting, in part:

I agree with the majority decision to terminate the guardianship of Sybil J. and return the child to her mother.

I disagree with the majority's conclusion that the circuit court did not have jurisdiction over the child's Social Security benefits that may have been improperly used by Sybil J.

Sybil J. was the child's payee for her monthly Social Security check. The circuit judge became concerned that the funds were being improperly handled and/or spent. Therefore, the court ordered that the funds be transferred to the guardian ad litem until a further hearing by the court.

I understand these were federal funds issued by the Social Security Administration for the benefit of the child in Fayette County, West Virginia. If it is found that another person used the funds for matters not relating to the child then the circuit court has the absolute right (jurisdiction) to put the remaining funds in trust and conduct hearings to determine if there was wrongdoing.

Just because bank robbers steal federal currency (paper money) does not preempt our state court's jurisdiction to prosecute the criminals committing such crimes.

SYLLABUS

1. "A writ of mandamus will not issue unless three elements coexist--(1) a clear legal right in the petitioner to the relief sought; (2) a legal duty on the part of respondent to do the thing which the petitioner seeks to compel; and (3) the absence of another adequate remedy." Syl. Pt. 2, State ex rel. Kucera v. City of Wheeling, 153 W.Va. 538, 170 S.E.2d 367 (1969).

2. In recognition of the lack of an express funding obligation provided for expert fees in juvenile delinquency cases and pursuant to our inherent authority to manage the courts of this state, this Court will assume financial responsibility in matters arising under this state's juvenile delinquency laws for the fees properly charged by expert witnesses appointed by the trial courts and subsequently approved for payment.

Albright, Justice:

The West Virginia Department of Health and Human Resources ("DHHR" or the "Department") appeals from the order of the Circuit Court of Ohio County entered on August 16, 2001, directing DHHR to pay Appellee William Hewitt, Ph.D., previously-awarded fees plus interest in connection with Dr. Hewitt's appointment by the trial court to perform psychological services in various juvenile delinquency and child abuse and/or neglect cases. DHHR challenges the underlying individual orders awarding fees to Dr. Hewitt on the grounds that the fees exceeded the rate established by Medicaid for the payment of such services. With regard to those payment orders pertaining to juvenile delinquency matters, DHHR asserts that there is no obligation, statutory or otherwise, requiring it to be responsible for the services performed by Dr. Hewitt. Upon our review of this matter, we determine that all orders approving and awarding payment for services performed by Dr. Hewitt in abuse and/or neglect cases that were entered prior to June 7, 2002, the effective date of West Virginia Code § 49-7-33 (2002),[1] shall be paid by DHHR at the rate approved by the trial court. Any payment orders pertaining to abuse and/or neglect matters entered following the effective date of West Virginia Code § 49-7-33, shall be paid by DHHR at the rate established by Medicaid and adopted by DHHR for such services. With regard to fees ordered in connection with juvenile [1]This statutory provision expressly grants authority to DHHR to set the rate for psychological evaluations and other types of services provided by a health care professional pursuant to the Medicaid-established rate, provided that such a rate exists. See W.Va. Code § 49-7-33 (see text infra at pp. 7-8) .

delinquency cases, we determine that the lower court was without authority to require DHHR to be responsible for those costs.

I. Factual and Procedural Background

On April 10, 2001, Dr. Hewitt filed a petition in the circuit court seeking a rule to show cause as to why DHHR should not be held in contempt for non-payment of previously approved fee orders, which covered services performed by Dr. Hewitt beginning in the Fall of 1996 through March 2001. As support for his contempt petition, Dr. Hewitt cited Rule 27 of the West Virginia Trial Court Rules, arguing that the Court expressly adopted this rule to provide for public funding of expert assistance in child abuse and neglect cases. Observing that Trial Court Rule 27 does not reference payment of fees pursuant to a Medicaid-established rate, Dr. Hewitt further noted that DHHR never filed any objections to the payment orders he submitted for services rendered.

DHHR, in response to the circuit court's issuance of a rule to show cause,[2] moved to vacate the underlying payment orders on the grounds that, with respect to the payment orders arising from abuse and neglect proceedings, Dr. Hewitt failed to comply with the requirements of Trial Court Rule 27 concerning advance approval and determination of expert fees. As to juvenile delinquency cases, DHHR contends that it has no obligation to pay expert witness fees in such cases, citing the limited responsibility imposed upon the Department by Trial Court Rule 35.05.[3]

The circuit court conducted two evidentiary hearings[4] with regard to payment of Dr. Hewitt's outstanding expert witness fees. During a third hearing that took place on August 2, 2001, the circuit court announced that it was converting the contempt petition into a request for mandamus relief and that it was ruling in favor of Dr. Hewitt. An order granting the relief requested by Dr. Hewitt was entered on August 16, 2001, awarding the principal sum of $71,211.40, as well as interest payments totaling $6,584.36 for a cumulative award of $77,795.76. The trial court denied Dr. Hewitt's request for attorney's fees in connection with the contempt petition.

[3]Trial Court Rule 35.05 provides for the compensation of experts in general and provides for only two areas in which DHHR is responsible for the payment of expert witnesses: evaluations performed pursuant to West Virginia Code § 27-6A-1(a)-(e) (1983) (Repl. Vol. 2001) (governing determination of competency of defendant to stand trial and criminal responsibility) and those conducted under authority of West Virginia Code § 62-12-2(e) (1999) (Repl. Vol. 2000) (addressing eligibility of certain defendants for probation). In the other instances delineated by the rule, either the county prosecuting attorney's office; the Supreme Court's administrative office; or the Public Defender's office is responsible for the expert witness fees.

[4]The hearings were held on May 2 and 4, 2001.

Through this appeal,[5] DHHR seeks relief from the August 16, 2001, order that directed it to pay the referenced fees to Dr. Hewitt pursuant to a writ of mandamus.

II. Standard of Review

Because we are reviewing the lower court's issuance of a writ of mandamus, our review is governed by the axiomatic standard that we apply to the issuance of such writs:

"A writ of mandamus will not issue unless three elements coexist--(1) a clear legal right in the petitioner to the relief sought; (2) a legal duty on the part of respondent to do the thing which the petitioner seeks to compel; and (3) the absence of another adequate remedy." Syl. Pt. 2, State ex rel. Kucera v. City of Wheeling, 153 W.Va. 538, 170 S.E.2d 367 (1969). We proceed to determine whether the lower court erred in issuing a writ of mandamus under the facts of this particular case.

III. Discussion

We note at the outset of our discussion that budgetary concerns underlie the DHHR's actions concerning non-payment of fees in this matter. DHHR submitted an affidavit to this Court in support of its appeal, wherein the Department indicated that a ninety million dollar deficit is projected for fiscal year 2003. Against this background of looming financial shortages, DHHR informed the Court that during fiscal year 2001 it paid approximately 1.6 million dollars for court-ordered payments, "of which approximately 75% was for treatment, counseling and evaluations." While the Court is not unappreciative of the budgetary constraints facing DHHR, we cannot resolve the issues presented here based on the operating costs of a state agency. Our decision must be grounded in the law, rather than a response to a specific agency's financial woes.

[5]This Court refused DHHR's first petition for appeal on February 7, 2002. We granted a second petition for appeal on June 4, 2002, allowing DHHR to file the same out of time.

A. Authority To Establish Fees

DHHR argues that the circuit court was without authority to direct it to pay Dr. Hewitt at a rate higher than it pays other providers of similar services. Since July 1998, DHHR has had in place a policy of paying its medical services providers fees that are consistent with Medicaid-established rates.[6] The Medicaid-approved rate for psychological evaluation services is $182.20. In the subject payment orders at issue, the fee submitted by Dr. Hewitt, and approved by the circuit court, was either $550 or $750, depending on when the services were performed.[7] Although Dr. Hewitt withdrew from being a Medicaid provider in 1997, DHHR contends that it mistakenly believed that he was still a Medicaid provider and thus only [6]The Department acknowledges, however, that "there has [not] been 100% compliance with this payment policy," attributing such non-compliance to instances of court-ordered payments.

[7]Whereas the current rate charged by Dr. Hewitt for performing court-appointed psychological evaluations is $750, it was previously $550.

entitled to the set fee of $182.20.[8] DHHR states additionally that its reason for not paying the court-ordered fees prior to the filing of the contempt petition "is simply because he [Dr. Hewitt] has billed a higher rate rather than [sic] the Department believes is reasonable under the circumstances compared to what other similarly situated psychologists are paid."

When the initial psychological services were performed by Dr. Hewitt that are the subject of this appeal, the sole authority for awarding expert witness fees in abuse and neglect cases was found in West Virginia Code § 49-6-4 (1984) (Repl. Vol. 2001). That statutory provision provides, in pertinent part:

> At any time during proceedings under this article the court may, upon its own motion or upon motion of the child or other parties, order the child or other parties to be examined by a physician, psychologist or psychiatrist, and may require testimony from such expert, subject to cross-examination and the rules of evidence. . . . The court by order shall provide for the payment of all such expert witnesses. If the child, parent or custodian is indigent, such witnesses shall be compensated out of the treasury of the State. . . .

Id. (emphasis supplied). Under a separate statutory provision, which the State concedes is in need of amending due to the antiquated fixed fee, the State is limited to paying only ten dollars for mental and physical examinations performed on juveniles. See W.Va. Code § 49-5-4 (1998) (Repl. Vol. 2001).

[8]Dr. Hewitt notes, however, that the record contains a letter from DHHR dated May 29, 1997, indicating that Dr. Hewitt was not on the State Medicaid rolls as a provider.

With the adoption by this Court of certain trial court rules effective July 1, 1999, a rule was added that specifically addresses the issue of public funding for experts in child abuse and neglect cases. Trial Court Rule 27.02 provides that:

> The court shall by order establish in advance the reasonable fees and expenses to be paid to an expert. Payment shall be as follows: Upon completion of services by an expert, the court shall, by order, direct the State Department of Health and Human Resources to pay for the expert's evaluation, report writing, consultation, or other preparation; and the court shall, by order, direct payment by the Supreme Court's Administrative Office for the expert's fee and expenses entailed in appearing to testify as a witness.

Under this rule, there is a split of payment responsibility for evaluative services and testimonial services, with the Court being responsible for the latter and DHHR, the former.

Through the efforts of DHHR, a recent statutory enactment -- West Virginia Code § 49-7-33 -- gives DHHR authority to establish the fee schedule for paying health care professionals who provide services in connection with proceedings brought pursuant to article 49, chapters five and six of the West Virginia Code. That provision, which went into effect on June 7, 2002, states as follows:

> At any time during any proceedings brought pursuant to articles five [§§ 49-5-2 et seq.] and six [§§ 49-6-1 et seq.] of this chapter, the court may upon its own motion, or upon a motion of any party, order the West Virginia department of health and human resources to pay for professional services rendered by a psychologist, psychiatrist, physician, therapist or other health care professional to a child or other party to the proceedings. Professional services include, but are not limited to, treatment, therapy, counseling, evaluation, report preparation, consultation > and preparation of expert testimony. The West Virginia department of health and human resources shall set the fee schedule for such services in accordance with the Medicaid rate, if any, or the customary rate and adjust the schedule as appropriate. Every such psychologist, psychiatrist, physician, therapist or other health care professional shall be paid by the West Virginia department of health and human resources upon completion of services and submission of a final report or other information and documentation as required by the policies and procedures implemented by the West Virginia department of health and human resources.

W.Va. Code § 49-7-33.

Based on the enactment of West Virginia Code § 49-7-33, DHHR argues that the circuit court's entry of the August 16, 2001, order constitutes a separation of powers issue in that the order disregards the agency's authority to establish the rate for expert fee payments consistent with the Medicaid rate for such services. This argument does not withstand scrutiny because West Virginia Code § 49-7-33 did not go into effect until almost ten months after the entry of the lower court's order. Consequently, all of the individual payment orders that are the collective subject of the August 16, 2001, order were entered well in advance of the effective date of the legislation at issue. Because the underlying matter began as a contempt proceeding, we cannot disregard the fact that the multiple payment orders that underlie the August 16, 2001, order are the orders for which enforcement was initially sought and thus, are the actual orders at issue in the case sub judice.

A significant and lingering issue, which cannot be resolved today, arises from the conflicting statutory provisions now in effect that address the award of expert fees in abuse and neglect cases. Notwithstanding the enactment of West Virginia Code § 49-7-33 and its grant of authority to DHHR to set rates for expert witnesses, previously established authority still exists for circuit courts to "provide for the payment of all such expert witnesses" in abuse and neglect proceedings. W.Va. Code § 49-6-4. As a result of this continuing authority in the circuit courts, we do not accept the position of DHHR that it has exclusive authority for the payment of expert fees in abuse and neglect cases under the provisions of West Virginia Code § 49-7-33.[9] Clearly, that provision, when properly invoked,[10] enables the Department to use Medicaid-established rates for the provision of health care services as required under chapter 49, articles five and six, where such rates are available.[11] Critically, however, a circuit court

[9]DHHR argues that "it has the right as an Executive Branch Agency to determine what its payment obligations are." While we appreciate the Department's contention that it is entitled to control over its monetary obligations, this statement does not realistically reflect the situation presented by the necessary interworkings of the judicial branch and the executive branch in instances of cases involving children who require the services of this state. If DHHR is suggesting that the judicial branch has no right in any instance to set expert fees or to approve such fees, we cannot agree with this proposition.

[10]The provisions of West Virginia Code § 49-7-33 do not limit the fees charged by expert witnesses where such witnesses are retained privately. Those statutory provisions only operate as a restriction on the amount that can be charged when DHHR is ordered by the trial court to pay for health care services in connection with matters arising under articles five and six of chapter 49.

[11]While one reading of the statute suggests that DHHR may use a "customary rate" where a Medicaid rate is not available, the statute arguably gives the agency the discretion to choose between the Medicaid rate and the "customary rate," due to its use of a disjunctive connective. See W.Va. Code § 49-7-33.

still retains the ultimate authority for entry of all orders directing payment of expert witness fees in abuse and neglect matters. See W.Va. Code § 49-6-4.

B. Authority to Require Payment of Expert Fees

Returning to the issue of the enforceability of the orders that are the subject of the August 16, 2001, order, we find that because the payment orders were all for services that preceded the June 7, 2002, effective date of West Virginia Code §49-7-33 and because the actual payment orders relative to those services were entered before that date, there is no statutory impediment to payment of those orders at the rates provided for in the respective orders. However, all payment orders submitted for services within the scope of West Virginia Code § 49-7-33 that were performed after the statute's effective date, or that were approved for payment after June 7, 2002, are subject to the payment provisions provided therein.

Besides challenging the payment orders on the grounds that such payments exceed the amounts authorized by West Virginia Code § 49-7-33, DHHR raises additional objections to those orders stemming from the preapproval procedure established in Trial Court Rule 27.02. While the parties did not provide us with specifics, some of the underlying payment orders at issue were not preapproved by the trial court regarding the amount of the expert witness fee to be awarded for the evaluative services to be performed by Dr. Hewitt.[12]

However, by failing to appeal any of the underlying orders that collectively comprise the subject of the August 16, 2001, order, DHHR has waived its right to challenge the enforceability of those orders. See Syl. Pt. 3, State v. Asbury, 187 W. Va. 87, 415 S.E.2d 891 (1992) (holding that "[f]ailure to make timely and proper objection . . . constitutes a waiver of the right to raise the question thereafter either in the trial court or in the appellate court"); see also Hustead on Behalf of Adkins v. Ashland Oil, Inc., 197 W.Va. 55, 62, 475 S.E.2d 55, 62 (1996) (observing that "Appellant's failure to appeal the final judgment order entered by the circuit court brought finality to that judgment, thereby ending any controversy or adverseness between the parties"); Ward v. Ward's Heirs, 50 W.Va. 517, 519, 40 S.E. 472, 473 (1901) ("'Where a party by his acts or express agreement releases appealable error, he waives all right of appeal'") (quoting 2 Ency. Pl. & Prac. 174, note; 7 Ency. Pl. & Prac. 870). Given the clear failure of the State to challenge the underlying payment orders through means of an appeal, we cannot entertain any non-jurisdictional based challenges to those orders at this time. See Whitlow v. Board of Educ., 190 W. Va. 223, 226, 438 S.E.2d 15, 18 (1993) (recognizing general rule that failure to raise nonjurisdictional issues below precludes appellate consideration of such issues).

"significant," Dr. Hewitt disputes that there are numerous such orders and further indicates that "nearly all" of the orders entered after July 1, 1999, (effective date of Trial Court Rule 27) "were 'pre-approved' by separate order as was the procedure that was used from the Fall of 2000 to date." Because the State failed to assert any objection at the time the orders were submitted for approval based on failure to adhere to trial court rule procedures and because the State also failed to appeal from the entry of any such payment orders on those or other grounds, we find that such objections have been waived.

While we find no impediment to enforcement of the underlying payment orders that are the subject of the August 16, 2001, order which arose in connection with abuse and/or neglect proceedings, we do not find the same to be true with regard to those orders stemming from juvenile delinquency matters. See W.Va. Code § 49-6-4. Unlike the authority reposed in the circuit courts by West Virginia Code § 49-6-4 to award expert fees in abuse and neglect proceedings, there is no similar grant of authority to circuit courts for setting expert fees in juvenile delinquency cases. Cf. W.Va. Code § 49-5-4 (limiting examining fee in juvenile matters to $10). Accordingly, we cannot uphold the lower court's imposition of payment responsibility on the Department with regard to those expert witness fees submitted by Dr. Hewitt in cases that arose under this state's juvenile delinquency laws.

In recognition of the lack of an express funding obligation provided for expert fees in juvenile delinquency cases and pursuant to our inherent authority to manage the courts of this state, this Court will assume financial responsibility in matters arising under this state's juvenile delinquency laws for the fees properly charged by expert witnesses appointed by the trial courts and subsequently approved for payment. Accordingly, the lower court on remand shall identify which of those cases included in the August 16, 2001, order were juvenile delinquency cases[13] and deduct from its award such amounts that are attributable to Dr.

[13]According to exhibit number three that DHHR attached to its second petition for appeal, there appear to be twelve juvenile delinquency matters included in the August 16, 2001, order.

Hewitt's approved fees relative to those cases. The payment orders pertaining to those juvenile delinquency cases should then be submitted to this Court's administrative office for purposes of payment.

While our decision to assume responsibility for the expert witness fees in juvenile delinquency matters arises in part due to this Court's recognition that Trial Court Rule 27 is limited in its application to abuse and neglect matters, we wish to address the requirement imposed under Trial Court Rule 27 for advance approval of expert fees. Because the issue of establishing the fees to be charged in advance serves several laudatory purposes, we encourage the trial courts to extend the preapproval requirement imposed by Trial Court Rule 27 to juvenile delinquency matters also. In this fashion, all of the parties will be fully apprised at an early stage of the litigation concerning the fee amount and there should be a consequent reduction in challenges to expert fee awards. Furthermore, we urge the trial courts to be diligent in applying the preapproval requirement of Trial Court Rule 27.02 to both child abuse and neglect matters and to juvenile delinquency matters.[14]

[14]We wish to emphasize that, by refusing to set aside those payment orders where preapproval was not obtained, we do not imply any reduced significance to this requirement of securing advance approval of expert fees. Our refusal to permit this requirement to serve as a means of preventing the enforcement of the underlying payment orders was due to the constraints of the appellate process, rather than being based upon a view that this requirement of approving expert fees in advance is a matter of minor significance, or undeserving of enforcement. See supra note 12.

C. Relief to be Awarded

Because we conclude that the circuit court was acting within its authority in approving the payment orders concerning abuse and/or neglect matters that precede the effective date of West Virginia Code § 49-7-33 and because we find that DHHR has a duty to make those payments, we affirm the lower court's issuance of the writ of mandamus as to all those underlying payment orders arising in abuse and/or neglect matters for services provided by Dr. Hewitt that preceded June 7, 2002, provided such orders were entered on or before June 7, 2002. As to any payment orders arising in connection with abuse and/or neglect matters that pertain to services performed by Dr. Hewitt following June 7, 2002, or where such orders were not entered before June 7, 2002, the provisions of West Virginia Code § 49-7-33 are controlling. Based on our conclusion that no authority exists for requiring DHHR to be responsible for the expert fees associated with juvenile delinquency cases, we reverse the lower court's issuance of the writ of mandamus as to all those underlying payment orders arising in connection with juvenile delinquency matters. Those payment orders, as discussed above, shall be forwarded to this Court for payment.

Based on the foregoing, the decision of the Circuit Court of Ohio County entered on August 16, 2001, is affirmed, in part; reversed, in part; and remanded for further proceedings consistent with this opinion.

Affirmed, in part;
Reversed, in part;
and Remanded.

SUPREME COURT OF APPEALS
OF WEST VIRGINIA

Starcher, Justice, concurring, in part, and dissenting, in part:

The basic issue in this case, as posed by the DHHR, is whether as a matter of law Dr. Hewitt should be compensated more than other psychologists throughout West Virginia for the court-ordered services that he renders. An ancillary issue is whether the Department of Health and Human Services may budget for such services based upon its medicaid reimbursement rate, or based on figures in whatever amount that may be established by a circuit court, without reference to any statewide controlling guidelines.

I am sympathetic to the DHHR's position on these issues. That is why I am pleased that this Court's opinion recognizes the DHHR's looming financial shortages, and establishes an important limitation on the DHHR's duty to pay expert witness fees in juvenile delinquency cases. And I am also pleased that the pre-approval requirement is strongly recognized in the Court's opinion; this process should prevent many future problems.

The decentralized nature of our circuit court system is excellent for certain purposes, but it can come into strong tension with the cost of managing what are in most respects social work and public health matters.

Thus, we have recently gotten away from allowing circuit judges carte blanche to require costly, often out-of-state placements for children in crisis. Moreover, courts simply cannot be a rubber-stamp for "have invoice, will travel" experts.

I would therefore find that the lack of fee pre-approval in Dr. Hewitt's cases was a jurisdictional defect that made the orders void, even if they were not immediately appealed.

I am authorized to state that Justice Maynard joins in this separate opinion.

v.

The Hon. Donald F. BLACK, etc. et al.

No. 14617.

Dec. 18, 1979.

SYLLABUS BY THE COURT

1. In determining whether to grant a rule to show cause in prohibition when a court is not acting in excess of its jurisdiction, this Court will look to the adequacy of other available remedies such as appeal and to the over-all economy of effort and money among litigants, lawyers and courts; however, this Court will use prohibition in this discretionary way to correct only substantial, clear-cut, legal errors plainly in contravention of a clear statutory, constitutional, or common law mandate which may be resolved independently of any disputed facts and only in cases where there is a high probability that the trial will be completely reversed if the error is not corrected in advance.

2. W.Va.Code, 56-9-1 (1939) which provides that a circuit court in which a proceeding has been filed may transfer the proceeding to another circuit for good cause is not inconsistent with Rule 42b, W.Va. RCP which provides that the court in which the first of two or more related actions arising out of the same transaction is pending may order all actions transferred to it.

3. Where a trial court does not abuse its discretion in transferring cases under W.Va.Code, 56-9-1 (1939) this Court will not prohibit such transfer.

NEELY, Justice:
On 27 April 1978 the collapse of a cooling tower then under construction at the Pleasants Power Station, Willow Island, Pleasants County, West Virginia, resulted in the deaths of fifty-one men. As a consequence of certain of those deaths, as of 18 June 1979, there were pending in the Circuit Court of Pleasants County twenty civil actions which sought damages for wrongful death from various defendants who were involved in the construction or ownership of the collapsed tower.

On 16 May 1979 seven civil actions seeking damages for the alleged wrongful deaths of persons killed in the same collapse were filed in the Circuit Court of Wood County. Before the filing of the seven civil actions in Wood County, the Circuit Court of Pleasants County had consolidated all of the then pending Willow Island cases for discovery purposes and ordered all cases arising out of the cooling tower disaster which would subsequently be filed in Pleasants County to be likewise consolidated, subject to plaintiffs' objection, and ordered that the law firm of Preiser & Wilson be appointed "to serve as lead counsel for the purpose of supervising, coordinating, and initiating pretrial discovery on behalf of all plaintiffs in such actions consolidated herewith."

The seven civil actions filed in Wood County were distributed among the three judges of that court, and on 18 June 1979 Research-Cottrell, which was a defendant in each of the wrongful death actions, moved the Circuit Court of Wood County to remove the civil actions filed in that circuit to the Circuit Court of Pleasants County pursuant to W.Va.Code, 56-9-1 (1939). See footnote 1

The motion to transfer the actions to Pleasants County was resisted by the plaintiffs in the Wood County litigation and after briefs and argument the respondent, Donald F. Black, Chief Judge of the Circuit Court of Wood County, granted the motion and directed that an order effecting that decision be prepared for entry. Included in Judge Black's findings were his conclusions that:

> all Twenty-Seven (27) Civil Actions Seven (7) pending in the Circuit Court of Wood County, West Virginia, a nd the Twenty (20) pending in the Circuit Court of Pleasants County, West Virginia, involved com mon questions of both law and fact, and that they can be consolidated for the purposes of discovery and trial, and the issues of liability and all other matters other than the quantum of damages. If said Civil Actions are consolidated for the determination of all issues other than dam ages, they will save all parties litigant to all Tw enty-Seven (27) Ci vil Actions much time and m oney. Such consolidati on would avoid (1) duplication of discovery, (2) the duplication of the tria l of the issues of liability, and (3) duplication as to other issues. Such consolidation would avoid possible contradictory rulings on the part of th e separate circuit courts trying the same.

The plaintiffs in the Wood County action then came to this Court seeking a writ of prohibition and we granted a rule to show cause why the Circuit Court of Wood County had not exceeded its legitimate powers in transferring the civil actions to Pleasants County. We conclude that the Circuit Court of Wood County had jurisdiction to transfer the cases and that in so doing the court did not abuse its discretion; consequently, the writ of prohibition prayed for is denied.

I

The threshold question presented in this case is whether an issue of this type may be reached by a writ of prohibition. This case presents an opportunity to address a subject which has not recently been adequately considered, namely when a litigant can successfully seek a writ of prohibition to serve the office of an interlocutory appeal. In general there is an Embarras de richesses of creative mandates emanating from actions in prohibition See footnote 2 and an utter paucity of cogent analysis of the criteria which motivate this court to entertain a proceeding in prohibition. In general judges cringe at the bare mention of an "interlocutory appeal" because it conjures the specter of clogged dockets, interminable delays while minor procedural points are shunted from trial court to appellate court and back, and the piecemeal adjudication of causes which could be satisfactorily resolved exclusively in the lower court. To the extent that all of these fears are justified we are adamantly opposed to being in the interlocutory appeals business.

Nonetheless, the classic formulation that a writ of prohibition will issue "in all cases of usurpation and abuse of power, when the inferior court has not jurisdiction of the subject matter in controversy, or, having such jurisdiction, exceeds its legitimate powers," W.Va.Code, 53-1-1 (1923) hardly illuminates the variety of circumstances where this Court will grant a rule in prohibition. See footnote 3 "(T)here is no sharp line between a court acting in error under substantive or procedural law and a court acting in excess of its powers if only because every act without jurisdiction or in excess of its powers in a proceeding over which it has jurisdiction of necessity involves an 'error of law.' " La Rocca v. Lane, 37 N.Y.2d 575, 376 N.Y.S.2d 93, 338 N.E.2d 606 (1975),Cert. denied, 424 U.S. 968, 96 S.Ct. 1464, 47 L.Ed.2d 734 (1976).

We have recognized the simple truth of the La Rocca, supra, pronouncement in the variety of circumstances where we have issued writs of prohibition because a court "exceeded its legitimate powers," See footnote 4 but we have been unable to articulate functional rules which instruct the bar when their attempts to invoke this Court's discretionary jurisdiction will meet with success. It is to this undertaking that we shall now proceed with some trepidation.

Since the key word in any analysis of prohibition must be "discretionary" unless this Court is to take on the character of an appellate squire's court, we are confounded for that reason by insurmountable conceptual hurdles to constructing iron-clad rules about when prohibition will issue. We can initially, however, perform one service for litigants and the bar, namely explain that once a rule to show cause in prohibition has issued it is unnecessary to brief the procedural question of whether prohibition is the appropriate remedy under prior case law. This Court is sufficiently familiar with all the law surrounding the writ of prohibition that three or four pages of brief dedicated to a repetition of rules about prohibition lying only when a trial court has "exceeded its legitimate powers" is a waste of litigant money and lawyer and court time. It shall be sufficient hereafter in prohibition cases to state the simple proposition that prohibition is not the appropriate remedy arguing the functional criteria of this case or alternatively that prohibition is the appropriate remedy using the same criteria.

When then will prohibition be considered the appropriate remedy and a rule to show cause issue? At the heart of the matter are two functional criteria: first, the adequacy of another remedy such as appeal; second, economy of effort among litigants, lawyers and courts. See footnote 5Furthermore, there is a gloss which surrounds both previous criteria, namely a question of good faith. Whenever the Court believes that a prohibition petition is interposed for the purpose of delay or to confuse and confound the legitimate workings of the criminal or civil process in the lower courts, a rule will be denied. In this regard it should be noted that in the last ten years we are unable to find any prohibition cases arising during a trial.

Obviously there are prohibition proceedings which come squarely within the classic definition of "when the inferior court has no jurisdiction of the subject matter in controversy" Code, 53-1-1 (1923) as when, for example, a magistrate court undertakes to try title to real estate or a circuit court undertakes to adjudicate the rights of nonresidents who have not properly been served with process. See footnote 6 Many cases, however, are entertained under the catch-all "exceeds its legitimate powers" Code, 53-1-1 (1923) and there the operative thought process of this Court in granting a rule involves a weighing of the gravity of the harm to be caused by pre-trial error versus the efficacy of an alternative remedy. See "The Writ of Prohibition in New York Attempt to Circumscribe an Elusive Concept," 50 St. John's Law Review 76 (1976).

In the case before us we had an excellent Prima facie showing of grounds for relief in prohibition at the time the rule issued; while we have concluded after looking at the merits that the trial court acted properly, that is a determination on the merits and not on the appropriateness of the prohibition remedy. If the trial court had acted improperly in this case there would have been no Effective remedy by appeal. The petitioners alleged that they were entitled to a jury trial in the forum of their choice and that the Parkersburg forum would give them a jury with a substantially higher likelihood of a generous award.

Had they been correct, yet been forced to trial in Pleasants County, they might have received a generous award, but arguably not as generous as they would have received in Wood County. What would they then be able to do? Appeal a verdict for half a million dollars in the hopes of getting a new trial with a larger award? Few plaintiffs' lawyers will trade good awards for the hope of excellent awards when there is a risk of losing all.

Consequently, in the case before us the adequacy of a remedy by appeal was wholly theoretical and not at all practical. The same applies in criminal cases where the issue is double jeopardy; a defendant may be put to $25,000 worth of legal fees, months of agony (possibly in jail) and a year in prison or the county jail while this Court considers a full appeal. That is hardly adequate! Furthermore, in terms of judicial economy it is far more efficient for this Court to prohibit a trial when the defendant presents a good double jeopardy plea than it is to have the lower court spend court time, jury fees, witness fees, transcript expenses, and prosecutor resources only to discover two years later that the trial was a nullity. The cases where double jeopardy has not been found a good ground are seldom reported because this Court does not issue the rule in the first place. This Court's time is not so valuable that we cannot spend ten man hours (staff included) to save three hundred man hours below and $30,000 in expense. The reported cases generally reveal at least one rule, namely, that whenever lawyers feel that they have been outrageously abused by incorrect trial court rulings they come to this Court seeking justice and this Court has frequently responded. See footnote 7 The salutary restraints upon excessive attempts to invoke prohibition are two: first, a recognition on the part of the bar that frivolous cases will fall upon deaf ears; second, a recognition of the expense and time involved in going through an essentially vain process.

In most of the cases where a rule has been issued the question has been exclusively legal and not a mixed question of fact and law. This Court is not engineered to be as efficient a finder of fact as a trial court because of the cumbersome procedures for taking depositions. When, however, there is a clear legal question it is often efficient to come in prohibition. Furthermore, a remedy by appeal of a crucial but erroneous legal ruling is frequently quite inadequate, particularly if we are realistic in our definition of "adequacy" and recognize that part of adequacy has to do with expense and time. However, where the proper resolution of the legal question first depends upon a proper finding of disputed facts, then the efficiency of prohibition disappears because of mechanical problems in fact finding inherent in multimember courts. In that event, surely, the relative adequacy of a remedy by appeal becomes correspondingly enhanced.

We fear that prohibition may become a dragnet by means of which questions appropriate for the trial court will erroneously be brought before our Court; nonetheless, this Court invites opportunities to correct substantial, clear-cut, legal errors where there is the high probability that the trial will be completely reversed if the error is not corrected in advance. Examples of this type of error have been: proceedings predicated on unconstitutional statutes; See footnote 8 improper joinder of parties defendant; See footnote 9 awards of alimony in favor of a guilty party against whom a divorce has been granted; See footnote 10 proceedings in direct contravention of a clear, positive command of the State or Federal constitutions; See footnote 11 proceedings in contravention of a clear, positive command of a statute; See footnote 12Et hoc genus omne.

Consequently, when litigants apply for a writ of prohibition they should concisely set forth their reasons for believing that the particular action of the trial court of which they complain creates grave harm and the reasons that alternative remedies fail to provide adequate relief. In this regard the word "adequate" must subsume in its definition such considerations as speed, cost, and the difficulty of separating issues on appeal. The purpose of this analysis of prohibition is not to expand the use of the writ beyond our current practice, but rather to explain the thought process which the Court appears to be employing so that litigants can respond more effectively. In addition we help shorten the gap between experienced West Virginia practitioners and out-of-state or inexperienced, young lawyers who must instruct themselves through written opinions rather than informal lore at the bar.

II

The petitioners in the case before us assert that the provisions of W.Va.Code, 56-9-1 (1939) have been superseded by Rule 42b, W.Va.RCP. We agree that to the extent that statutes relating to pleading, practice and procedure are inconsistent with or repugnant to the Rules of Civil Procedure they are no longer in force and effect as mandated by W.Va.Code, 51-1-4 (1935). However, we find no inconsistency between the statute which provides that a party may move a circuit court in which an action is pending to transfer it to any other circuit if good cause is shown and Rule 42b which allows the court in which the first of two or more related actions is pending to order all actions transferred to it. The statute and the Rule are opposite sides of the same coin; the first permits one circuit judge to transfer a case to another circuit for good cause and the second permits a judge to summon cases to his circuit when his court was the first in which one of related actions was filed. Both statute and Rule are designed to accomplish one goal, namely provide for a system which will give consistent economical, and efficient relief. Accordingly, since there is no inconsistency between the statute and the rule, we hold that the respondent judge of Wood County had jurisdiction under the statute to order the cases transferred.

Petitioners further allege that even if the respondent judge had jurisdiction to transfer the cases he abused his discretion in so doing since the plaintiffs were entitled to a jury trial in any forum of their choice with proper jurisdiction and venue. This confronts us with the need to reconcile conflicting public policies: the first is to "secure the just, speedy, and inexpensive determination of every action" Rule 1, W.Va.RCP ; the second is to assure that a plaintiff may choose the forum which is most convenient for him. See footnote 13 The respondent Criss Concrete Company filed a number of exhibits in this prohibition proceeding, among which were included 286 pages of depositions already taken along with over 200 printed pages of interrogatory questions. One can imagine the volume of the answers which will be submitted in response! There are nine corporate defendants and 27 individual plaintiffs in these actions. Furthermore, it appears that the suit will focus upon enormously complex factual questions involving principles of engineering which will be intertwined with equally complex legal issues concerning workmen's compensation immunity, warranty, products liability, negligence, and comparative negligence. The petitioners assert that since Wood County is an urban county, the potential jury award would be higher because urban juries tend to be more generous than rural juries. A look at the State map, however, demonstrates that Pleasants County is directly adjacent to Wood County and it is obvious that the residents of Pleasants County enjoy a general participation in the business, industry, and commerce of the Parkersburg area. As this Court indicated in State ex rel. Whitman v. Fox, W.Va., 236 S.E.2d 565 (1977) the consideration of judicial economy cannot outweigh injury to the litigants in a circumstance where the economical procedure is at direct odds with overall fairness or equity; however, the Court concludes that in light of community of interest between Wood County and Pleasants County the disadvantage to the plaintiffs is speculative at best while the advantages of consolidation in terms of both economy and consistency are quite real and substantial. Furthermore we find that Pleasants County is as convenient a forum for the plaintiffs as Wood County and that they are not put to any significant increased expense or aggravation in prosecuting their claim in Pleasants County.

Accordingly for the reasons set forth above the writ of prohibition is denied.

Footnote: 1 W.Va.Code, 56-9-1 (1939) provides:
A circuit court, or any court of limited jurisdiction established pursuant to the provisions of section 1, article VIII of the Constitution of this State, wherein an action, suit, motion or other civil proceeding is pending, or the judge thereof in vacation, may on the motion of any party, after ten days' notice to the adverse party or his attorney, and for good cause shown, order such action, suit, motion or other civil proceeding to be removed, if pending in a circuit court, to any other circuit court, and if pending in any court of limited jurisdiction hereinbefore mentioned to the circuit court of that county: Provided, that the judge of such other circuit court in a case of removal from one circuit to another may decline to hear said cause, if, in his opinion, the demands and requirements of his office render it improper or inconvenient for him to do so.

Footnote: 2 One of the best examples of creative prohibitionship is State ex rel. Knight v. Public Service Commission, W.Va., 245 S.E.2d 144 (1978) where this Court said: "This action arises in prohibition but we are not quite certain what it is that the relator would have us prohibit, as the statutory scheme in West Virginia permits proposed rate increases to go into effect after one hundred and fifty days Absent any action by the Public Service Commission. We shall assume Arguendo, however, for the purposes of this case, that if the challenged statute were unconstitutional some exercise in judicial imagination would permit us to reach the issue on prohibition."

Footnote: 3 For many years finality was jealously guarded in the Federal system and was "departed from only when observance of it would practically defeat the right to any review at all." Cobbledick v. United States, 309 U.S. 323, 324-25, 60 S.Ct. 540, 541, 84 L.Ed. 783 (1940). Since the advent of "supervisory mandamus" which was embraced by a bare majority in La Buy v. Howes Leather Co., 352 U.S. 249, 77 S.Ct. 309, 1 L.Ed.2d 290 (1957), the reluctance to issue extraordinary writs under the venerable All Writs Act, 28 U.S.C. s 1651 has diminished greatly. In La Buy the United States Supreme Court held that a writ of mandamus (which in West Virginia practice would be a writ of prohibition since we still observe the common law, historical distinction between administrative officers and judicial officers, See Beard v. Worrell, W.Va., 212 S.E.2d 598 (1974)) was properly issued to prohibit a district court judge from transferring a complicated anti-trust case to a master after a significant amount of the litigation had already been completed. The Court admonished that this presented "exceptional conditions" where the Court had "exceeded or refused to exercise its functions." 352 U.S. at 257, 77 S.Ct. at 314. The Court also included the obligatory phrase that the decision was not opening the floodgates to interlocutory review and that it did not intend "to authorize the indiscriminate use of prerogative writs as a means of reviewing interlocutory orders." 352 U.S. at 255, 77 S.Ct. at 313. The dissent was more realistic and prescient in recognizing the "encouragement to interlocutory appeals offered by this decision" 352 U.S. at 268, 77 S.Ct. at 320 (Brennan, J., dissenting). Since La Buy "(i)t is beyond question that the supervisory mandamus cases have extended the writs well beyond their traditional role." 16 Wright, Miller & Cooper, Federal Practice and Procedure: Jurisdiction s 3934 at 241 (1977). In both civil and criminal areas the use of the extraordinary writ in Federal review is burgeoning but at least one commentator believes that "stern admonitions that the writs remain reserved for extraordinary situations have been effective in preventing a debilitating rush of petitioners." Id. We hope the same will apply in West Virginia!

Arbogast, W.Va., 201 S.E.2d 492 (1973) (writ awarded to prohibit denial of continuance when statute provides that proceedings should proceed after a reasonable time had elapsed for completion of the work and trial court failed to provide reasonable time); and, Woodall v. Laurita, 156 W.Va. 707, 195 S.E.2d 717 (1973) (writ denied but petitioner successfully demonstrated a multiplicity of pretrial errors by the prosecuting attorney that resulted in egregious failures of due process, however, rendered moot by subsequent prosecuting attorney who admitted error of predecessor.)

Footnote: 5 The federal appellate courts have wrestled with the problem of formulating objective principles to guide the use of their power to issue extraordinary writs. The Ninth Circuit recently helped frame the boundaries of this power by suggesting guidelines gleaned from cases that granted extraordinary relief. That court set out the following five guidelines for practical application:
(1) The party seeking the writ has no other adequate means, such as a direct appeal, to attain the relief he or she desires. . . . (2) The petitioner will be damaged or prejudiced in a way not correctable on appeal (This guideline is closely related to the first). . . . (3) The district court's order is clearly erroneous as a matter of law. . . . (4) The district court's order is an oft-repeated error, or manifests a persistent disregard of the federal rules. . . . (5) The district court's order raises new and important problems, or issues of law of first impression. Bauman v. Gulf Oil v. Gilbert, 330 U.S. 501, 508, 67 S.Ct. 839, 843, 91 L.Ed. 1055 (1947). However, notwithstanding a policy permitting a plaintiff to choose his forum, the Court was willing to balance against the plaintiff's choice "all other practical problems that make trial of a case easy, expeditious and inexpensive." Id. We construe Rule 42b W.Va.RCP and Code, 56-9-1 (1939) as providing, in appropriate cases, a viable counterpart to 28 U.S.C. 1404 (1962).

CAPLAN, Justice, concurring:
While I agree with the decision to deny the writ in this case, I am not in agreement with much of the dissertation in the opinion relative to the function of the extraordinary remedy of prohibition. Preliminarily, I do not agree that the subject of prohibition "has not recently been adequately considered". The decisions of this Court, recent and throughout the years, which have, with clarity, instructed the bench and bar on the proper use of prohibition, are indeed legion and the purported instruction contained in the opinion, which I believe in large part is erroneous, tends to confuse rather than aid.

My basic disagreement goes to the general tenor of the opinion, wherein, despite the writer's protestation that "we are adamantly opposed to being in the interlocutory appeals business", we are instructed that we may use prohibition as an interlocutory appeal to correct "clear-cut, legal errors where there is the high probability that the trial will be completely reversed if the error is not corrected in advance." This over-simplification may sound of Solomonic justice at first blush, but I submit that the efficacy of prohibition, designed to serve an extraordinary purpose, will suffer by its implementation.

Which clear errors may be corrected by a writ of prohibition? Upon the admission of clear hearsay testimony, do we interrupt the trial and proceed in this Court in prohibition? Upon the giving of an erroneous instruction, is there to be another interruption of the trial to correct what appears to be clear error? The answers to these queries should be obvious a trial could be subjected to unreasonable delay and endless shuttling from trial to appellate court. No, I do not, as suggested by the writer of the opinion, "cringe at the bare mention" of interlocutory appeal interlocutory appeal, properly used, serves a proper function in our jurisprudence but I do "cringe" at the cavalier manner in which the Court, in this case, has subverted the clear and well established office of the writ of prohibition.

To carry out the teachings of the opinion could, and probably will, result in the piecemeal handling of litigation. This was deplored by the writer of the opinion in Woodall v. Laurita, 156 W.Va. 707, 195 S.E.2d 717 (1973) in the following language: "The piecemeal challenge of discretionary rulings through writs of prohibition does not facilitate the orderly administration of justice." It is my firm conviction that the pronouncements in the opinion in relation to the function of the writ of prohibition are far too broad, that they obliterate the distinction between that extraordinary remedy and appeal and that the use of prohibition in the manner prescribed will cause confusion and delay in the trial of cases.

1. "Where the issue on an appeal from the circuit court is clearly a question of law or involving an interpretation of a statute, we apply a de novo standard of review." Syl. Pt. 1, Chrystal R.M. v. Charlie A.L., 194 W.Va. 138, 459 S.E.2d 415 (1995).

2. "Under the Parental Kidnapping Prevention Act of 1980, 28 U.S.C. Sec. 1738A (1982), our courts are required to enforce an out-of-state child custody modification decree if: (1) the initial decree was consistent with the act; (2) the court in the first state had jurisdiction under its laws to modify the initial decree; and (3) a child or one of the contestants in such proceeding has remained a resident of the first state." Syl. Pt. 2, Arbogast v. Arbogast, 174 W.Va. 498, 327 S.E.2d 675 (1984).

3. "Before an out-of-state child custody decree can be enforced here, it must be demonstrated that the court making the decree had jurisdiction of the parties and of the subject matter of the dispute." Syl. Pt. 3, Arbogast v. Arbogast, 174 W.Va. 498, 327 S.E.2d 675 (1984).

4. " 'The Parental Kidnapping Prevention Act of 1980, 28 U.S.C. § 1738A (1982), extends full faith and credit principles to child custody decrees and requires every state to enforce sister state custody determinations that are consistent with the act.' Syllabus Point 1, Arbogast v. Arbogast, 174 W.Va. 498, 327 S.E.2d 675 (1984)." Syl. Pt. 1, Sheila L. v. Ronald P.M., 195 W.Va. 210, 465 S.E.2d 210 (1995).

5. "The Uniform Child Custody Jurisdiction Act, W.Va.Code §§ 48-10-1 to -26 (1986), is premised on the theory that the best interests of a child are served by limiting jurisdiction to modify a child custody decree to the court which has the maximum amount of evidence regarding the child's present and future welfare." Syl. Pt. 1, In re Brandon L.E., 183 W.Va. 113, 394 S.E.2d 515 (1990).

6. "Notwithstanding their intent to require states adopting the Uniform Child Custody Jurisdiction Act to recognize custody decrees entered by sister states, the Act's drafters in no uncertain terms provided jurisdiction to both the original 'custody court' and other courts to determine whether modification of the initial custody decree is in the best interest of the child." Syl. Pt. 2, In re Brandon L.E., 183 W.Va. 113, 394 S.E.2d 515 (1990).

Per Curiam:See footnote 1

Mr. David W.See footnote 2 (hereinafter "Appellant") appeals the exercise of jurisdiction by the Circuit Court of Cabell County over Zachary D. in an abuse and neglect proceeding initiated in Cabell County, West Virginia. The Appellant contends that Lawrence County, Ohio, is the proper jurisdiction and that Ohio is the home state of the child pursuant to the Uniform Child Custody Jurisdiction Act (hereinafter "UCCJA"). We disagree with the Appellant's contentions and affirm the determination of the lower court that West Virginia properly maintained jurisdiction in this matter.

I. Facts

Zachary D. was born on January 27, 1991. His mother, Angela D., was fifteen years old at the time of Zachary's birth, and Angela's mother, Barbara D.,See footnote 3 maintained temporary custody of Zachary prior to Angela's eighteenth birthday in July 1993.See footnote 4 Neither the putative father nor his family has ever had contact with Zachary. In November 1993, May 1994, and an additional six instances in 1995, the Cabell County Department of Health and Human Resources (hereinafter "DHHR") received referrals regarding Angela, Barbara, and Zachary, generally alleging that Angela was improperly caring for Zachary and had left him with various other individuals without providing for his care or well-being. The DHHR allegedly attempted to locate Angela subsequent to these referrals, but was unsuccessful.

On March 7, 1994, Kristopher D. was born to Angela. According to the record, Kristopher resided with Ms. Kathy Merritt, a family friend in Huntington, West Virginia, on the weekends for the first three months of his life and began residing exclusively with Ms. Merritt in June 1994. Ms. Merritt did not receive monetary compensation for this care of Kristopher. Zachary also allegedly spent considerable time with Ms. Merritt in Huntington, West Virginia, in 1994, and both Kristopher and Zachary resided with Ms. Merritt in June and July 1995.

Angela received AFDC support for Zachary during August and September 1995, and he was allegedly living primarily in her household in West Virginia during those months.See footnote 5 During portions of 1995, Zachary apparently stayed with Barbara and the Appellant in Ohio and was enrolled in Kindergarten in South Point, Ohio, near the Appellant's residence.

On November 20, 1995, the Appellant filed a petition in Ohio seeking custody of Zachary and claiming that Zachary had been living with him in Ohio for over a year. On December 21, 1995, pursuant to the Appellant's request for custody, Angela signed an Ohio consent form to permit the Appellant to adopt Zachary.See footnote 6 On December 26, 1995, the Ohio court issued an order placing Zachary with the Appellant in anticipation of potential future adoption. This Ohio order found that Zachary was a resident of Ohio.See footnote 7

On February 16, 1996, the DHHR in Cabell County, West Virginia, filed an abuse and neglect petition alleging that Zachary, then age five, and Kristopher, then almost two years of age, were neglected children.See footnote 8 8 The whereabouts of Zachary were unknown to DHHR, although the petition stated that DHHR believed that Zachary was living with Barbara, the maternal grandmother.See footnote 9 In response to the DHHR petition, the lower court granted emergency custody of Zachary and Kristopher to the DHHR on February 16, 1996. Zachary had not yet been located, and Kristopher thereafter remained in the care of Ms. Merritt in Huntington, West Virginia.

Based upon Angela's failure to appear at hearings scheduled in Cabell County on February 19, 1996, and March 4, 1996,See footnote 10 custody of the children remained with the DHHR. On March 14, 1996, in an attempt to find Zachary, the DHHR located Barbara at her Huntington, West Virginia, home. According to the testimony of Ms. Sharron Hisman, a child protective services worker, Barbara informed Ms. Hisman that Zachary was visiting the Appellant in Ohio. Ms. Hisman asked Barbara to transport Zachary to the DHHR later that day. The DHHR thus obtained physical custody of Zachary when he was brought to the DHHR office on March 14, 1996.

From March 1996, both Zachary and Kristopher resided in the Merritt home in Huntington, West Virginia. On May 6, 1996, CASASee footnote 11 Shirley Lewis submitted a report detailing her visitation to the Merritt home. Ms. Lewis indicated that the children both related well to Ms. Merritt and her teenaged daughters. Ms. Lewis also reported that Ms. Merritt was interested in adopting both children. The May 6, 1996, report recommended termination of Angela's parental rights based upon her neglect of the children. That report also related Zachary's alleged statements concerning the Appellant and his living quarters in what Zachary described as a "dirty old bus." Ms. Lewis also noted that based upon the Appellant's failure to appear for two initially scheduled adoption hearings in Ohio, the adoption proceedings were dismissed on March 14, 1996, and the Appellant subsequently refiled for adoption. The Appellant's petition for adoption was reinstated on March 21, 1996, in Ohio. Ms. Lewis also observed that the Appellant and the maternal grandmother, Barbara, were not residing together at that time.

In May 1996, the Appellant filed a motion to dismiss the abuse and neglect proceedings in Cabell County based on alleged lack of jurisdiction in West Virginia. The lower court denied the motion but included the Appellant as a party to the abuse and neglect proceedings in West Virginia. Guardian ad litem Lisa White, appointed on behalf of Zachary, informed the lower court that pursuant to her discussions with the Ohio judge and guardian ad litem, it was her understanding that adoption would not be recommended until a home study of the Appellant's home could be completed in Ohio.

In a June 13, 1996, report, Ms. Lewis recommended continued custody in the Merritt home, appointment of attorneys for the putative fathers so that termination of their parental rights could move forward, and denial of visitation to the Appellant.See footnote 12 In a June 17, 1996, hearing, as part of the improvement period granted to Angela, the lower court approved the Merritt home for temporary foster care and granted Angela supervised visitation with the children. The Appellant was permitted two supervised visits, and River Valley Child Development Center was to provide counseling and developmental screenings on the boys. Counsel was also appointed for the putative fathers in anticipation of proceedings to terminate their parental rights.

On June 21, 1996, the lower court entered an order continuing legal and physical custody of the children with the DHHR, and indicating that Angela had admitted neglecting the children. The court further ordered that no family member, including Angela, Barbara, or the Appellant, should have contact with the caregiver for the children.

On July 11, 1996, the Ohio court entered an order appointing the Appellant as Zachary's guardian, but that order has been suspended pending a decision by this Court in the present jurisdictional matter.See footnote 13 In an August 20, 1996, CASA report, Ms. Lewis recommended termination of Angela's rights, placement of both boys with Ms. Merritt, and visitation rights for the Appellant and Barbara. On September 30, 1996, the lower court granted Angela a ninety-day improvement period, terminated the parental rights of the unknown putative fathers, and denied the Appellant's motion for weekend visitation, allowing him one supervised visit per month.

On December 6, 1996, Zachary's guardian ad litem moved for termination of Angela's improvement period based upon her failure to cooperate and her failure to attend counseling at Prestera Mental Health Center. Angela had also failed to appear for scheduled visitation with the children. The guardian emphasized the necessity for attention to be focused upon a permanency plan for the children.

In a December 13, 1996, CASA report, Ms. Lewis stated that Angela's improvement period had produced no positive results, that she was not in compliance with the treatment plan, and that she had failed to attend sessions at Prestera designed to address her substance abuse problems. Ms. Lewis again recommended termination of Angela's parental rights.

On January 6, 1997, Angela entered a drug rehabilitation program and departed the program without permission on January 15, 1997. DHHR has had no further contact with Angela since that time. Hearings in the lower court regarding the jurisdictional issue were held on February 6, 1997, and March 5, 1997. Although Ohio had taken jurisdiction pursuant to the Appellant's recitation of the facts concerning Zachary's living arrangements, the DHHR submitted evidence indicating that child protective service workers investigating referrals of suspected child neglect had been advised that Angela and the children were residents of Cabell County, West Virginia, and the allegations which formed the basis for the petition for neglect had occurred in West Virginia. The DHHR contended that the Appellant's allegations that he had maintained physical custody of Zachary for years preceding the initiation of the neglect petition were not consistent with the prior investigations by the DHHR or with reports by Kathy Merritt that Zachary had lived with Ms. Merritt for weeks or months at a time during the period immediately preceding the Appellant's initiation of custody proceedings in Ohio. At the conclusion of the jurisdictional hearings, the lower court explained as follows:

I find that because of the vagabond helter-skelter life of the mother, that at the time the State of West Virginia exercised its jurisdiction through the filing of the petition in February [1996], that it cannot be concluded that the State of Ohio could be determined to have been exercising jurisdiction substantially in conformity with Article 48 of the code. For reasons through her transitory and vagabond life they could not have met the -- the State of Ohio could not have met the residency requirement.

On March 27, 1997, the lower court found that Ohio did not have jurisdiction, and that West Virginia had properly maintained jurisdiction over Zachary.See footnote 14 The Appellant now appeals that order.

While this appeal was pending, continued reports of the CASA representatives have indicated that the children are thriving in the custody of Ms. Merritt and that Ms. Merritt has earned her BSN in nursing and her nurse's license. She is currently employed by Southwestern Community Action Council as an RN/Case Manager.

II. Analysis

The Appellant raises three allegations of error: (1) DHHR failed to comply with the UCCJA in exercising jurisdiction over Zachary; (2) the lower court erred in failing to recognize and enforce the Ohio custody decree which placed Zachary with the Appellant in anticipation of adoption; and (3) DHHR improperly removed Zachary from the Appellant's custody in Ohio. In syllabus point one of Chrystal R.M. v. Charlie A.L., 194 W.Va. 138, 459 S.E.2d 415 (1995), we explained that "[w]here the issue on an appeal from the circuit court is clearly a question of law or involving an interpretation of a statute, we apply a de novo standard of review."

Upon review of the record and briefs in this matter, we find that the DHHR properly asserted jurisdiction in February 1996 by filing a petition alleging the neglect of Zachary after receiving referrals alleging neglect of the child while residing in Cabell County, West Virginia. Zachary was thus brought within the jurisdiction of the lower court by virtue of the reports of neglect occurring in Cabell County, the county in which DHHR had evidence indicating that he, his mother, and his maternal grandmother resided.See footnote 15

A. Applicability of the UCCJA and PKPA to Abuse and Neglect Proceedings

Once the lower court learned of the Ohio custody and adoption proceedings, the jurisdictional issue was raised and a determination of proper jurisdiction for this custody matter was necessitated. The UCCJA, West Virginia Code § 48-10-1, et seq. (1995), and the Parental Kidnapping Prevention Act, 28 U.S.C. § 1738A (1994), (hereinafter "PKPA") govern interstate child custody disputes. Within the definition of "custody proceeding," the UCCJA expressly includes abuse and neglect proceedings. West Virginia Code § 48-10-2(3) provides: "'Custody proceeding' includes proceedings in which a custody determination is one of several issues, such as an action for divorce or separation, and includes child neglect and dependency proceedings[.]" Thus, based upon the UCCJA's explicit inclusion of abuse and neglect proceedings within the definition of custody proceedings, we address the UCCJA in the context of this abuse and neglect matter. Application of the UCCJA to juvenile neglect proceedings has also been recognized in other jurisdictions. See, e.g., L. G. v. People, 890 P.2d 647 (Colo.1995); In Interest of L. C. , 857 P.2d 1375 (Kan.App.2d 1993); In re C. O., 856 P.2d 290 (Okl.Ct.App. 1993); In re E. H., 612 N.E.2d 174 (Ind. Ct. App.1993).

The Fourth Circuit Court of Appeals recognized in Meade v. Meade, 812 F.2d 1473 (4th Cir. 1987), that the PKPA was designed to remedy inconsistent UCCJA interpretations by various state courts and to create a uniform application of child custody jurisdictional standards. 812 F.2d at 1476. Addressing the applicability of the PKPA to abuse and neglect actions, the Court of Appeals of North Carolina explained as follows:

Although the PKPA does not include within its definition section any reference to neglect, abuse, or dependency proceedings, 28 U.S.C.A. S 1738A(b), "there is nothing to indicate that it was intended to be limited solely to custody disputes between parents." In re Appeal in Pima County Juvenile Action No. J-78632, 147 Ariz. 527, 711 P.2d 1200, 1206 (Ct.App. 1985), approved in part, vacated in part, 147 Ariz. 584, 712 P.2d 431 (1986). Furthermore, "[t]he PKPA's coverage of custody proceedings is exclusive [in providing that] 'every State shall enforce ... and shall not modify ... any child custody determination made ... by a court of another State.' " State ex rel. D.S.K., 792 P.2d 118, 129 (Utah Ct.App.1990). Accordingly, "the PKPA is applicable to all interstate custody proceedings affecting a prior custody award by a different State, including [abuse,] neglect and dependency proceedings." See id. at 130[.]

In re Van Kooten, 126 N.C.App. 764, 769, 487 S.E.2d 160, 163.

B. Analysis of UCCJA and PKPA

The PKPA requires every state to recognize and enforce custody determinations of sister states if such determinations were consistent with the Act, providing as follows at 28 U.S.C. § 1738A(a):

The appropriate authorities of every State shall enforce according to its terms, and shall not modify except as provided in subsection (f) of this section, any child custody determination made consistently with the provisions of this section by a court of another State.See footnote 16

The UCCJA contains a similar arrangement, providing "that foreign states' custody decrees are to be recognized and enforced by West Virginia courts if they accord with statutory provisions substantially similar to those of the UCCJA or meet UCCJA jurisdictional standards." Arbogast v. Arbogast, 174 W.Va. 498, 502, 327 S.E.2d 675, 679 (1984). In syllabus point two of Arbogast, we explained:

Under the Parental Kidnapping Prevention Act of 1980, 28 U.S.C. Sec. 1738A (1982), our courts are required to enforce an out-of-state child custody modification decree if: (1) the initial decree was consistent with the act; (2) the court in the first state had jurisdiction under its laws to modify the initial decree; and (3) a child or one of the contestants in such proceeding has remained a resident of the first state.

Syllabus point three of Arbogast emphasized that "[b]efore an out-of-state child custody decree can be enforced here, it must be demonstrated that the court making the decree had jurisdiction of the parties and of the subject matter of the dispute." In Arbogast, we acknowledged that both the PKPA and UCCJA[See footnote 17] attempt "to eliminate judicial competition and conflicting decrees in interstate child custody dispute by establishing clear and definite rules about which state has jurisdiction of a custody dispute and enforcing orders of that state." Id.

In Sheila L. v. Ronald P. M., 195 W. Va. 210, 465 S.E.2d 210 (1995), we recognized that the full faith and credit doctrine will not be applied where a foreign court lacked jurisdiction under the UCCJA and the PKPA. Id. at 217, 465 S.E.2d at 217. In syllabus point one of Sheila L., we stated:

"The Parental Kidnapping Prevention Act of 1980, 28 U.S.C. § 1738A (1982), extends full faith and credit principles to child custody decrees and requires every state to enforce sister state custody determinations that are consistent with the act." Syllabus Point 1, Arbogast v. Arbogast, 174 W.Va. 498, 327 S.E.2d 675 (1984).

In Sheila L., the mother lived in West Virginia with the child, and the father resided in Ohio. 195 W.Va. at 213, 465 S.E.2d at 213. The father obtained an ex parte order from the Ohio Court of Common Pleas granting him temporary custody of the child based upon allegations that the mother's stepfather abused the child while the child resided with the mother in West Virginia. Id. Ohio then retained jurisdiction, and West Virginia accorded full faith and credit to the Ohio determination of custody to the father. Id. at 215, 465 S.E.2d at 215. The mother appealed, and this Court held that although Ohio properly maintained jurisdiction for the purpose of emergency custody under the allegations of abuse, Ohio lacked jurisdiction for determination of the ultimate custody resolution and West Virginia, as the home state, was deemed the most appropriate forum for deciding the custody issue. Id. at 223, 465 S.E.2d at 223.

As we observed in syllabus point one of In re Brandon L.E., 183 W.Va. 113, 394 S.E.2d 515 (1990):

The Uniform Child Custody Jurisdiction Act, W.Va.Code §§ 48-10-1 to -26 (1986), is premised on the theory that the best interests of a child are served by limiting jurisdiction to modify a child custody decree to the court which has the maximum amount of evidence regarding the child's present and future welfare.

Syllabus point two of Brandon explained:

Notwithstanding their intent to require states adopting the Uniform Child Custody Jurisdiction Act to recognize custody decrees entered by sister states, the Act's drafters in no uncertain terms provided jurisdiction to both the original 'custody court' and other courts to determine whether modification of the initial custody decree is in the best interest of the child.

In Brandon, we concluded that the best interests of the child dictated that West Virginia, the court with the most substantial evidence regarding the child's present and future well-being, should have jurisdiction. 183 W.Va. at 119, 394 S.E.2d at 521. Significantly, we explained in Brandon that the UCCJA permits a sister state with contacts to the child to determine whether modification of the initial decree is in the best interests of the child and requires that West Virginia, if serving as a modifying court, " 'give due consideration to the transcript of the record and other documents of all previous proceedings submitted to it in accordance with section twenty-two [Sec. 48-10-22] of this article.' W.Va.Code § 48-10-15(b)." 183 W.Va. at 120, 394 S.E.2d at 522. Under section twenty-two of the Act, a foreign court would be required to forward to the West Virginia court a certified copy of all documents pertaining to the custody determination upon appropriate request. W.Va.Code § 48-10-22 (1986).

We also found in Brandon that West Virginia had jurisdiction because of the "substantial evidence concerning the child's present or future care, protection, training and personal relationships." 183 W.Va. at 118, 394 S.E.2d at 520 (quoting W.Va.Code, 48-10-3(a)(2)(ii)). We found that Florida, the state making the initial determination, no longer had jurisdiction and recognized that the residence of a child within a community for six months can generate significant data. Id.

While a matter arising in the abuse and neglect arena obviously entails issues differing from a standard custody proceeding, the practice encouraged in the UCCJA regarding courts of the two states conferring and agreeing upon the appropriate forum for jurisdiction would still be prudent. If, for instance, a prior custody proceeding was made (or pending) in one state in accordance with the UCCJA jurisdictional prerequisites and subsequent abuse and neglect occurred in a second state, the evidence surrounding the abuse allegation would exist in that second state. In such instance, the better practice would be for the judges to confer and agree which court should hear the abuse and neglect matter.

III. Conclusion

In the case sub judice, we conclude that Ohio failed to satisfy the prerequisites for properly assuming jurisdiction over Zachary and that West Virginia was therefore not required to extend full faith and credit to the Ohio custody and adoption proceedings. Ohio would properly have obtained jurisdiction under the UCCJA if it satisfied any of the four criteria outlined in the statute, as quoted above. However, based upon the extensive record before this Court, it does not appear that Ohio could qualify as Zachary's home state at the time of the initiation of the Ohio proceedings, since he had not resided in Ohio for a period of six months prior to the initiation of the Ohio proceedings in November 1995. According to the evidence, Zachary had spent considerable time with Ms. Merritt in June and July 1995 in Huntington, West Virginia, and had lived with his mother in West Virginia in August and September 1995.

Additionally, Ohio would not properly have assumed jurisdiction under 48-10- 3(2) since Zachary had no significant connection with Ohio. Only the maternal grandmother's boyfriend permanently resided in Ohio, with Zachary and the grandmother residing in that home on an irregular basis. He had not been abandoned; nor was it necessary in an emergency to protect him, under section 48-10-3(3). Likewise, Ohio could not premise jurisdiction upon 48-10-3(4) regarding the absence of any other state that would have jurisdiction under the UCCJA. An examination of the child's history of various living arrangements would indicate that his substantial connections were in West Virginia.

We conclude that West Virginia is properly vested with jurisdiction over this matter, and we therefore affirm the decision of the lower court.

West Virginia Code § 48-10-6(c) specifies that if a court discovers, during the pendency of its own proceeding, the antecedent existence of a proceeding concerning custody in another state, "it shall stay the proceeding and communicate with the court in which the other proceeding is pending to the end that the issue may be litigated in the more appropriate forum and that information be exchanged in accordance with sections nineteen, twenty, twenty-one and twenty-two [§§ 48-10-19, 48-10-20, 48-10-21 and 48-10-22] of this article.

While not explicitly stated in the abuse and neglect statutes, we previously have recognized that circuit courts have "original jurisdiction of all cases coming within the terms of the [child welfare] act," which serves to protect "delinquent, dependent and neglected children." The petition shall be verified by the oath of some credible person having knowledge of the facts. The petition shall allege specific conduct including time and place, how such conduct comes within the statutory definition of neglect or abuse with references thereto, any supportive services provided by the state department to remedy the alleged circumstances and the relief sought.

Footnote: 16 Subsection (f) of § 1738A provides:

Footnote: 17 The UCCJA provides that a court is authorized to assume jurisdiction over a child custody matter by initial or modification decree under section 48-10-3 of the UCCJA where certain requirements are satisfied:

(1) This State (i) is the home state [home state defined as the State in which, immediately preceding the initiation of proceeds, the child lived with his parents, a parent, or a person acting as parent, for at least six consecutive months]See footnote 18 of the child at the time of commencement of the proceeding or (ii) has been the child's home state within six months before commencement of the proceeding, the child is absent from this State because of his removal or retention by a person claiming his custody or for other reasons and a parent or person acting as parent continues to live in this State; or

(2) It is in the best interest of the child that a court of this State assume jurisdiction because (i) the child and his parents, or the child and at least one contestant, have a significant connection with this State, and (ii) there is available in this State substantial evidence concerning the child's present or future care, protection, training and personal relationships; or

The applicable language of the PKPA, 28 U.S.C. § 1738A(c), (d), and (g), provides as follows:

(c) A child custody determination made by a court of a State is consistent with the provisions of this section only if--

(1) such court has jurisdiction under the law of such State; and

(2) one of the following conditions is met:

(A) such State (i) is the home State of the child on the date of the commencement of the proceeding, or (ii) had been the child's home State within six months before the date of the commencement of the proceeding and the child is absent from such State because of his removal or retention by a contestant or for other reasons, and a contestant continues to live in such State;

(B)(i) it appears that no other State would have jurisdiction under subparagraph (A), and (ii) it is in the best interest of the child that a court of such State assume jurisdiction because (I) the child and his parents, or the child and at least one contestant, have a significant connection with such State other than mere physical presence in such State, and (II) there is available in such State substantial evidence concerning the child's present or future care, protection, training, and personal relationships;

(C) the child is physically present in such State and (i) the child has been abandoned, or (ii) it is necessary in an emergency to protect the child because he has been subjected to or threatened with mistreatment or abuse;

(D)(i) it appears that no other State would have jurisdiction under subparagraph (A), (B), (C), or (E), or another State has declined to exercise jurisdiction on the ground that the State whose jurisdiction is in issue is the more appropriate forum to determine the custody of the child, and (ii) it is in the best interest of the child that such court assume jurisdiction; or

(E) the court has continuing jurisdiction pursuant to subsection (d) of this section.

(d) The jurisdiction of a court of a State which has made a child custody determination consistently with the provisions of this section continues as long as the requirement of subsection (c)(1) of this section continues to be met and such State remains the residence of the child or of any contestant.

(g) A court of a State shall not exercise jurisdiction in any proceeding for a custody determination commenced during the pendency of a proceeding in a court of another State where such court of that other State is exercising jurisdiction consistently with the provisions of this section to make a custody determination.

SYLLABUS BY THE COURT

1. "Although conclusions of law reached by a circuit court are subject to de novo review, when an action, such as an abuse and neglect case, is tried upon the facts without a jury, the circuit court shall make a determination based upon the evidence and shall make findings of fact and conclusions of law as to whether such child is abused or neglected. These findings shall not be set aside by a reviewing court unless clearly erroneous. A finding is clearly erroneous when, although there is evidence to support the finding, the reviewing court on the entire evidence is left with the definite and firm conviction that a mistake has been committed. However, a reviewing court may not overturn a finding simply because it would have decided the case differently, and it must affirm a finding if the circuit court's account of the evidence is plausible in light of the record viewed in its entirety." Syllabus Point 1, In the Interest of Tiffany Marie S., 196 W.Va. 223, 470 S.E.2d 177 (1996).

2. "W.Va. Code § 49-3-1(a) provides for grandparent preference in determining adoptive placement for a child where parental rights have been terminated and also incorporates a best interests analysis within that determination by including the requirement that the DHHR find that the grandparents would be suitable adoptive parents prior to granting custody to the grandparents. The statute contemplates that placement with grandparents is presumably in the best interests of the child, and the preference for grandparent placement may be overcome only where the record reviewed in its entirety establishes that such placement is not in the best interests of the child." Syllabus Point 4, Napoleon S. v. Walker, 217 W.Va. 254, 617 S.E.2d 801 (2005).

3. "By specifying in W.Va. Code § 49-3-1(a)(3) that the home study must show that the grandparents "would be suitable adoptive parents," the Legislature has implicitly included the requirement for an analysis by the Department of Health and Human Resources and circuit courts of the best interests of the child, given all circumstances of the case." Syllabus Point 5, Napoleon S. v. Walker, 217 W.Va. 254, 617 S.E.2d 801 (2005).

4. "It is a traumatic experience for children to undergo sudden and dramatic changes in their permanent custodians. Lower courts in cases such as these should provide, whenever possible, for a gradual transition period, especially where young children are involved. Further, such gradual transition periods should be developed in a manner intended to foster the emotional adjustment of the children to this change and to maintain as much stability as possible in their lives." Syllabus Point 3, James M. v. Maynard, 185 W.Va. 648, 408 S.E.2d 400 (1991).

Per Curiam:

This is a consolidated appeal from the Circuit Court of Ohio County wherein the circuit court ordered that the minor child, Hunter H.[1], be permanently placed with his maternal grandmother, rather than his foster parents, whom the child had lived with for three years and who were seeking to adopt him.

The appellants, the foster parents and Hunter H.'s guardian ad litem, appeal from the circuit court's order and raise three main arguments: (1) the circuit court erred by giving improper weight to the statutory and Department of Health and Human Resources ("DHHR") policy preference for grandparent adoption, rather than focusing its analysis on the best interests of the child; (2) the circuit court's findings of fact were clearly erroneous and implausible in light of the entire evidentiary record; and (3) the circuit court erred when it failed to grant the foster parents' motion to stay and erred by ordering Hunter H. to be immediately transferred from his foster parents to his grandmother without a gradual transition period.

After a thorough review of this matter, we agree with the appellants that the circuit court erred by giving improper weight to the grandparent preference, rather than focusing its analysis on the best interests of the child. We therefore reverse the circuit court's ruling and remand for entry of an order requiring that Hunter be placed with his foster parents for adoption.

I.
Facts & Background

Hunter H. was born on March 6, 2006. When Hunter was approximately 17 months old, his maternal grandmother, Donna D. ("Grandmother Donna" or "grandmother") contacted the DHHR because she feared for Hunter's safety after discovering that his biological parents were using crack cocaine.[2] On August 16, 2007, Grandmother Donna agreed to take custody of Hunter until a safety plan could be put into place. The DHHR subsequently received information that Grandmother Donna's husband, Frank B., regularly used marijuana and alcohol and had difficulty controlling his behavior. Due to these concerns, the DHHR sought to remove Hunter from Grandmother Donna's house and filed an abuse and neglect petition on behalf of Hunter, naming Hunter's biological parents, as well as Grandmother Donna and Frank B. as respondents. The child case plan prepared by Hunter's child protective services worker on September 22, 2009, described the conditions that existed in Grandmother Donna's residence prior to Hunter's removal:

> Hunter H. was staying with his maternal grandmother at that time as the result of a safety plan. Due to the illegal drug use and domestic violence between Amanda L. and Robert H.

[2]Hunter's biological parents, Amanda L. and Robert H., were addicted to crack cocaine and involved in other illegal activities, including writing bad checks, at the time the child was removed from their custody. Amanda L. also brought domestic violence charges against Robert H.

> (Hunter's natural parents) and the criminal history and drug use by paternal grandfather Frank B., it was determined to be in the best interest of Hunter H. that he [sic] removed from the home. The actions of the caretakers put Hunter at high risk of harm.

Hunter was subsequently removed from Grandmother Donna's residence and placed with foster parents, Joyce and Jerry W., where he resided continuously from August 2007 through August 2010.

Three months after Hunter was removed, Grandmother Donna asked the DHHR to conduct a home study of her residence so that she could be considered as a permanent placement option for Hunter. This home study was denied in December 2007 because of Frank B.'s substance abuse problems and his erratic behavior. Grandmother Donna and Frank B. were dismissed as respondents from the abuse and neglect petition in May 2008 because they were not being considered as a permanent placement option for Hunter at that time.[3]

Due to a change in circumstance, Grandmother Donna's separation and impending divorce from Frank B.[4], the DHHR conducted a second home study of her residence in May 2009. Prior to this second home study, Grandmother Donna underwent a psychological evaluation with Dr. Fremouw, who concluded that she had "no strategy" for [3]The DHHR initially sought to reunite Hunter with his biological mother but she failed to abide by the terms of her improvement period and voluntarily relinquished her parental rights to the child. Hunter's biological father also voluntarily relinquished his parental rights to the child.

[4]By May 2009, Grandmother Donna was no longer living with Frank B., and the two were officially divorced in July 2009.

disciplining Hunter and that she had a "tendency to deny or avoid common problems." Despite these issues, Dr. Fremouw characterized her as "a loving grandmother who is committed to her grandchild," but also stated that she needed to learn more appropriate ways of disciplining young children other than "yelling" at them or "smacking" them.

The second home study of Grandmother Donna's residence was approved on July 28, 2009. Following this approved home study, the DHHR sought to permanently move Hunter from the foster parents house and place him with Grandmother Donna. Hunter's guardian ad litem raised a number of objections to this proposed move, stating that it was not in the child's best interest to be removed from a stable, loving environment. He noted that Hunter was thriving with his foster family, identified his foster parents as "mom" and "dad" and identified his foster parents' daughter as "sis." The guardian ad litem was also concerned that Grandmother Donna had not gone through an improvement period after being named as a respondent in the abuse and neglect petition. He stated, "I don't recall any case that any child was returned to a home of a respondent custodian" without the respondent completing an improvement period.[5] The guardian ad litem was also concerned with the possibility that Hunter's biological mother, who had relinquished her parental rights due to her drug problem, would be allowed to have contact with Hunter if he was moved to Grandmother Donna's house.

Despite these objections, the DHHR requested that Hunter be placed with Grandmother Donna following a multidisciplinary treatment team ("MDT") meeting on August 18, 2009. The foster parents filed a motion to intervene, which the circuit court granted. Following four days of testimony regarding Hunter's permanent placement, the circuit court ordered that Hunter "be immediately and permanently placed with his maternal grandmother, Ms. Donna D.," because she had a successful home study, was recommended for placement by the DHHR, and because of the statutory grandparent preference found in W.Va. Code § 49-3-1(a)(3) [2001]. The foster parents and guardian ad litem filed motions to stay this order, which the circuit court denied on August 12, 2010.[6] Following the denial of these motions to stay, Hunter was placed with Grandmother Donna. The foster parents and guardian ad litem appeal from the circuit court's order placing custody of Hunter with Grandmother Donna.

[6]Neither the foster parents, nor the guardian ad litem filed a motion to stay the circuit court's decision with the West Virginia Supreme Court of Appeals. We stated in In re Scottie D., 185 W.Va. 191, 198, 406 S.E.2d 214, 221 (1991), that a guardian ad litem has the duty to exercise the child's appellate rights if an appeal is deemed necessary:

> It is well established that 'after judgment adverse to his ward, the guardian ad litem has the right to appeal and the duty to do so if it reasonably appears to be to the advantage of the minor[.]' Robinson v. Gatch, 85 Ohio App. 484, 487, 87 N.E.2d 904, 906 (1949). This is based upon the principle that a guardian ad litem has a duty to represent the child(ren) to whom he or she has been appointed, as effectively as if the guardian ad litem were in a normal lawyer-client relationship.

II.
Standard of Review

The standard of review that governs appeals in abuse and neglect cases is set forth in Syllabus Point 1 of In the Interest of Tiffany Marie S., 196 W.Va. 223, 470 S.E.2d 177 (1996). It states:

> Although conclusions of law reached by a circuit court are subject to de novo review, when an action, such as an abuse and neglect case, is tried upon the facts without a jury, the circuit court shall make a determination based upon the evidence and shall make findings of fact and conclusions of law as to whether such child is abused or neglected. These findings shall not be set aside by a reviewing court unless clearly erroneous. A finding is clearly erroneous when, although there is evidence to support the finding, the reviewing court on the entire evidence is left with the definite and firm conviction that a mistake has been committed. However, a reviewing court may not overturn a finding simply because it would have decided the case differently, and it must affirm a finding if the circuit court's account of the evidence is plausible in light of the record viewed in its entirety.

III.
Discussion

The appellants assert that the circuit court erred by giving improper weight to the grandparent preference, rather than focusing its analysis on the best interests of the child. The Legislature adopted the grandparent preference to govern the adoption of children whose parents' parental rights have been terminated through abuse and neglect proceedings. W.Va. Code § 49-3-1(a)(3) [2001] states:

> For purposes of any placement of a child for adoption by the department, the department shall first consider the suitability and willingness of any known grandparent or grandparents to adopt the child. Once any such grandparents who are interested in adopting the child have been identified, the department shall conduct a home study evaluation, including home visits and individual interviews by a licensed social worker. If the department determines, based on the home study evaluation, that the grandparents would be suitable adoptive parents, it shall assure that the grandparents are offered the placement of the child prior to the consideration of any other prospective adoptive parents.

The grandparent preference is also set forth in the DHHR's internal regulations, specifically DHHR Adoption Policy § 7.3 which states, in part:

> A Grandparent or an adult relative with a positive home study certifying the home adoption must be given preference over the non-relative home even if the non-relative home has the appearance of a better placement choice.[7]

The grandparent preference must be considered in conjunction with our long standing jurisprudence that "the primary goal in cases involving abuse and neglect . .. must be the health and welfare of the children." Syllabus Point 3, in part, In re Katie S., 198 W.Va. 79, 479 S.E.2d 589 (1996). We have previously held that "in a contest involving the custody of an infant where there is no biological parent involved, the best interests of the child are the polar star by which the discretion of the court will be guided." Syllabus Point 1, in part, State v. McCoy, 189 W.Va. 210, 429 S.E.2d 492 (1993). Accord Syllabus Point 5, in part, Carter v. Carter, 196 W.Va. 239, 470 S.E.2d 193 (1996) ("In ... custody matters, we have traditionally held paramount the best interests of the child.").

This Court discussed the interplay between the grandparent preference and the overriding standard of the best interests of the child in Napoleon S. v. Walker, 217 W.Va. 254, 617 S.E.2d 801 (2005). Syllabus Points 4 and 5 of Napoleon S. provide guidance on how the grandparent preference and the best interests of the child analysis co-exist:

> W.Va. Code § 49-3-1(a) provides for grandparent preference in determining adoptive placement for a child where parental rights have been terminated and also incorporates a best interests analysis within that determination by including the requirement that the DHHR find that the grandparents would be suitable adoptive parents prior to granting custody to the grandparents. The statute contemplates that placement with grandparents is presumably in the best interests of the child, and the preference for grandparent placement may be overcome only where the record reviewed in its entirety establishes that such placement is not in the best interests of the child.
> By specifying in W.Va. Code § 49-3-1(a)(3) that the home study must show that the grandparents "would be suitable adoptive parents," the Legislature has implicitly included the requirement for an analysis by the Department of Health and Human Resources and circuit courts of the best interests of the child, given all circumstances of the case.

(Emphasis added).

This Court again discussed the grandparent preference in In re Elizabeth F., 225 W.Va. 780, 696 S.E.2d 296 (2010), and again came to the conclusion that the grandparent preference is not an absolute directive to place a child with a grandparent. Elizabeth F. involved an appeal following a permanency hearing in which the circuit court placed four minor children with their maternal grandparents based solely on the grandparent preference. The circuit court stated that "[a]bsent the grandparent preference, the Court doubts that his decision would be the same." Elizabeth F. 225 W.Va. at 784, 696 S.E.2d at 300. As in the present case, the guardian ad litem in Elizabeth F. argued that placing the children with their grandparents was not in the children's best interests and that the grandparent preference should not supercede the best interests of the children. This Court agreed with the guardian ad litem and held:

> [A]doption by a child's grandparents is permitted only if such adoptive placement serves the child's best interests. If, upon a thorough review of the entire record, the circuit court believes that a grandparental adoption is not in the subject child's best interests, it is not obligated to prefer the grandparents over another, alternative placement that does serve the child's best interests. See Syl. pts. 4 & 5, Napoleon S. v. Walker, 217 W.Va. 254, 617 S.E.2d 801. Because the circuit court accorded the grandparents an absolute preference in this case despite its expressed concerns about the propriety of such a placement, we reverse the circuit court's decision.

Elizabeth F. 225 W.Va. at 787, 696 S.E.2d at 303.

In the case sub judice, both the guardian ad litem and the only expert who testified before the circuit court concluded that it was in Hunter's best interests to remain with his foster family. After being removed from Grandmother Donna's house, Hunter lived with his foster parents for three years. Hunter's guardian ad litem said the child developed a strong bond with his foster family during this three-year period and was a happy, well-adjusted child who identified himself as a member of the foster family, calling his foster parents "mom" and "dad," and referring to his foster parents' daughter as "sis." Based on the bond that formed between Hunter and his foster family, and the stability it brought to the child's life, Hunter's guardian ad litem testified that it was in Hunter's best interests to remain with his foster family.

Multiple child case plans prepared by the DHHR support the guardian ad litem's position that the foster family created a stable, loving environment for Hunter. An April 16, 2009, child case plan states "Hunter is provided a loving and supportive home by this foster mother. He is growing and thriving as a result of this placement." Another child case plan, dated September 22, 2009, states "Hunter H. is a very healthy little boy who appears to be well adjusted, growing and thriving with no current special needs."

The only expert who offered an opinion during the permanency hearings testified that it was in Hunter's best interests to remain with his foster family. Psychologist Sandra Street was qualified as an expert in mental and behavioral health assessments, counseling, and child development. Ms. Street testified that the foster family created "a consistent, stable environment in which he (Hunter) has limits and reinforcement." She stressed the importance of a child having a constant caregiver and stated that removing a child from a stable environment could put the child in a crisis and cause the child to act out, despair or become withdrawn. Based on all of these factors, the expert psychologist concluded that:

> In my opinion, it's in Hunter's best interest to stay with the (foster family), where he has made an adjustment and he has been able to bond and be part of the family, which is extremely important at his age.

The circuit court's order placing Hunter with his grandmother includes a two-page "conclusion" section explaining its rationale for favoring Grandmother Donna over the foster parents. This explanation section does not mention the opinions of the expert psychologist or Hunter's guardian ad litem. Instead, the circuit court sets forth the following factors it relied upon in concluding that Hunter should be placed with his grandmother: (1) the DHHR's recommendation that Hunter be placed with Grandmother Donna; (2) the strong bond Grandmother Donna developed with Hunter through supervised visitation; (3) Dr. Fremouw's report stating that Grandmother Donna was a loving grandmother who was not a risk to commit neglectful behavior; (4) a successful home study approving Grandmother Donna's residence; and (5) the grandparent preference found in W.Va. Code § 49-3-1(a)(3) [2001].

A review of the entire evidentiary record reveals that the circuit court's "conclusion" omits many salient facts. For instance, the circuit court states that Hunter developed a "strong bond" with Grandmother Donna through the course of supervised visitations during the three years he lived with his foster family. The circuit court fails to mention the strong bond that Hunter developed with his foster family, fails to mention that Hunter referred to his foster parents as "mom" and "dad," and fails to mention that Hunter lived with his foster family for three years. While the circuit court correctly noted that Dr. Fremouw considered Grandmother Donna to be a loving grandmother who was not a risk to commit neglectful behavior, the court's conclusion omits Dr. Fremouw's finding that Grandmother Donna had no strategy for disciplining the child and that she had a "tendency to deny or avoid common problems." Grandmother Donna did have an approved home study, but that fact alone does not dictate what is in the best interests of this child according to Hunter's guardian ad litem. Grandmother Donna divorced Frank B. whose use of drugs and violent behavior were largely responsible for the earlier failed home study, but this Court has serious concern about taking a child from a stable environment, one where he bonded with his foster family for three years, and returning him to an environment where drug use and violent behavior occurred in the recent past.

When considering all of the equities in this case, including the grandparent preference found in W.Va. Code § 49-3-1(a)(3) [2001], we hold that it is in Hunter's best interests to be permanently placed with his foster parents. This Court has previously stated that "stability in a child's life is a major concern when formulating custody arrangements." Snyder v. Scheerer, 190 W.Va. 64, 72-73, 436 S.E.2d 299, 307-08 (1993). There is no dispute that the foster family created a stable, loving environment in which Hunter was growing and thriving. Hunter was placed with his foster family when he was 17 months old and lived with them for three years. He was part of their family and both his guardian ad litem and the only expert witness who testified before the circuit court agreed that it was in his best interests to remain with this family. Even the DHHR, which recommended that he be placed with his grandmother, concluded that Hunter was "well adjusted, growing and thriving," while he was living with his foster family. Based on all of these factors, we find that the circuit court's order placing Hunter with his grandmother was clearly erroneous because it elevated the grandparent preference over the best interests of this child.

Finally, we note that the manner in which the circuit court transferred custody of Hunter from his foster family to his grandmother was inconsistent with our case law. The circuit court's August 5, 2010, order stated that Hunter should be "immediately" placed with his maternal grandmother. After living with his foster family for three years, Hunter was transferred to his grandmother on August 13, 2010, a mere eight days after the entry of the circuit court's order. In Kristopher O. v. Mazzone, 227 W.Va. 184, 706 S.E.2d 381, 391 (2011), this Court stated that "it has been long understood that the law governing child custody directs that a child's best interests are best served by a gradual transition to a new home." In Syllabus Point 3 of James M. v. Maynard, 185 W.Va. 648, 408 S.E.2d 400 (1991), this Court explained the rationale behind the gradual transition policy:

> It is a traumatic experience for children to undergo sudden and dramatic changes in their permanent custodians. Lower courts in cases such as these should provide, whenever possible, for a gradual transition period, especially where young children are involved. Further, such gradual transition periods should be developed in a manner intended to foster the > emotional adjustment of the children to this change and to maintain as much stability as possible in their lives.[8]

Upon remand, the circuit court shall set a hearing forthwith, bringing all the parties and their counsel together for a full hearing on the most effective means of gradually transitioning Hunter from Grandmother Donna to his foster family. The circuit court may also consider setting up a visitation schedule for Grandmother Donna during this hearing. We have previously held that "(a) child has a right to continued association with individuals with whom he has formed a close emotional bond . . . provided that a determination is made that such continued contact is in the best interests of the child." Syllabus Point 11, In re Jonathon G., 198 W.Va. 716, 482 S.E.2d 893 (1996). It is imperative for all of the parties involved to work together for the ultimate goal: providing Hunter with a stable, loving environment.

[8]This gradual transition policy has been reiterated by this Court on a number of previous occasions. See In re Maranda T., 223 W.Va. 512, 678 S.E.2d 18 (2009); Napoleon S. v. Walker, 217 W.Va. 254, 617 S.E.2d 801 (2005); In re Desarae M., 214 W.Va. 657, 591 S.E.2d 215 (2003); In re Jade E.G., 212 W.Va. 715, 575 S.E.2d 325 (2002); In re Edward B., 210 W.Va. 621, 558 S.E.2d 620 (2001); In re Brian James D., 209 W.Va. 537, 550 S.E.2d 73 (2001); In re Zachary William R., 203 W.Va. 616, 509 S.E.2d 897 (1998); Matter of Taylor B., 201 W.Va. 60, 491 S.E.2d 607 (1997); In re Jonathan G., 198 W.Va. 716, 482 S.E.2d 893 (1996); *State ex rel. IV.
Conclusion

The circuit court's orders of August 5, 2010, and August 12, 2010, placing custody of Hunter H. with his grandmother are hereby reversed and this case is remanded for entry of an order gradually transitioning Hunter from his grandmother to his foster family.

Reversed and remanded.

JUSTICE WORKMAN concurs, in part, and dissents, in part, and reserves the right to file a separate opinion.

SYLLABUS BY THE COURT

1. The Grandparent Visitation Act, W.Va. Code § 48-10-101 et seq. [2001], is the exclusive means through which a grandparent may seek visitation with a grandchild.

2. The best interests of the child are expressly incorporated into the Grandparent Visitation Act in W.Va. Code §§ 48-10-101, 48-10-501, and 48-10-502 [2001].

3. Pursuant to W.Va. Code § 48-10-902 [2001], the Grandparent Visitation Act automatically vacates a grandparent visitation order after a child is adopted by a non-relative. The Grandparent Visitation Act contains no provision allowing a grandparent to file a post-adoption visitation petition when the child is adopted by a non-relative.

Ketchum, J.:

The Circuit Court of Ohio County has submitted a certified question asking whether a court may order continued visitation to a grandparent when the child is adopted by a non-relative. Our review of this question is controlled by the Grandparent Visitation Act, W.Va. Code § 48-10-101 et seq. [2001]. After thorough review, we conclude that the Grandparent Visitation Act does not provide for continued grandparent visitation after a child is adopted by a non-relative. Accordingly, we answer the certified question in the negative.[1]

I. Factual & Procedural Background

This matter was previously before the Court in In re Hunter H., 227 W.Va. 699, 715 S.E.2d 397 (2011). Hunter[2] was approximately 17 months old at the time an abuse and neglect petition was filed.[3] Both of Hunter's biological parents had their parental rights terminated. Hunter was initially placed with his maternal grandmother, petitioner Donna D.

[1] While this case was pending before the Court, Patrick Morrisey was sworn into office as Attorney General for the State of West Virginia, replacing former Attorney General Darrell V. McGraw, Jr. See W.Va. R. App. P. 41(c).

[2] We adhere to our usual practice in cases involving sensitive facts and do not refer to the parties using their full names. See In re Clifford K., 217 W.Va. 625, 619 S.E.2d 138 (2005). Hunter has been adopted by Joyce and Jerry W., and we will refer to him in this opinion as "Hunter."

[3] Because the facts are extensively set forth in Hunter H., supra, we will provide only a brief summary of that case and our ruling therein.

("grandmother" or "Grandmother Donna"). Hunter was removed from his grandmother's house shortly after this placement due to concerns about Grandmother Donna's then-husband. After being removed from his grandmother's house, Hunter was placed with a foster family, respondents Joyce and Jerry W., where he resided from August 2007 through August 2010. Hunter's guardian ad litem commented on Hunter's time with his foster family, stating that Hunter "was thriving with his foster family, identified his foster parents as 'mom' and 'dad' and identified his foster parents' daughter as 'sis.'" Hunter H., 227 W.Va. at 702, 715 S.E.2d at 400.

After the Department of Health and Human Resources ("DHHR") conducted a successful home study of Grandmother Donna's residence, she petitioned the circuit court for permanent custody of Hunter. In August of 2010, the circuit court ordered that Hunter be removed from his foster family, over their objection, and that he be permanently placed with Grandmother Donna. Joyce and Jerry W. appealed and this Court reversed the circuit court's ruling, finding that the circuit court elevated the grandparent preference contained in W.Va. Code § 49-3-1(a)(3) [2001] over the best interest of the child. The Court ordered that Hunter be transitioned back to Joyce and Jerry W. for permanent placement.

Hunter was returned to Joyce and Jerry W.'s custody on November 1, 2011. Joyce and Jerry W. agreed to let Grandmother Donna have four-hour visits with Hunter twice a month. They also allowed Grandmother Donna to call Hunter on the telephone twice a week. Grandmother Donna was not satisfied with the amount of visitation she was receiving and petitioned the circuit court for additional contact with Hunter. Over Joyce and Jerry W.'s objection, the circuit court entered an order on January 20, 2012, granting Grandmother Donna overnight visitation with Hunter every other weekend.[4]

Joyce and Jerry W. were in the middle of the six-month adoption waiting period when this order was entered.[5] After the entry of this order, the issue arose as to whether a grandmother could continue to receive visitation after a child has been adopted by a non-relative. Grandmother Donna conceded that "[w]ithout question, W.Va. Code § 48-22-703 entitles an adopting parent to unfettered rights as a parent and generally precludes grandparents from exercising visitation pursuant to . . . the Grandparent Visitation Act." She went on to argue, however, that under a best interest of the child analysis, she was entitled to receive post-adoption visitation with Hunter. Joyce and Jerry W. argued that the Legislature plainly contemplated this precise situation in W.Va. Code § 48-10-902 [2001], which states,

> If a child who is subject to a grandparent visitation order under this article is later adopted, the order for grandparent visitation is automatically vacated when the order for adoption is entered, unless the adopting parent is a stepparent, grandparent or other relative of the child.

[4] The order states that "the grandmother shall visit with the child every other weekend" from 10:30 a.m. on Saturday until 3:00 p.m. on Sunday.

[5] Hunter was adopted by Joyce and Jerry W. in August of 2012. The adoption order states that the grandparent visitation that was in place prior to the adoption will continue until this Court resolves the instant certified question.

Joyce and Jerry W. asked the circuit court to apply the statute and deny Grandmother Donna's request for continued visitation. The circuit court thereafter submitted the following certified question to this Court:

> Does a child's right to continued association with individuals with whom he has formed a close emotional bond, i.e. his maternal grandmother, continue post-adoption by non-relatives, provided that a determination is made that such continued association is in the best interests of the child?

The circuit court answered the certified question in the affirmative. This Court accepted the certified question for review.

II. Standard of Review

"The appellate standard of review of questions of law answered and certified by a circuit court is de novo." Syllabus Point 1, Gallapoo v. Wal-Mart Stores, Inc., 197 W.Va. 172, 475 S.E.2d 172 (1996). Following this standard, we proceed to consider the certified question presented.

III. Analysis

The issue before us is whether a court may order continued visitation to a grandparent when a child is adopted by a non-relative. Our resolution of this issue is controlled by the Grandparent Visitation Act set forth in W.Va. Code § 48-10-101 et seq. [2001]. The Grandparent Visitation Act is the exclusive means through which a grandparent may seek visitation. W.Va. Code § 48-10-102 states, "It is the express intent of the Legislature that the provisions for grandparent visitation that are set forth in this article are exclusive." In State ex rel. Brandon L. v. Moats, 209 W.Va. 752, 755, 551 S.E.2d 674, 677 (2001), this Court stated that the "grandparent act, by its own express declaration, is the exclusive statutory scheme for resolving issues of grandparent visitation."

The Legislature expressly incorporated the best interests of the child considerations into the Grandparent Visitation Act. W.Va. Code § 48-10-101 states

> [t]he Legislature finds that circumstances arise where it is appropriate for circuit courts of this state to order that grandparents of minor children may exercise visitation with their grandchildren. The Legislature further finds that in such situations, as in all situations involving children, the best interests of the child or children are the paramount consideration.

Further, W.Va. Code § 48-10-501 provides that "[t]he circuit court shall grant reasonable visitation to a grandparent upon a finding that visitation would be in the best interests of the child and would not substantially interfere with the parent-child relationship." W.Va. Code § 48-10-502 sets forth a list of thirteen factors to be considered in making a determination regarding grandparent visitation. These factors include "[a]ny other factor relevant to the best interests of the child."

Having established that the Grandparent Visitation Act 1) is the exclusive means through which a grandparent can seek visitation and 2) expressly incorporates the best interests of the child, we turn to W.Va. Code § 48-10-902, supra. This statute, entitled

"Effect of adoption of the child," states that a grandparent's visitation rights are automatically vacated when a child is adopted by a non-relative. Importantly, the Grandparent Visitation Act contains no provision allowing a grandparent to file a post-adoption visitation petition when the child is adopted by a non-relative. In the case sub judice, Hunter was adopted by his non-relative foster parents and Grandmother Donna seeks continuing visitation.

This Court addressed the issue of grandparents' ability to seek visitation under W.Va. Code § 48-10-902 in Brandon L., supra. In Brandon L., the Court recognized that W.Va. Code § 48-10-902 allows a paternal grandparent to petition for visitation with a biological grandchild after the child was adopted by a stepparent. The Court recognized that the Legislature drew a distinction between adoptions that occur within the family and those that occur outside of the family,

> [T]he Legislature draws a distinction concerning issues of visitation depending on the type of adoption involved. Section 9(b) [now W.Va. Code § 48-10-902] makes clear that the Legislature both contemplated and approved the continuation of visitation rights following an adoption in those instances where the adoption occurs within the immediate family, as opposed to outside the family. [footnote omitted] In providing that visitation rights which are established preadoption are not to be affected by an adoption that occurs when the adopting parent is a stepparent, grandparent, or other relative of the child, the Legislature was both recognizing the difference between adoptions that occur within and without the immediate family and establishing a preference of continuing established relationships between children and their grandparents in the former instance. Understandably, adoptions that take place outside the immediate family do not permit, nor perhaps should > they, the continuation of visitation rights that were granted pre-adoption.

Brandon L., 209 W.Va. at 757, 551 S.E.2d at 679. (Emphasis added.) The Court in Brandon L. reiterated its finding that the Legislature distinguishes between adoptions that occur inside and outside of the family stating, "Adoptions that take place outside the immediate family are clearly beyond the scope of this opinion as the Legislature has made clear that visitation should not be continued in such instances." Id., 209 at 765 n. 21, 551 S.E.2d 687 n. 21.

This Court again recognized the distinction between adoptions that occur inside and outside of the family in In re Grandparent Visitation of Cathy L. (R.) M. v. Mark Brent R., 217 W.Va. 319, 617 S.E.2d 866 (2005). Like Brandon L., the Court in Cathy L. considered whether biological grandparents should be granted visitation following an adoption that occurred within the family. The Court in Cathy L. discussed W.Va. Code § 48-10-902 and noted that > the Legislature distinguishes between adoptions occurring within the family and those occurring outside the family with respect to the appropriateness of continued visitation between a grandparent and a grandchild who has been adopted.

Id., 217 at 324, 617 S.E.2d at 871. Though the child in Cathy L. was adopted within the family, there was no visitation order in place prior to the adoption. The Court discussed whether a grandparent visitation order had to be in place prior to an adoption occurring within the family for a grandparent to receive continuing visitation under W.Va. Code § 48-10-902. In answering that question, the Court stated

> [w]hile the child in the present case was not subject to a grandparent visitation order prior to her adoption, and therefore the statute does not definitely resolve this issue, the statute does provide guidance regarding the legislative conception regarding the circumstances under which adoption should sever all visitation between adopted children and their biological grandparents.

Id., 217 at 324, 617 S.E.2d at 871. The "legislative conception regarding the circumstances under which adoption should sever all visitation between adopted children and their biological grandparents," referred to by Cathy L., is the situation presently before us – an adoption that occurs outside of the family.

The legislative directive that grandparent visitation should be severed when a child is adopted by a non-relative is consistent with the longstanding law of this state recognizing the ultimate effect of an adoption proceeding: a termination of previous familial relationships and the creation of new familial relationships. In this regard, the Legislature has specifically stated that

> [u]pon the entry of such order of adoption, any person previously entitled to parental rights, any parent or parents by any previous legal adoption, and the lineal or collateral kindred of any such person, parent or parents, except any such person or parent who is the husband or wife of the petitioner for adoption, shall be divested of all legal rights, including the right of inheritance from or through the adopted child under the statutes of descent and distribution of this state, and shall be divested of all obligations in respect to the said adopted child, and the said adopted child shall be free from all legal obligations, including obedience and maintenance, in respect to any such person, parent or parents. From and after the entry of such order of adoption, the adopted child shall be, to all intents and for all purposes, the legitimate issue of the person or persons so > adopting him or her and shall be entitled to all the rights and privileges and subject to all the obligations of a natural child of such adopting parent or parents.

W.Va. Code § 48-22-703(a) [2001].

Additionally, the legislative directive severing grandparent visitation when a child is adopted by a non-relative is consistent with the goal of creating finality in adoption proceedings. "[T]he central aim of adoption is finality, finality in the severance of pre-existing relationships and finality in the creation of new adoptive relationships, which breeds certainty for adopted children and their adoptive parents, alike, in their new adoptive relationship." Cathy L., 217 W.Va. at 328, 617 S.E.2d at 875 (Davis, J., concurring) (citation omitted). See also State ex rel. Smith v. Abbot, 187 W.Va. 261, 266, 418 S.E.2d 575, 580 (1992) ("Finality is of the utmost importance in an adoption.").

Courts outside of our jurisdiction have considered this question and held that grandparent visitation should be severed when a child is adopted by a non-relative. For instance, in In re Adoption of Child by W.P., 163 N.J. 158, 163, 748 A.2d 515, 518 (2000), the New Jersey Supreme Court found an "inherent conflict" between grandparent visitation and adoption, and held that the "overriding public policy" regarding adoptions precluded application of the grandparent visitation statutes in cases of adoption by "nonrelative adoptive parents." The court found that the grandparent visitation statute "must not be applied because court-enforced visitation by biological grandparents would discourage–if not prevent[6]–adoption." 163 N.J. at 173-74, 748 A.2d at 524. Further, "[a]n adoptive family must be given the right to grow and develop as an autonomous family, and must not be tied to the very relationship that put the child in the position of being adopted." 163 N.J. at 175, 748 A.2d at 525.

Similarly, the Wyoming Supreme Court held that paternal grandparents had no right to visitation with a grandchild after the child was adopted by his maternal grandparents. In Hede v. Gilstrap, 107 P.3d 158 (2005), the Wyoming Supreme Court discussed a number of cases in which state courts have considered grandparent visitation rights following a grandchild's adoption.[7] After reviewing these cases, the court found that "the only universal [6] We are also cognizant of the chilling effect that could occur if the Legislature allowed former family members to seek continuing visitation with a child adopted by a non-relative. In the present case, Hunter's grandmother was awarded overnight visitation with him every other weekend. If Hunter's other grandparents or relatives petitioned the circuit court and demonstrated a "close emotional bond" with Hunter, the circuit court would be obliged to award those family members additional visitation based on its affirmative answer to the certified question. Further, if the employer of either of Hunter's adoptive parents transferred their job to another state, they arguably would not be able to move because of the overnight visitation with Grandmother Donna ordered by the circuit court. This restriction could indeed create a chilling effect on potential adoptive parents' willingness to adopt a child in this state.

[7] Cases considered by the court in Hede v. Gilstrap, supra, include the following: Ex parte D.W., 835 So.2d 186, 189–91 (Ala.2002) (statute specifically allows visitation after intrafamily adoption); In re Petition of R.A., 66 P.3d 146, 150–51 (Colo.App.2002) (statutory scheme is constitutional that allows post-adoption grandparent visitation where grandchild's parent has died, but not where parental rights have been terminated); Sowers v. Tsamolias, 262 Kan. 717, 718-19, 941 P.2d 949, 950–51 (1997) (adoption law has priority over grandparent visitation statute so that biological grandparent has no standing to petition for visitation after stranger adoption); Hicks v. Enlow, 764 S.W.2d 68, 71–73 (Ky. 1989) (grandparent visitation rights, by statute, do not extend to any but stepparent adoption); In lesson to be learned from these cases is that both adoption and grandparent visitation are purely statutory creatures and, as such, their limits are to be found within the statutes." 107 P.3d at 166. In concluding that the paternal grandparents did not have the right to continued visitation, the court observed, "[i]ndeed, the statute reveals that the legislature knew how to make an exception to the severing effect of adoption because it did so for stepparent adoptions." Id. at 175. In the present case, W.Va. Code § 48-10-902 reveals that our Legislature also knew how to make an exception to the severing effect of adoption because it did so in cases where a child is adopted by his or her stepparents, grandparents or other relatives. Our Grandparent Visitation Act does not make such an exception when a child is adopted by a non-relative.

Grandmother Donna states that her request for continued visitation should be considered outside of the Grandparent Visitation Act. She argues that this Court should consider the issue solely through the prism of the best interest of the child.[8] This Court has consistently recognized that "the best interests of the child is the polar star by which decisions must be made which affect children." Michael K.T. v. Tina L.T., 182 W.Va. 399, 405, 387 S.E.2d 866, 872 (1989). However, we decline Grandmother Donna's invitation to consider her request for continued visitation with Hunter outside of the Grandparent Visitation Act because the Act, "by its own express declaration, is the exclusive statutory scheme for resolving issues of grandparent visitation." Brandon L., 209 W.Va. at 755, 551 S.E.2d at 677. Furthermore, we need not conduct an independent best interest of the child analysis because the Legislature expressly incorporated this analysis into the Act, stating "the best interests of the child or children are the paramount consideration." W.Va. Code § 48-10-101. After considering the best interests of the child, the Grandparent Visitation Act excludes grandparent visitation with a child who has been adopted by a non-relative.

Interest of A.C., 428 N.W.2d 297, 300 (Iowa 1988) (stepparent adoption is only statutory exception to rule against post-adoption grandparent visitation); and Ramey v. Thomas, 483 So.2d 747, 747 (Fla.App.1986) (adoption statute that terminates legal relationships of natural parents and former relatives does not allow for post-adoption grandparent visitation).

[8] Grandmother Donna's brief states that she is not seeking visitation with Hunter "solely based upon any blood tie. . . . Rather, she seeks continued contact with Hunter based upon the notion that it is in Hunter's best interest that such continued association continue[.]" We note that while Grandmother Donna analogizes her relationship with Hunter to a number of our previous best interest of the child cases, she has cited no statute or case from this (continued...)

Additionally, Grandmother Donna's argument that post-adoption visitation may be ordered solely on a best interest of the child basis is at odds with the United States Supreme Court's ruling in Troxel v. Greenville, 530 U.S. 57 (2000). In Troxel, the Supreme Court examined a Washington state statute providing that any person could petition for visitation with a child at any time, thus allowing a court to order visitation rights for any person when the court found that the visitation served the best interests of the child. The Supreme Court held that this statute violated the substantive due process rights of a mother who objected to the lower court's order permitting the paternal grandparents to exercise visitation rights following the death of the children's father. 530 U.S. at 61. The Court observed that the Washington statute did not accord proper deference to "a parent's decision that visitation would not be in the child's best interest." Id. at 67. "The problem here is not that the Washington Superior Court intervened, but that when it did so, it gave no special weight at all to [the mother's] determination of her daughters' best interests." Id. at 69. This Court discussed Troxel in Cathy L. and found that > Troxel instructs that a judicial determination regarding whether grandparent visitation rights are appropriate may not be premised solely on the best interests of the child analysis. It must also consider and give significant weight to the parents' preference, thus precluding a court from intervening in a fit parent's decision making on a best interests basis.

[9] Cathy L. dealt with a grandparent seeking post-adoption visitation following an adoption that occurred within the family. Cathy L.'s instruction that a court must consider the best interests of the child and give significant weight to the parents' preference, is applicable in cases where a child has been adopted within the family pursuant to W.Va. Code § 48-10-902. In cases where the adoption occurs outside of the family, the Legislature, having incorporated its own best interests of the child analysis into the Grandparent Visitation Act, has determined that visitation should not be continued.

When adoptions occur within the family, the showing a grandparent must make to overcome a fit parent's preference regarding the care and custody of their children is substantial. In Cathy L., this Court reversed a family court's grant of grandparent visitation following an adoption that occurred within the family because "[t]he preference of the parents were not adequately considered by the family court, and proper weight was not given to those preferences." Cathy L., 217 W.Va. at 328, 617 S.E.2d at 875. Similarly, the Supreme Court stated in Troxel that

Based on Troxel, the Grandparent Visitation Act, and this Court's ruling in Cathy L., we find no merit in Grandmother Donna's argument that post-adoption visitation may be granted solely on a best interest of the child basis.[10] We therefore answer the certified question in the negative and hold that the Grandparent Visitation Act, W.Va. Code § 48-10-101 et seq., is the exclusive means through which a grandparent may seek visitation with a grandchild. The best interests of the child are expressly incorporated into the Grandparent Visitation Act in W.Va. Code §§ 48-10-101, 48-10-501, and 48-10-502. Pursuant to W.Va. Code § 48-10-902, the Grandparent Visitation Act automatically vacates > so long as a parent adequately cares for his or her children (i.e. is fit), there will normally be no reason for the State to inject itself into the private realm of the family to further question the ability of that parent to make the best decisions concerning the rearing of that parent's children.

530 U.S. at 68-69.

[10] Our ruling in the instant matter casts no doubt on our previous best interest of the child cases. We simply note that the present case is distinguishable from these prior cases. For instance, in In re Jonathon G., 198 W.Va. 716, 482 S.E.2d 893 (1996), this Court concluded that a child had a right to continued association with his foster parents after being returned to his natural parents, if the contact was in the child's best interest. Jonathon G. did not deal with grandparent visitation rights after a child has been adopted by a non-relative. In In re Christina L., 194 W.Va. 446, 460 S.E.2d 692 (1995), this Court stated that visitation rights may be granted to a parent whose parental rights have been terminated due to abuse or neglect proceedings. Christina L. did not deal with grandparent visitation rights after a child has been adopted by a non-relative. In James M. v. Maynard, 185 W.Va. 648, 408 S.E.2d 400 (1991), this Court stated that circuit courts should consider whether continued association with siblings in other placements following an abuse and neglect proceeding would be in a child's best interest. James M. did not deal with grandparent visitation rights after a child has been adopted by a non-relative.

a grandparent visitation order after a child is adopted by a non-relative. The Grandparent Visitation Act contains no provision allowing a grandparent to file a post-adoption visitation petition when the child is adopted by a non-relative.

Because we answer the certified question in the negative, we hereby vacate the circuit court's January 20, 2012, order granting visitation to Grandmother Donna.

IV. Conclusion

For the reasons explained in the body of this opinion, we answer the certified question in the negative.

SUPREME COURT OF APPEALS
OF WEST VIRGINIA

WORKMAN, Justice, concurring, in part, and dissenting, in part:

I concur with the majority's determination that, under the circumstances of this case, continued visitation between the grandmother and the child was not appropriate. However, I dissent from the majority's reasoning because it shows a complete lack of understanding of our existing body of law concerning the rights of children to continued association.

While the majority gives lip service to the viability of the significant body of law that this Court has developed on a child's right to continued association, it effectively ignores that body of law in the analysis of this case.

It is important to note that the certified question was very direct:

> Does a child's right to continued association with individuals with whom he has formed a close emotional bond, i.e. his maternal grandmother, continue post-adoption by non-relatives, provided that a determination is made that such continued association is in the best interests of the child?

(Emphasis added). Notwithstanding the question posed by the circuit court, the majority simply ignores the question.

I dissent from the majority's absolute reliance on the Grandparent Visitation Act ("the Act"), West Virginia Code §§ 48-10-101 to -1201 (2009). Such slavish reliance solely on the foregoing statutory scheme is done with full abandonment of the well-established law by this Court concerning the child's right to continued association. Succinctly stated, the majority opinion only addresses the rights of grandparents as set forth in the Act and turns a blind eye to the rights of the child–rights that are wholly left unaddressed by Legislature in the provisions of the Act and now by the majority of this Court.

While the majority attempts to factually distinguish the instant case from some of the Court's earlier decisions involving continued association, they ignore an important case wherein the rights of children to continued association first emerged. In Honaker v. Burnside, 182 W. Va. 448, 388 S.E.2d 322 (1989), the natural father was challenging a six-month transition period in connection with the restoration of full custody of his child back to him. The child had been in the custody of her mother with reasonable visitation by the natural father. Id. at 449-50, 388 S.E.2d at 323. The child's mother remarried and the child lived during this marriage with her mother, stepfather and half-brother. The natural father, however, maintained his relationship with his daughter. Id. There was no contention or evidence that the natural father was unfit (or had abandoned his parental rights or responsibilities). Id. But after the child's natural mother was killed in an automobile accident, pursuant to her will, she named the child's stepfather as guardian and the natural father sought custody of his daughter. Id. at 450, 388 S.E.2d at 323-24.

After the court set a six-month transition period, the father filed a petition for writ of mandamus and/or prohibition with this Court seeking immediate custody. This Court determined the natural father had a right to custody of his child, but also considered whether it was in the child's best interests to have a continued relationship with her stepfather and half-brother. The Court stated that > [u]ndoubtedly, . . . [the child's] best interests must be the primary standard by which we determine her rights to continued contact with other significant figures in her life. Clearly, "these interests are interests of the child and not of the parent. Visitation is, to be sure, a benefit to the adult who is granted visitation rights with a child. But it is not the adult's benefit about which the courts are concerned. It is the benefit of the child that is vital." "Visitation is not solely for the benefit of the adult visitor but is aimed at fulfilling what many conceive to be a vital, or at least a wholesome contribution to the child's emotional well being by permitting partial continuation of an earlier established close relationship." Looper v. McManus, 581 P.2d 487, 488 (Okla. Ct. App.1978).

Honaker, 182 W. Va. at 452, 388 S.E.2d at 325 (footnotes omitted). Additionally, the Court stated:

> The best interests of the child concept with regard to visitation emerges from the reality that "[t]he modern child is > considered a person, not a sub-person over whom the parent has an absolute and irrevocable possessory right. The child has rights . . . ." Another concern is "the need for stability in the child's life . . . . [T]ermination of visitation with individuals to whom the child was close would contribute to instability rather than provide stability.["]

Id., 388 S.E.2d at 326 (footnotes omitted). Thus, the Court held that even though the custody of the child should be with the natural parent absent proof of abandonment, misconduct or neglect, "the child may have a right to continued visitation rights with the stepparent or half-sibling." Id. at 449, 388 S.E.2d at 323, Syl. Pt. 2, in part.

Thus, the Court upheld the right of continued association of a child with a step-father (not even a blood relative), even in the face of the very strong parental right of a biological father.

Thereafter, in James M. v. Maynard, 185 W. Va. 648, 408 S.E.2d 400 (1991), the Court held in syllabus point four that > [i]n cases where there is a termination of parental rights, the circuit court should consider whether continued association with siblings in other placements is in the child's best interests, and if such continued association is in such child's best interests, the court should enter an appropriate order to preserve the rights of siblings to continued contact.

Id. at 649, 408 S.E.2d at 401, Syl. Pt. 4. In so holding, the Court acknowledged the important concept that "[t]rends both in social work and the law relating to child placement indicate an increased awareness of children's rights to such continued association with siblings and other meaningful figures." Id. at 658, 408 S.E.2d at 410.

The Court further explained a child's right to continued association in In re Christina L., 194 W. Va. 446, 460 S.E.2d 692 (1995), a case which included not only the right to continued association between siblings, but also a child's right to a continued association with his mother post-termination of the mother's parental rights. We held in Christina L. that

> [w]hen parental rights are terminated due to neglect or abuse, the circuit court may nevertheless in appropriate cases consider whether continued visitation or other contact with the abusing parent is in the best interest of the child. Among other things, the circuit court should consider whether a close emotional bond has been established between parent and child and the child's wishes, if he or she is of appropriate maturity to make such request. The evidence must indicate that such visitation or continued contact would not be detrimental to the child's well being and would be in the child's best interest.

Id. at 448, 460 S.E.2d at 694, Syl. Pt. 5 (emphasis added). Thus, once again in Christina L., like in Honaker, we reemphasized the importance of the visitation working in favor of the child's well-being and best interests, thereby implicitly recognizing that a court has an obligation to facilitate a child's right to human relationship when it is in his best interests.

Another case that is analogous to the instant case was In re Jonathan G., 198 W. Va. 716, 482 S.E.2d 893 (1996). In Jonathan G., the child was ultimately returned to the legal custody of his natural parents after the child had been in the care and custody of foster parents for years. Upon the return of the child to his natural parents, the circuit court determined that it had no basis upon which to order continued association between the foster parents and Jonathon G. Id. at 734, 482 S.E.2d at 911. This Court disagreed with the circuit court and remanded the case for proceedings to consider whether continued association between the child and his foster parents was in the child's best interests. Id. at 736, 482 S.E.2d at 913.

>
> > The guiding principle relied upon by this Court in recommending consideration of continued contact with a child is whether a strong emotional bond exists between the child and an individual such that cessation in contact might be harmful to the child, both in its transitory period of adjusting to a new custodial arrangement and in its long-term emotional development. We find no reason to except individuals, like the Stems, who have had a successful long-term relationship with a foster child and have been found, in fact, to be psychological parents to Jonathan G., from consideration for such continued association.

Id. at 735, 482 S.E.2d at 912. Additionally, we recognized that > while "[t]here is little uniformity in the case law concerning nonparental visitation over the objection of a biological or adoptive parent, . . . some courts have observed a judicial trend toward considering or allowing visitation to nonparents who have a parent-like relationship with the child if visitation would be in the best interest of the child."

Id. (quoting in In re Custody of H.S.H.K., 533 N.W.2d 419, 435 n.37 (Wis.), cert. denied sub nom. Knott v. Holtzman, 516 U.S. 975(1995)) (emphasis added).

Thus, we held in syllabus point eleven of Jonathon G. that "[a] child has a right to continued association with individuals with whom he has formed a close emotional bond, including foster parents, provided that a determination is made that such continued contact is in the best interests of the child." Jonathan G., 198 W. Va. at 720, 482 S.E.2d at 897, Syl. Pt. 11; see also In re Clifford K., 217 W. Va. 625, 646, 619 S.E.2d 138, 159 (2005) ("We would be remiss if we did not also reiterate that '[a] child has rights, too, some of which are of a constitutional magnitude.' Lemley [v. Barr], 176 W. Va. [378] at 386, 343 S.E.2d [101] at 109 [(1986)] (internal quotations and citations omitted). Among these, '[a] child has a right to continued association with individuals with whom he has formed a close emotional bond . . . provided that a determination is made that such continued contact is in the best interests of the child.' Syl. pt. 11, in part, In re Jonathan, 198 W. Va. 716, 482 S.E.2d 893. Accord Snyder v. Scheerer, 190 W. Va. [64] at 72, 436 S.E.2d [299] at 307 [(1993)] (recognizing 'the right of a child to continued association with those individuals to whom the child has formed an attachment'). In this regard, '[t]he length of time that the child has remained with [such individual(s)] is a significant factor to consider in determining this issue.' In re Jonathan, 198 W. Va. at 736 n. 41, 482 S.E.2d at 913 n. 41.").

This Court has clearly held that, even when biological parental rights are involved, a child's right to continued relationship with non-parents can prevail.

Notwithstanding the foregoing precedent set forth by this Court regarding a child's right to continued association with individuals with whom the child has significant, strong emotional bonds, the majority, with its slavish devotion only to the law of the statutes, holds in syllabus points one, two and three as follows:

> The Grandparent Visitation Act, W. Va. Code § 48-10-101 et seq. [2001], is the exclusive means through which a grandparent may seek visitation with a grandchild.
> The best interests of the child are expressly incorporated into the Grandparent Visitation Act in W. Va. Code §§ 48-10-101, 48-10-501, and 48-10-502 [2001].
> Pursuant to W. Va. Code § 48-10-902 [2001], the Grandparent Visitation Act automatically vacates a grandparent visitation order after a child is adopted by a non-relative. The Grandparent Visitation Act contains no provision allowing a grandparent to file a post-adoption visitation petition when the child is adopted by a non-relative.

While there is no question that these three new syllabus points address the rights of the grandparent, the majority's decision is devoid of any significant discussion about the rights of a child.

Finally, while the majority holds in the third new syllabus point that the visitation rights of grandparents are automatically vacated after a child is adopted by a non-relative pursuant to the provisions of West Virginia Code § 48-10-902, neither the majority, nor the Legislature, has addressed the rights of the child. Despite what may happen to the rights of the grandparents in this case, the child, nevertheless, has a continued right to association with individuals with whom the child has strong emotional bonds so long as that continued association is in the child's best interests and is not detrimental to the parent-child relationship.

Let there be no mistake that upholding a child's right to continued association does not always mean always granting the visitation sought. In the instant case, while the guardian ad litem argued that the child desired continued association with his grandmother, the facts did not warrant the circuit court upholding the continued association as in the child's best interests. There was information offered by the guardian ad litem that demonstrated that the grandmother was interfering in a manner that was detrimental to the child's well-being.[1] This was demonstrated by the grandmother insisting on overnight

[1]Visitation in conjunction with continued association with a child is analogous to shared parenting insofar as it necessitates a high degree of cooperation between the parties involved in order to be successful. See generally W. Va. Code §§ 48-9-101 to -604 (2009 & Supp. 2012). Included in this statutory scheme relating to the allocation of custodial responsibility and decision making responsibility of children is certain criteria that focuses upon the level of cooperation necessary to serve the best interests of the child. Specially, West Virginia Code § 48-9-102 (a) provides:

> (a)The primary objective of this article is to serve the child's best interests, by facilitating:
> (1) Stability of the child;
> (2) Parental planning and agreement about the child's custodial visitation despite the child being sick and on medication. There was also information that the grandmother's attorney was demanding that the adoptive parents provide a physician's order showing the diagnosis, as well as the prescription. Further, there was indication that the grandmother was allowing the child to visit the child's biological mother, whose rights had been terminated. This conduct on the grandmother's part not only circumvented the wishes of the parents, but also violated the circuit court's order terminating the biological mother's parental rights. This pattern of behavior obviously indicated a contentious relationship between parents and the grandmother which was not in the child's best interests. Thus, in the analytical framework of the law relative to a child's right to continued

> (3) Continuity of existing parent-child attachments;
> (4) Meaningful contact between a child and each parent;
> (5) Caretaking relationships by adults who love the child, know how to provide for the child's needs, and who place a high priority on doing so;
> (6) Security from exposure to physical or emotional harm; and association the child's best interests must remain the polar star and the grandmother could not prevail.

For the foregoing reasons, I concur with the result reached by the majority insofar as it disallows visitation with the grandparent in this case. I dissent, however, from reasoning used by the majority in reaching its result.

"'"The exercise of discretion by a trial court in awarding custody of a minor child will not be disturbed on appeal unless that discretion has been abused; however, where the trial court's ruling does not reflect a discretionary decision but is based upon an erroneous application of the law and is clearly wrong, the ruling will be reversed on appeal." Per Curiam:

Petitioner Lesa M. ("Petitioner Grandmother") filed a petition with the Circuit Court of Raleigh County requesting that she be appointed guardian of her biological grandchild, I.T.[1] The circuit court denied this petition by order entered on December 3, 2012, finding that Petitioner Grandmother failed to present any evidence that Respondent Vanessa B. ("Respondent Mother") was an unfit mother. Further, the circuit court determined that "there has been no finding of abuse or neglect by the Respondent Mother upon the infant child[.]" The circuit court's ruling was consistent with the testimony of a Child Protective Services ("CPS") worker who stated that Respondent Mother was a fit and proper parent, and with the recommendation of I.T.'s guardian ad litem ("GAL"), who concluded that Respondent Mother should have custody of the child.

On appeal, Petitioner Grandmother raises two assignments of error: (1) the circuit court erred by failing to recognize that Petitioner Grandmother was the

We also note that there is a distinction between the parties' biological and legal relationships. As the circuit court's order states, Petitioner is the biological grandmother and "legal aunt of the infant child." Petitioner Grandmother is also the biological mother and legal sister of Respondent Mother. Respondent Mother was adopted by her maternal grandparents when she was ten months old. FACTUAL AND PROCEDURAL BACKGROUND

I.T. was born on May 13, 2009. Approximately one month later, Respondent Mother and I.T. moved into Petitioner Grandmother's residence. Respondent Mother moved out of Petitioner Grandmother's residence five months later, leaving I.T. in Petitioner Grandmother's care. Respondent Mother testified that she and Petitioner Grandmother agreed that I.T. would remain in Petitioner Grandmother's care temporarily while Respondent Mother got settled in her new apartment. Petitioner Grandmother subsequently refused to return custody of I.T. to Respondent Mother[2] and filed a "Petition For Appointment of Guardian" in the Family Court of Raleigh County on

[2] Respondent Mother stated that she attempted to have Petitioner Grandmother return I.T. to her custody. Because these attempts were unsuccessful, Respondent Mother contacted the Raleigh County Police Department for assistance. After Respondent Mother contacted the police department, Petitioner Grandmother filed a domestic violence petition against Respondent Mother, alleging she had substance abuse issues that would create an unsafe environment for I.T.

November 30, 2010. This petition alleged that Respondent Mother "lived a lifestyle centered around a culture of substance abuse and did not maintain a stable residence[.]"

On December 7, 2010, the family court entered an "Emergency Temporary Order" granting temporary custody of I.T. to Petitioner Grandmother, and ordering that Respondent Mother receive weekly visitation with the child. Further, the family court's order stated that "due to the history of this matter including domestic violence petitions, this matter shall be overlapped and referred to the Raleigh County Circuit Court."[3]

Following a number of delays, the circuit court held hearings on Petitioner Grandmother's guardianship petition on July 13, 2012, and on July 25, 2012.[4] These

[3] The family court order removing the guardianship petition to circuit court incorrectly cites "Rule 47a" of the Rules of Practice and Procedure for Family Court as its basis for removal, rather than Rule 48a(a). In fact, Rule 47(a) provides for the appointment of guardians ad litem in family court cases, while Rule 48a(a) establishes the basis for removing a guardianship petition to circuit court.

[4] Based on the record before us, it is unclear why a hearing was not held within ten days once the family court transferred this case to the circuit court. Rule 48a(a) of the Rules of Practice and Procedure for Family Court states

> (a) Removal by family court to circuit court of infant guardianship cases involving child abuse and neglect.—If a family court learns that the basis, in whole or part, of a petition for infant guardianship brought pursuant to W. Va.Code § 44–10–3, is an allegation of child abuse and neglect as defined in W. Va.Code § 49–1–3, then the family court before whom the guardianship proceeding is pending shall remove the case to the circuit court for hearing. > continue the hearing, subject to an appropriate temporary guardianship order, and remove the case to the circuit court for hearing to be conducted within 10 days, for determination of all issues. At the circuit court hearing, allegations of child abuse and neglect must be proven by clear and convincing evidence. Immediately upon removal, the circuit clerk shall forthwith send the removal notice to the circuit court. Upon receipt of the removal notice, the circuit court shall forthwith cause notice to be served in accordance with W. Va.Code § 44–10–3 and to the Department of Health and Human Resources who shall be served with notice of the petition, including a copy of the petition, and of the final hearing to be conducted before the circuit court. Such notice to the Department of Health and Human Resources shall constitute a report by the family and circuit courts pursuant to W. Va.Code § 49–6A–2.

(Emphasis added).

The parties have not raised the failure to hold a hearing within ten days as error or asked for any relief due to this failure. We emphasize, however, that circuit courts must comply with the requirement to have a hearing within ten days when a family court transfers a case to circuit court pursuant to Rule 48a of the Rules of Practice and Procedure for Family Court. This ten day requirement is a mandatory provision that a circuit court may not ignore due to unjustified procedural delays. This Court has consistently recognized child abuse and neglect cases as high priority. See Syllabus Point 1, in part, In re Carlita B., 185 W.Va. 613, 408 S.E.2d 365, (1991) ("Child abuse and neglect cases must be recognized as being among the highest priority for the courts' attention. Unjustified procedural delays wreak havoc on a child's development, stability and security.").

hearings included testimony from Respondent Mother, Petitioner Grandmother and a CPS worker.

Respondent Mother, addressing the issue of stability, testified that she has been employed at the same job for three years and has lived in the same residence for two years. While she acknowledged past marijuana use, she stated that she was no longer using marijuana and had passed all of her recent drug screens. Additionally, Respondent Mother stated that she has an infant child that she is raising with her boyfriend, and that she lives with this child and her boyfriend in a three bedroom apartment. Respondent Mother acknowledged that she and her boyfriend had experienced problems in the past which prompted her to file two domestic violence petitions against him that she eventually dropped. Respondent Mother testified that her current relationship with her boyfriend was positive and that "we both agreed that if we are having a disagreement, we will both walk out of the room . . . we've come to the understanding that that's not the way you do – that's not the way you handle things."

Lora Bailey, a CPS worker, testified at the July 25, 2012, hearing. The circuit court's order described her testimony as follows:

> [I]n 2010 she investigated allegations that Respondent Mother was abusing her children, and concluded that the allegations of abuse were not substantiated. She also testified that she met with the Respondent Mother and her boyfriend, at their home a few days prior to the July 25, 2012, hearing and that the home was clean and organized, and both parties were friendly, coherent and cooperative.

Further, Ms. Bailey testified that Respondent Mother is a fit and proper parent and that "CPS had no reason to say she (I.T.) should not be" returned to Respondent Mother's custody.

Petitioner Grandmother also testified before the circuit court. She stated that "my daughter [Respondent Mother], I know she's stable now. I can tell just by looking at her." While Petitioner Grandmother no longer had concerns about Respondent Mother's stability, she stated that she was concerned about Respondent Mother's boyfriend, and did not want I.T. to be raised in an abusive environment.

The circuit court appointed a guardian ad litem, J. Mingo Winters, for I.T. on September 10, 2012. The GAL conducted an investigation which included interviews with Petitioner Grandmother and Respondent Mother, as well as home studies of both residences. Following this investigation, the GAL concluded that "the guardianship requested by Lesa M. [Petitioner Grandmother] should be denied and permanent custody of the minor child should be returned to the child's biological mother [Respondent Mother]."

The circuit court entered an order on December 3, 2012, denying Petitioner Grandmother's guardianship petition. The court's order explains that:

> The Court finds that the Petitioner has presented no evidence that supports the assertion that the Respondent Mother is an unfit person to care for the child because of misconduct, neglect, immorality, abandonment or other dereliction of duty. Further, the Petitioner does not allege that the Respondent Mother has waived her right to custody of the child, or has transferred, relinquished or surrendered such custody.

> The Court finds that there has been no finding of abuse or neglect by the Respondent Mother upon the infant child, and there is no evidence that granting the Respondent Mother custody of the child would place the child in imminent danger of harm, or would in any way compromise the child's welfare.

The circuit court concluded that "the best interests of the infant child require that the child be immediately returned to the care and custody of the Respondent Mother, and that the Petitioner's Petition for Appointment of Guardian be denied." Following entry of the circuit court's order denying her petition for guardianship, Petitioner Grandmother filed the present appeal.

This Court has held that with regard to custody decisions, including guardianships:

> "'The exercise of discretion by a trial court in awarding custody of a minor child will not be disturbed on appeal unless that discretion has been abused; however, where the trial court's ruling does not reflect a discretionary decision but is based upon an erroneous application of the law and is clearly wrong, the ruling will be reversed on appeal.' Syllabus point 2, Funkhouser v. Funkhouser, 158 W.Va. 964, 216 S.E.2d 570 (1975), superseded by statute on other grounds as stated in David M. v. Margaret M., 182 W.Va. 57, 385 S.E.2d 912 (1989)." Syl. Pt. 1, In re Abbigail Faye B., 222 W.Va. 466, 665 S.E.2d 300 (2008).

III.

ANALYSIS

Petitioner Grandmother raises two assignments of error: (1) the circuit court erred by failing to recognize that Petitioner Grandmother was the psychological parent of I.T.; and (2) the circuit court erred by issuing its ruling prior to receiving the report of the GAL and prior to receiving the results of a paternity test.

This Court has repeatedly held that "[i]n a contest involving the custody of an infant the welfare of the child is the polar star by which the discretion of the court will be guided." Syllabus Point 1, State ex rel. Cash v. Lively, 155 W.Va. 801, 187 S.E.2d 601 (1972) (internal citation omitted). See also Syllabus Point 3, in part, In re Katie S., 198 W.Va. 79, 479 S.E.2d 589 (1996) ("Although parents have substantial rights that must be protected, the primary goal . . . in all family law matters . . . must be the health and welfare of the children."); Syllabus Point 5, Carter v. Carter, 196 W.Va. 239, 470 S.E.2d 193 (1996) ("In visitation as well as custody matters, we have traditionally held paramount the best interests of the child."). With this background in mind, we proceed to consider Petitioner Grandmother's assignments of error.

A. Psychological Parent

Petitioner Grandmother argues that the circuit court should have granted her petition for guardianship of I.T. because she is the child's psychological parent. Petitioner Grandmother did not raise the psychological parent argument before the circuit court. In fact, the circuit court's order denying the guardianship petition specifically noted that "[t]he Petitioner has not raised the argument that she has taken on the role of psychological parent to the infant child[.]"

The issue before the circuit court was whether Respondent Mother was a fit parent and whether it would be in I.T.'s best interest to be returned to the custody of Respondent Mother.[5] Petitioner Grandmother had the opportunity to raise the

[5] This Court has previously addressed a parent's right to the custody of his/her child:

> In the law concerning custody of minor children, no rule is more firmly established than that the right of a natural parent to the custody of his or her infant child is paramount to that of any other person; it is a fundamental personal liberty protected and guaranteed by the Due Process Clauses of the West Virginia and United States Constitutions.

Syllabus Point 1, In re Willis, 157 W.Va. 225, 207 S.E.2d 129 (1973). Accord Syllabus, Whiteman v. Robinson, 145 W.Va. 685, 116 S.E.2d 691 (1960) ("A parent has the natural right to the custody of his or her infant child, unless the parent is an unfit person because of misconduct, neglect, immorality, abandonment or other dereliction of duty, or has waived such right, or by agreement or otherwise has transferred, relinquished or surrendered such custody, the right of the parent to the custody of his or her infant child will be recognized and enforced by the courts.").

psychological parent issue before the circuit court and declined to do so. Because this issue was not raised in the circuit court, we conclude that it has been waived. "In the exercise of its appellate jurisdiction, this Court will not decide nonjurisdictional questions which were not considered and decided by the court from which the appeal has been taken." Syllabus Point 1, Mowery v. Hitt, 155 W.Va. 103, 181 S.E.2d 334 (1971).

B. GAL Report and Paternity Test

Petitioner Grandmother's second assignment of error is that the circuit court erred by issuing its order denying her guardianship petition prior to receiving the report of the GAL and prior to receiving the results of a paternity test.

The GAL explained that his report was issued after the circuit court ruled on the guardianship petition because of a delay in receiving the results of a paternity test. Through this paternity test, the GAL sought to determine if Respondent Mother's boyfriend was I.T.'s father. After receiving the results of the test showing that her boyfriend was not the biological father, the GAL filed his report with the circuit court. The GAL's report agreed with the circuit court's ruling and concluded that "the guardianship requested by Lesa M. [Petitioner Grandmother] should be denied and permanent custody of the minor child should be returned to the child's biological mother [Respondent Mother]."

Petitioner Grandmother fails to cite any of the findings contained in the GAL's report. Similarly, Petitioner Grandmother does not state how the results of the paternity test support her guardianship petition. Instead, Petitioner Grandmother's brief to this Court makes the general, conclusory argument that "the ruling on the guardianship proceeding without benefit of the paternity test results and guardian recommendations . . . was clearly erroneous." We disagree.

The GAL's report agreed with the circuit court's ruling. Assuming, arguendo, that it was error for the circuit court to issue its ruling without the benefit of the GAL report or the results of the paternity test, this error was harmless because the GAL recommended that the guardianship petition be denied. We conclude that Petitioner Grandmother did not suffer any prejudice as a result of the circuit court issuing its ruling prior to receiving the GAL's report or the results of the paternity test.

IV.

CONCLUSION

Based on all of the foregoing, we find that the circuit court did not abuse its discretion by denying Petitioner Grandmother's guardianship position. The circuit court's ruling is supported by the testimony of Respondent Mother, by CPS worker, Lora Bailey, who testified that Respondent Mother is a fit and proper parent, and by the GAL's report recommending that I.T. be placed in Respondent Mother's custody.

The circuit court's December 3, 2012, order denying the guardianship petition is affirmed.

Affirmed.

SYLLABUS BY THE COURT

1. "Although conclusions of law reached by a circuit court are subject to de novo review, when an action, such as an abuse and neglect case, is tried upon the facts without a jury, the circuit court shall make a determination based upon the evidence and shall make findings of fact and conclusions of law as to whether such child is abused or neglected. Among other things, the circuit court should consider whether a close emotional bond has been established between parent and child and the child's wishes, if he or she is of appropriate maturity to make such request. The evidence must indicate that such visitation or continued contact would not be detrimental to the child's well being and would be in the child's best interest." Syl. Pt. 5, In re Christina L., 194 W.Va. 446, 460 S.E.2d 692 (1995).

Per Curiam:

This is an appeal by Timothy Lupardus, guardian ad litem, and the Department of Health and Human Resources (hereinafter "Appellants") from an order of the Circuit Court of Wyoming County declining to terminate the parental rights of Alicia T. (hereinafter "mother") to her son, Isaiah A.[1] The Appellants contend that the lower court erred in refusing to terminate the mother's parental rights and failed to correctly apply the applicable statutory standard for a determination regarding termination of parental rights. Based on the arguments of the parties, the record as provided to this Court, and the pertinent authorities, we reverse the ruling of the lower court and remand with directions to enter an order terminating the parental rights of Alicia T. to Isaiah A.

I. Factual and Procedural History

An Abuse and Neglect Petition was filed on September 14, 2006, concerning eleven-month-old Isaiah A.[2] The evidence submitted in support of the Petition indicated that Isaiah's mother was bipolar and had consistently refused medication. She had also extensively used illegal drugs and tested positive for barbiturates, oxyzapan, PCP, and cocaine. She had demonstrated difficulty maintaining emotional control, and Isaiah had been discovered amid a variety of pills on the floor after the mother had taken an accidental overdose. The mother had also been uncooperative with DHHR attempts to provide remedial services.[3]

A preliminary hearing was held on October 2, 2006, and the lower court granted the mother a ninety-day pre-adjudicatory improvement period by order entered December 20, 2006. Evidence presented at that juncture further indicated that the mother had been charged with several crimes, including petit larceny, disorderly conduct,

[2]Isaiah, born on September 23, 2005, was eleven months old at the time the Petition was filed and is now four and one-half years old. The lower court's dispositional order indicated that Isaiah's biological father, Charles A., is deceased.

[3]The lower court's dispositional order provided a chronology of the events leading to the Abuse and Neglect Petition, including the fact that Isaiah had been taken from the mother's custody in January 2006, at the age of four months, due to the mother's admitted ingestion of cocaine and PCP during a Super Bowl party. Isaiah was returned to the mother's custody after she was able to pass a drug test in February 2006. The mother agreed to the provision of in-home services offered at that time. She was not, however, willing to enter a drug treatment program.

obstructing a police officer, and entering without breaking. She had also tried to remove Isaiah from the home of a relative with whom he had been placed.

An adjudicatory hearing was conducted on March 15, 2007, and the mother stipulated that Isaiah had indeed been abused and/or neglected. The lower court granted a ninety-day post-adjudicatory improvement period by order entered April 3, 2007,[4] and stated that a dispositional hearing would be conducted on July 12, 2007.[5]

On May 3, 2007, the mother executed a document purporting to transfer custody of Isaiah to the DHHR for the purpose of being placed for adoption. She later maintained that she did not knowingly and intentionally relinquish her rights to Isaiah.

September 14, 2006	Abuse and Neglect Petition filed
December 20, 2006	Pre-adjudicatory Improvement Period granted
April 3, 2007	Post-adjudicatory Improvement Period granted
August 15, 2007	DHHR filed first Petition for Termination of Parental Rights
October 31, 2007	First Extension of Improvement Period granted.
January 28, 2008	Second Extension of Improvement Period granted
May 5, 2008	Third Extension of Improvement Period granted
July 18, 2008	DHHR filed second Petition for Termination of Parental Rights
December 29, 2008	Final Order Denying Termination of Parental Rights

[5]The mother's older child, Madison, had been removed from the home due to the mother's drug usage, domestic violence, and neglect. The mother's parental rights to Madison were terminated on March 9, 2007, and Madison was adopted by relatives.

Although the mother refused to submit to many of the required drug tests, she did test positive for morphine, benzodiazapines, hydrocodone, oxycodone, oxazepam, and marijuana during drug screenings. The DHHR filed a Petition for Termination of Parental Rights on August 15, 2007.

By order entered October 31, 2007, the first ninety-day extension of the improvement period was granted by the lower court, and the lower court specified that a disposition hearing would be conducted on January 10, 2008. A January 7, 2008, status report submitted to the lower court by DHHR indicated very poor progress on the conditions of the extended improvement period. The mother had failed to cooperate with the in-home services provider[6] and had failed to appear for required drug screenings, despite the offered incentive of being permitted to visit Isaiah if she had three consecutive negative drug screenings. The mother also continued to date a convicted felon, Wendell T.,[7] and departed from a scheduled visit with Isaiah early because Wendell T. had not been permitted to accompany her on the visit. The DHHR reported that "it appeared that [mother] was focused more on Wendell not being in the visit then [sic] visiting with her son."

[6]One of the in-home service providers specifically stated that he could not continue to attempt to provide services to the mother due to her behaviors.

[7]Wendell T. is now deceased.

A second ninety-day extension of the mother's improvement period was granted by order entered January 28, 2008, and the court stated that a dispositional hearing would be conducted on April 10, 2008. The mother thereafter began having weekend visits with Isaiah, but these were discontinued based upon her refusal to appear for drug testing and her failure to cooperate with her in-home service providers. The DHHR submitted a status report dated April 4, 2008, and reported that the mother had become angry when she learned that she needed to appear for drug testing. She had initially agreed to the testing but subsequently refused to attend when a DHHR worker arrived to transport her to the testing location. She later tested positive for Oxymorphine, and her visitation thereafter became supervised.[8]

On April 10, 2008, the mother requested another extension of her post-adjudicatory improvement period. By order entered May 5, 2008, the lower court granted a third ninety-day extension of the improvement period and specified that a dispositional hearing would be conducted on July 10, 2008. The mother again refused a drug screening on May 28, 2008, and also informed Isaiah's foster mother that she was not going to visit Isaiah anymore. On July 14, 2008, the DHHR formally discontinued visits between the mother and Isaiah. She had not visited Isaiah for three months and had been in several recent fights. The mother actually missed fifteen of twenty-eight scheduled visits with Isaiah and refused scheduled parenting instruction based upon her claim that she was already an excellent mother and did not need the services.

[8]The April 4, 2008, status report also indicated that Wendell T. had been removed from the home during a March 19, 2008, domestic dispute at the mother's residence. They were allegedly arguing over the fact that Wendell T. had learned that the mother had engaged in a sexual encounter with another man at a motel. On March 22, 2008, the mother and Wendell T. were arrested after an altercation at a local pool hall.

Another Petition for Termination of Parental Rights was filed by the DHHR on July 18, 2008. In this petition, the DHHR emphasized that Isaiah had been in custody since October 2006, a period of twenty-one months, and had not been returned to his parent or placed for adoption. A thorough chronology was presented in that petition, including the mother's extended pattern of drug abuse; the filth and cat urine odor of the home; the mother's termination of parental rights to Madison; the mother's verbal and physical aggression; her failure to submit to required drug screenings; her positive drug tests; the domestic violence between the mother and her boyfriend; and the various custody arrangements for Isaiah with different family members.

On September 30, 2008, the mother filed a motion for a post-dispositional improvement period, but Judge Hrko denied her motion, and the case proceeded to the dispositional stage. By order entered December 29, 2008, the lower court found that "although the Respondent has shown some signs of progress during her improvement periods, her improvement has been minimal and she has not corrected the conditions of abuse and/or neglect." The lower court also acknowledged that the mother had denied having a drug addiction problem and had refused an in-patient drug program. The mother was tested immediately after the hearing and tested positive for hydocodone, oxycodone, oxazepam, and TCH.

Although the lower court specifically found that "[r]eturn to Respondent's home remains contrary to the best interests of the Child," it declined to terminate the mother's parental rights to Isaiah. The lower court reasoned as follows:

> Although the Respondent has been afforded numerous improvement periods and has shown only minimal progress and has failed to remedy the conditions that required removal of the Child from her home, the Respondent nontheless has not been shown to be so incorrigible as to leave this Court without the firm impression that the Respondent has the capacity to reform, should she so choose.

The lower court stated that "there is a glimmer of hope that the Respondent mother can make diligent efforts to remedy the conditions of abuse and neglect." Thus, the lower court ordered that Isaiah would remain in the custody of the relatives with whom he had been residing and allowed liberal supervised visitation with the mother. The lower court further ordered the guardian ad litem to "continue performing his duties until relieved thereof by further Order of this Court or as otherwise provided for by law." The court stated that if the relatives "cease to be a fit and willing placement," the DHHR should file a report thereof.

The guardian ad litem and DHHR now appeal. They contend that the best interests of Isaiah must guide this inquiry and that Isaiah deserves final and permanent placement in the form of adoption, as sought by the relatives with whom he has resided.

II. Standard of Review

This Court explained in In re Emily, 208 W.Va. 325, 540 S.E.2d 542 (2000), that abuse and neglect proceedings will be evaluated under a "compound standard of review: conclusions of law are subject to a de novo review, while findings of fact are weighed against a clearly erroneous standard." 208 W.Va. at 332, 540 S.E.2d at 549. Syllabus point one of In the Interest of Tiffany Marie S., 196 W.Va. 223, 470 S.E.2d 177 (1996), also provides the following standard of review for cases of this nature:

> Although conclusions of law reached by a circuit court are subject to de novo review, when an action, such as an abuse and neglect case, is tried upon the facts without a jury, the circuit court shall make a determination based upon the evidence and shall make findings of fact and conclusions of law as to whether such child is abused or neglected. These findings shall not be set aside by a reviewing court unless clearly erroneous. A finding is clearly erroneous when, although there is evidence to support the finding, the reviewing court on the entire evidence is left with the definite and firm conviction that a mistake has been committed. However, a reviewing court may not overturn a finding simply because it would have decided the case differently, and it must affirm a finding if the circuit court's account of the evidence is plausible in light of the record viewed in its entirety.

Furthermore, syllabus point one of McCormick v. Allstate Ins. Co., 197 W.Va. 415, 475 S.E.2d 507 (1996), explains the general criterion for appeals from the circuit court level, as follows:

> When this Court reviews challenges to the findings and conclusions of the circuit court, a two-prong deferential standard of review is applied. We review the final order and the ultimate disposition under an abuse of discretion standard, and we review the circuit court's underlying factual findings under a clearly erroneous standard.

Utilizing these standards as guidance, we address the contentions of the parties in this matter.

III. Discussion

The guardian ad litem and DHHR maintain that the lower court erroneously failed to terminate the mother's parental rights, based upon the evidence presented and the specific factual findings made by the lower court. Further, they contend that the trial court improperly utilized the statutory standards governing the decision regarding termination of parental rights. In response, the mother argues that her dependence upon drugs and the consequences of that addiction must be considered as mitigating factors. She essentially contends that she did not receive the level of assistance that would have been required to permit her to overcome her addiction and remedy her insufficiencies as a parent. She also alleges that she possesses the potential for improvement.

This Court has consistently articulated and adhered to the statutorily-mandated standard for the termination of parental rights. West Virginia Code § 49-6-5(a)(6) (2006) (Repl. Vol. 2009) provides that parental rights may be terminated "[u]pon a finding that there is no reasonable likelihood that the conditions of neglect or abuse can be substantially corrected in the near future and, when necessary for the welfare of the child. . . ." West Virginia Code § 49-6-5(b) supplies the definition of "no reasonable likelihood that conditions of neglect or abuse can be substantially corrected," the complete text of which provides follows:

> As used in this section, "no reasonable likelihood that conditions of neglect or abuse can be substantially corrected" shall mean that, based upon the evidence before the court, the abusing adult or adults have demonstrated an inadequate capacity to solve the problems of abuse or neglect on their own or with help. Such conditions shall be considered to exist in the following circumstances, which shall not be exclusive:
>
> > (1) The abusing parent or parents have habitually abused or are addicted to alcohol, controlled substances or drugs, to the extent that proper parenting skills have been seriously impaired and such person or persons have not responded to or followed through the recommended and appropriate treatment which could have improved the capacity for adequate parental functioning;

West Virginia Code § 49-6-5(b) (emphasis supplied).

In determining the appropriate disposition of an abuse and neglect proceeding based upon the foregoing statutory guidance, "the best interests of the child is the polar star by which decisions must be made which affect children." Michael K.T. v. Tina L.T., 182 W.Va. 399, 405, 387 S.E.2d 866, 872 (1989) (citation omitted). This Court has invariably implemented the principle that "[a]lthough parents have substantial rights that must be protected, the primary goal in cases involving abuse and neglect, as in all family law matters, must be the health and welfare of the children." Syl. Pt. 3, In re Katie S., 198 W.Va. 79, 479 S.E.2d 589 (1996).

Moreover, the precedent of this Court supports the proposition that children are entitled to permanency to the greatest degree possible. See In re Jonathan G., 198 W.Va. 716, 482 S.E.2d 893 (1996); State ex rel. Amy M. v. Kaufman, 196 W.Va. 251, 470 S.E.2d 205 (1996); In re Brian D., 194 W.Va. 623, 461 S.E.2d 129 (1995); In re Lindsey C., 196 W.Va. 395, 473 S.E.2d 110 (1995) (Workman, J., dissenting). Consistent with that goal, this Court explained as follows in pertinent part of syllabus point one of In the Interest of Carlita B., 185 W.Va. 613, 408 S.E.2d 365 (1991): "Child abuse and neglect cases must be recognized as being among the highest priority for the courts' attention. Unjustified procedural delays wreak havoc on a child's development, stability and security."

In constructing the optimal resolution of a particular abuse and neglect case, this Court has explained that "'courts are not required to exhaust every speculative possibility of parental improvement before terminating parental rights where it appears that the welfare of the child will be seriously threatened. . . .' Syl. Pt. 1, in part, In re R.J.M., 164 W.Va. 496, 266 S.E.2d 114 (1980)." Syl. Pt. 7, in part, Carlita B., 185 W.Va. at 616, 408 S.E.2d at 368. Indeed, termination of parental rights may be employed without intervening alternatives where there is no reasonable likelihood of correction of the conditions constituting abuse and neglect. Syllabus point one of In re Jeffrey R.L., 190 W.Va. 24, 435 S.E.2d 162 (1993), explains this point succinctly, as follows:

> "'Termination of parental rights, the most drastic remedy under the statutory provision covering the disposition of neglected children, W. Va. Code, 49-6-5 [1977] may be employed without the use of intervening less restrictive alternatives when it is found that there is no reasonable likelihood under W. Va. Code, 49-6-5(b) [1977] that conditions of neglect or abuse can be substantially corrected.' Syllabus Point 2, In re R.J.M., 164 W.Va. 496, 266 S.E.2d 114 (1980)." Syllabus point 4, In re Jonathan P., 182 W.Va. 302, 387 S.E.2d 537 (1989)."

With regard to the time frame in which final disposition of abuse and neglect cases should be made, this Court has recognized that "[a]lthough it is sometimes a difficult task, the trial court must accept the fact that the statutory limits on improvement periods (as well as our case law limiting the right to improvement periods) dictate that there comes a time for decision, because a child deserves resolution and permanency in his or her life. . .

." Amy M., 196 W.Va. at 260, 470 S.E.2d at 214. Indeed, improvement periods are "regulated, both in their allowance and in their duration, by the West Virginia Legislature, which has assumed the responsibility of implementing guidelines for child abuse and neglect proceedings generally." In re Emily, 208 W.Va. at 334-35, 540 S.E.2d at 551-52.

West Virginia Code § 49-6-12(a) (1996) (Repl. Vol. 2009) provides that a pre-adjudicatory improvement period "not to exceed three months" may be granted in cases of child neglect or abuse. Section (b) of that statute permits a post-adjudicatory improvement period "not to exceed six months" if, among other requirements, the respondent demonstrates by clear and convincing evidence that he or she is likely to "fully participate in the improvement period"[9] and if the respondent "demonstrates that since the initial

> (4) Since the initiation of the proceeding, the respondent has not previously been granted any improvement period or the respondent demonstrates that since the initial improvement period, the respondent has experienced a substantial change in circumstances. >
> (5) The order granting the improvement period requires the department to prepare and submit to the court an individualized family case plan in accordance with the provisions of section three [49-6D-3], article six-d of this chapter.

An extension of an improvement period, as granted thrice in the present case, is permitted by West Virginia Code 49-6-12(g) for periods not to exceed three months under the following conditions:

> when the court finds that the respondent has substantially complied with the terms of the improvement period; that the continuation of the improvement period will not substantially impair the ability of the department to permanently place the child; and that such extension is otherwise consistent with the best interest of the child.

See also Syl. Pt. 2, In re Jamie Nicole H., 205 W.Va. 176, 517 S.E.2d 41 (1999) ("Pursuant to West Virginia Code § 49-6-12(g) (1998), before a circuit court can grant an extension of a post-adjudicatory improvement period, the court must first find that the respondent has substantially complied with the terms of the improvement period; that the continuation of the improvement period would not substantially impair the ability of the Department of Health and Human Resources to permanently place the child; and that such extension is otherwise consistent with the best interest of the child.").

This Court has explained that "an improvement period in the context of abuse and neglect proceedings is viewed as an opportunity for the miscreant parent to modify his/her behavior so as to correct the conditions of abuse and/or neglect with which he/she has been charged." In re Emily, 208 W.Va. at 334, 540 S.E.2d at 551. Thus, in the recent case of In re Kaitlyn P., ___ W.Va. ___, 690 S.E.2d 131 (2010), this Court examined the evidence indicative of potential participation and found that the parents had failed to present adequate evidence that they were likely to fully participate in the improvement period, as required where a post-adjudicatory improvement period is requested.

In the present case, the lower court permitted the mother ample opportunity to avail herself of the services provided and to correct the conditions of abuse and/or neglect existing at the time the original petition was filed. The lower court provided the mother with a ninety-day pre-adjudicatory improvement period in December 2006, a ninety-day post-adjudicatory improvement period in April 2007, and three ninety-day extensions of the improvement periods in October 2007, January 2008, and May 2008. Thus, in the judgment of this Court, the lower court was far more lenient in the granting of extensions than was warranted by the circumstances existing in this case and the absence of improvement demonstrated by the mother. This mother was provided with abundant opportunity to rectify the conditions of abuse and neglect. She failed to do so, and yet the lower court continued to extend the improvement periods. As this Court observed in Amy M., "prohibition is available to abused and/or neglected children to restrain courts from granting improvement periods of a greater extent and duration than permitted" by statute. 196 W.Va. at 258, 470 S.E.2d at 212. While this Court has recognized that a lower court's discretion includes considerable flexibility in fashioning the appropriate relief in these cases, this Court has also declared that "there comes a time for decision." Id. at 260, 470 S.E.2d at 214.

When the lower court did eventually deny another request for an improvement period, it made factual findings in its final December 29, 2008, order and specifically stated that the mother had "shown only minimal progress and . . . failed to remedy the conditions that required removal" of Isaiah. In determining the ultimate disposition of this case, however, the lower court stated that it did "not find at this time that there is no reasonable likelihood that the conditions of neglect or abuse can be substantially corrected in the near future." The lower court continued by stating that "there is a glimmer of hope that the Respondent mother can make diligent efforts to remedy the conditions of abuse and neglect."

We find no error in the lower court's factual findings. However, the lower court's application of law to the incontrovertible facts is erroneous, and its ultimate conclusion to allow Isaiah to remain in temporary foster care placement without termination of parental rights is an abuse of discretion. The determinitive standard, as provided and defined by statute and quoted above, is whether there is "no reasonable likelihood that the conditions of neglect or abuse can be substantially corrected in the near future." W.Va. Code § 49-6-5(a)(6). The lower court's utilization of a standard such as whether there is a "glimmer of hope" that the mother can make a diligent effort to remedy the situation is inconsistent with the criteria expressly provided by statute.

Applying the proper legal standard to the facts as determined by the lower court, this Court has evaluated the behavior of the mother over the twenty-six month period between the September 14, 2006, filing of the Abuse and Neglect Petition to the December 29, 2008, final order currently on appeal. We find that the facts as revealed in the record do not demonstrate any likelihood that the conditions of neglect or abuse can be substantially corrected in the near future. The lower court provided extensive opportunity for remediation of the existing deficits. Improvement periods were granted and extended, in-home assistance was provided, and the mother consistently failed to cooperate with the service providers and the conditions of the improvement periods. Based upon the factual record, the best interests of the child, and the child's right to eventual permanency, this Court reverses the lower court's conclusion that the mother's parental rights should not be terminated.[10]

[10]This Court has previously explained the potential for post-termination visitation, as follows in syllabus point five of In re Christina L., 194 W.Va. 446, 460 S.E.2d 692 (1995):

> When parental rights are terminated due to neglect or abuse, the circuit court may nevertheless in appropriate cases consider whether continued visitation or other contact with the abusing parent is in the best interest of the child. Among other things, the circuit court should consider whether a close emotional bond has been established between parent and child and the child's wishes, if he or she is of appropriate maturity to make such request. The evidence must indicate that such visitation or continued contact would not be detrimental to the child's well being and would be in the child's best interest.

Based upon this Court's review of this matter and the argument of the parties to this action, we find that an order addressing post-termination visitation is not warranted in this case.

IV. Conclusion

Accordingly, for the reasons set forth above, the order of the Circuit Court of Wyoming County is reversed to the extent that it failed to terminate the parental rights of Alicia T. to Isaiah A. This case is remanded to the lower court for entry of an order terminating the parental rights of Alicia T. to Isaiah A. The mandate of this Court shall issue contemporaneously herewith.

Reversed and remanded with directions.

Supreme Court Of Appeals Of West Virginia

STATE OF WEST VIRGINIA EX REL.
ISOBELLE DONNIE ROSS ISFERDING, Petitioner

v.

HONORABLE HERMAN G. CANADY, JR.,
JUDGE OF THE CIRCUIT COURT OF KANAWHA COUNTY, AND GEORGE ALLEN ROSS, Respondents

No. 23793
Submitted: January 14, 1997
Filed: February 21, 1997

SYLLABUS BY THE COURT

1. "Where supervised visitation is ordered pursuant to W.Va. Code, 48-2-15(b)(1) [1991], the best interests of a child include determining that the child is safe from the fear of emotional and psychological trauma which he or she may experience. The person(s) appointed to supervise the visitation should have had some prior contact with the child so that the child is sufficiently familiar with and trusting of that person in order for the child to have secure feelings and so that the visitation is not harmful to his or her emotional well being. Such a determination should be incorporated as a finding of the family law master or circuit court." Syl. pt. 3, Mary D. v. Watt, 190 W. Va. 341, 438 S.E.2d 521 (1992).

2. "In determining whether to entertain and issue the writ of prohibition for cases not involving an absence of jurisdiction but only where it is claimed that the lower tribunal exceeded its legitimate powers, this Court will examine five factors: (1) whether the party seeking the writ has no other adequate means, such as direct appeal, to obtain the desired relief; (2) whether the petitioner will be damaged or prejudiced in a way that is not correctable on appeal; (3) whether the lower tribunal's order is clearly erroneous as a matter of law; (4) whether the lower tribunal's order is an oft repeated error or manifests persistent disregard for either procedural or substantive law; and (5) whether the lower tribunal's order raises new and important problems or issues of law of first impression. These factors are general guidelines that serve as a useful starting point for determining whether a discretionary writ of prohibition should issue. Although all five factors need not be satisfied, it is clear that the third factor, the existence of clear error as a matter of law, should be given substantial weight." Syl. pt. 4, State ex rel. Hoover v. Berger, No. 23737, ___ W. Va. ___, ___ S.E.2d ___ (Nov. 15, 1996).

Duane C. Rosenlieb, Jr.
St. Albans, West Virginia

Attorney for the Petitioner

Per Curiam:
This original proceeding was submitted to this Court upon the petition of Isobelle Donnie Ross Isferding asking this Court to prohibit the Honorable Herman G. Canady, Judge of the Circuit Court of Kanawha County, West Virginia, from modifying the terms of the petitioner's visitation rights concerning her two children, which terms had been established during divorce litigation between the petitioner and respondent, George Allen Ross. In particular, the petitioner complains of an order entered on February 8, 1995, in the underlying action of Ross v. Ross (Isferding), Civil Action No. 83-C-2282 (Kanawha County), wherein the respondent judge changed the petitioner's unsupervised visitation with her children to supervised visitation and, in addition, directed that any visitation session between the petitioner and her children be upon the childrens' express consent.
This Court has before it the petition for a writ of prohibition, the memorandum in support thereof and the order of February 8, 1995. No responses to the petition have been filed. For the reasons stated below, this Court concludes that the question of modification of the petitioner's visitation rights was not properly raised below. Consequently, relief in prohibition is granted, and the respondent judge is directed to enter an order restoring the prior terms of visitation to the petitioner.

During their marriage, the petitioner and respondent George Allen Ross had two children. The first child was born on October 14, 1979, and the second child was born on December 16, 1980. In 1983, however, the petitioner and George Allen Ross were divorced. As the petition before this Court indicates, the petitioner was granted unsupervised visitation with the children every third weekend and for two non-consecutive weeks during the summer. In addition, the petitioner was granted visitation on alternate holiday weekends, and she could visit with the children by telephone each Sunday.

In December 1992, the petitioner instituted a contempt proceeding against respondent George Allen Ross in the Circuit Court of Kanawha County. The petitioner asserted that Ross had denied her visitation with the children. Soon after, a hearing was conducted in the circuit court during which the petitioner submitted evidence concerning the denial of visitation. Ross appeared at the hearing only through counsel, and the matter was continued in order to provide Ross with an opportunity to submit his evidence. Ross failed to appear at a later scheduled hearing, however, and was found in contempt.

According to the petition, Ross then filed a motion with the circuit court to reconsider the finding of contempt, and a hearing upon the motion was conducted on March 18, 1994. Thereafter, on February 8, 1995, the respondent judge entered an order, the import of which modified the terms of the petitioner's visitation rights concerning her children. Specifically, the order provided that the petitioner's visitation rights were to be "on condition that the maternal grandparent, Martina Miller, shall be present during all visits, and upon the additional condition that [the two children] shall first call [the petitioner] in advance and register their willingness to undertake such visitation."

Importantly, although the order of February 8, 1995, indicated that the proceedings before the circuit court were upon the petitioner's motion that George Allen Ross "be held in contempt for denial of visitation," the order primarily concerned a modification of the petitioner's visitation rights. Even so, neither the petitioner nor Ross, as the petition before this Court states, ever filed a motion or petition requesting a modification of visitation. Moreover, as a review of the order of February 8, 1995, suggests, the circuit court made no specific findings concerning the necessity of supervised visitation and made no specific findings concerning the nature of supervised visitation with regard to the requirements of these two children.

In syllabus point 2 of Carter v. Carter, 196 W. Va. 239, 470 S.E.2d 193 (1996), this Court observed:

W.Va. Code, 48-2-15 (1993), grants the circuit court in a divorce proceeding plenary power to order and enforce a noncustodial parent's visitation rights with his or her children. W.Va. Code, 48-2-15(b)(1) (1993), the subsection specifically dealing with visitation, provides, in pertinent part: 'The court may provide for the custody of minor children of the parties, subject to such rights of visitation, both in and out of the residence of the custodial parent or other person or persons having custody, as may be appropriate under the circumstances. In every action where visitation is awarded, the court shall specify a schedule for visitation by the noncustodial parent [.]'

See also syl. pt. 3, Haller v. Haller, No. 23472 , ___ W. Va. ___, ___ S.E.2d ___ (Dec. 19, 1996). Although W. Va. Code, 48-2-15(b)(1) (1993), effective throughout much of the litigation below, has since been amended, the above-quoted provisions of the statute have remained the same.

In some circumstances, visitation should be supervised, "when necessary to protect the best interests of the children." Syl. pt. 3, Carter, supra; syl. pt. 4, Haller, supra. However, a conclusion that visitation should be supervised requires a variety of considerations and the making of specific findings. As this Court held in syllabus point 3 of Mary D. v. Watt, 190 W.Va. 341, 438 S.E.2d 521 (1992):

> Where supervised visitation is ordered pursuant to W.Va. Code, 48-2-15(b)(1) [1991], the best interests of a child include determining that the child is safe from the fear of emotional and psychological trauma which he or she may experience. The person(s) appointed to supervise the visitation should have had some prior contact with the child so that the child is sufficiently familiar with and trusting of that person in order for the child to have secure feelings and so that the visitation is not harmful to his or her emotional well being. Such a determination should be incorporated as a finding of the family law master or circuit court.

See also syl. pt. 3, Alireza D. v. Kim Elaine W., No. 23420, ___ W. Va. ___, ___ S.E.2d ___ (Nov. 18, 1996).

In this proceeding, the order of February 8, 1995, fails to indicate that the above considerations and findings were made. As stated above, the order contains no findings concerning the necessity of supervised visitation and no findings concerning the nature of supervised visitation with regard to the requirements of these two children. Moreover, although that order directed that any visitation session between the petitioner and her children be upon the childrens' express consent, the order further suggests that George Allen Ross may have somewhat alienated the children from visitation with the petitioner. As the order states: "The conduct of the plaintiff/respondent [George Allen Ross] with respect to his duty to encourage visitation, although in many respects wanting, and in violation of duty not to hold the opposite parent to scorn, still appears not to be entirely the fault of plaintiff/respondent [.]" Furthermore, as noted above, although the order indicated that the proceedings before the circuit court were upon the petitioner's motion that George Allen Ross "be held in contempt for denial of visitation," the order primarily concerned a modification of the petitioner's visitation rights. Thus, the order of February 8, 1995, in changing unsupervised visitation to supervised visitation, is quite problematic. See footnote 1

Moreover, a review of the documents before this Court demonstrates that the petitioner is correct in her assertion that neither the petitioner nor George Allen Ross ever filed a motion or petition requesting a modification of visitation. The proceedings before the circuit court, resulting in the order of February 8, 1995, arose solely from the petitioner's request that Ross be held in contempt for denying her visitation with the children. Consequently, the question of modification of the petitioner's visitation rights was not properly raised below. As the petitioner's memorandum in support of the petition for a writ of prohibition makes clear:

> [T]he litigation of the matter below was initiated only by Isferding's filing of a Petition for Contempt on December 2, 1992. Nothing about this Petition related to the issue of altering visitation > privileges, and all of the hearings conducted in this matter were for either Isferding to put on evidence in support of Ross' contempt, or for Ross to purge himself of same.

In Crone v. Crone, 180 W. Va. 184, 375 S.E.2d 816 (1988), this Court held that a former wife's due process rights were violated in failing to afford her notice and hearing prior to modifying her former husband's visitation rights concerning their son. Noting that a court, in considering visitation rights, is charged with giving paramount consideration to the welfare of the child, this Court, in Crone, stated: "[W]e have recognized that noncustodial visitation is an important natural parental right closely related to the issue of custody and meriting the same due process protections." 180 W. Va. at 186, 375 S.E.2d at 818.

Here, the petitioner acknowledges that, pursuant to W. Va. Code, 48-2-15, a circuit court has continuing jurisdiction to modify the terms of orders concerning visitation rights. In the underlying action, however, the modification occurred without proper notice and hearing, and, in this instance, in the absence of any motion or petition requesting a change in the petitioner's visitation rights. The proceeding arose solely upon the issue of contempt for an alleged denial of visitation rights previously established. This Court is of the opinion, therefore, that the petitioner is entitled to relief in prohibition with regard to the February 8, 1995, order.

In the recent case of State ex rel. Hoover v. Berger, No. 23737, ___ W. Va. ___, ___ S.E.2d ___ (Nov. 15, 1996), this Court discussed various circumstances warranting relief in prohibition. Syllabus point 4 of Hoover holds:

> In determining whether to entertain and issue the writ of prohibition for cases not involving an absence of jurisdiction but only where it is claimed that the lower tribunal exceeded its legitimate powers, this Court will examine five factors: (1) whether the party seeking the writ has no other adequate means, such as direct appeal, to obtain the desired relief; (2) whether the petitioner will be damaged or prejudiced in a way that is not correctable on appeal; (3) whether the lower tribunal's order is clearly erroneous as a matter of law; (4) whether the lower tribunal's order is an oft repeated error or manifests persistent disregard for either procedural or substantive law; and (5) whether the lower tribunal's order raises new and important problems or issues of law of first impression. These factors are general guidelines that serve as a useful starting point for determining whether a discretionary writ of prohibition should issue. Although all five factors need not be satisfied, it is clear that the > third factor, the existence of clear error as a matter of law, should be given substantial weight.

See also W. Va. R. App. P. 14; W. Va. Code, 53-1-1 [1931], et seq.; syl. pt. 1, Hinkle v. Black, 164 W. Va. 112, 262 S.E.2d 744 (1979).

The principles thus expressed in Hoover having been met by the petitioner herein, a writ of prohibition is hereby granted prohibiting the respondent judge from modifying the terms of the petitioner's visitation rights concerning her two children in the underlying action of Ross v. Ross (Isferding), Civil Action No. 83-C-2282. Instead, the respondent judge is directed to enter an order restoring the prior terms of visitation to the petitioner.

Writ granted.

Footnote: 1 Should allegations of abuse arise during the course of a proceeding, a circuit court can order measures to protect the child until a full hearing can be had on such allegations.

SYLLABUS BY THE COURT

1. "'Although conclusions of law reached by a circuit court are subject to de novo review, when an action, such as an abuse and neglect case, is tried upon the facts without a jury, the circuit court shall make a determination based upon the evidence and shall make findings of fact and conclusions of law as to whether such child is abused or neglected. These findings shall not be set aside by a reviewing court unless clearly erroneous. A finding is clearly erroneous when, although there is evidence to support the finding, the reviewing court on the entire evidence is left with the definite and firm conviction that a mistake has been committed. However, a reviewing court may not overturn a finding simply because it would have decided the case differently, and it must affirm a finding if the circuit court's account of the evidence is plausible in light of the record viewed in its entirety.' 2. "'When an abuse and neglect petition is brought based solely upon a previous involuntary termination of parental rights to a sibling pursuant to West Virginia Code § 49-6-5b(a)(3) (1998), prior to the lower court's making any disposition regarding the petition, it must allow the development of evidence surrounding the prior involuntary termination(s) and what actions, if any, the parent(s) have taken to remedy the circumstances which led to the prior termination(s).' 3. “‘“‘Termination of parental rights, the most drastic remedy under the statutory provision covering the disposition of neglected children, W.Va. Code, 49-6-5 [1977] may be employed without the use of intervening less restrictive alternatives when it is found that there is no reasonable likelihood under W.Va. Per Curiam:

This case is before this Court upon the appeal of the petitioner, Christina C., from the Circuit Court of Braxton County's January 3, 2013, order terminating her parental rights to her child, J.C.[1] The petitioner asserts that the circuit court erred in concluding that the facts and circumstances that gave rise to the abuse and neglect proceedings could not be substantially corrected in the foreseeable future; in denying her a post-adjudicatory improvement period; and in terminating her parental rights. Based upon the record, the parties' briefs, and the arguments presented, we find no error. Accordingly, we affirm both the denial of an improvement period and the termination of the petitioner's parental and custodial rights to J.C.

I. Factual and Procedural Background

On July 20, 2012, J.C. ("the child"or "J.C.") was born to the petitioner, Christina C. ("the mother"), and her estranged husband,[2] respondent Allen C. ("the father").[3] On July 23, 2012, the respondent, the West Virginia Department of Health and Human

[2]At the time of J.C.'s birth, the parties were separated and remained separated throughout these proceedings. The father testified that although both he and the mother had discussed getting divorced, they "had not come to an agreement."

[3]The termination of the respondent father's parental rights to J.C. was affirmed in a Memorandum Decision issued by this Court on October 1, 2013, in Case No. 13-0393.

Resources ("the Department"), filed a verified Petition to Institute Child Abuse and Neglect Proceedings ("the Petition") in the Circuit Court of Braxton County against the mother and the father. The Petition was based, in part, upon West Virginia Code § 49-6-5b(a)(3) (2009)[4] given the prior involuntary termination of the mother's custodial and parental rights to three other children in 2006.[5] The Petition also alleged that the mother took Suboxone[6] throughout her pregnancy; that she had an extensive history with controlled substances; that the father was aware of her history; and that the mother and the father had a history of domestic violence in the home—the latest incident occurring in March 2012.

On the same day that the Department filed its Petition, the circuit court entered an Initial Order Upon Filing of Petition in which it, inter alia, transferred custody of J.C. to

[4]West Virginia Code § 49-6-5b provides, in pertinent part, as follows:

> (a) Except as provided in subsection (b) of this section, the department shall file or join in a petition or otherwise seek a ruling in any pending proceeding to terminate parental rights:
>
> • • •
> (3) If . . . the parental rights of the parent to a sibling have been terminated involuntarily.

[5]The prior involuntary termination occurred in Webster County, West Virginia. The circuit judge who presided over the instant proceeding in Braxton County was the same judge who presided over the Webster County proceedings initiated in 2005.

[6]While the Department refers to this medication as "suboxin," it is referred to as "Suboxone" in the record, which is the correct name for this medication. Suboxone is used for "maintenance treatment of opioid dependence." Physicians' Desk Reference, p. 2223, 67th Edition (2013). Although the mother testified that she was assured that taking this drug throughout her pregnancy would not affect her baby, we note that this drug "is not indicated for use during pregnancy unless potential benefit justifies potential risk." Id. at p. 2222.

the Department and set the preliminary hearing for July 31, 2012, for the purpose of determining whether conditions existed that required the immediate removal of the child. The Department placed J.C. with foster parents, and he has lived with the same foster parents throughout this proceeding.

The mother waived the preliminary hearing. Thereafter, the circuit court found that due to the prior termination of the mother's parental rights to her three other children, imminent danger existed at the time of the removal of J.C., who was ordered to remain in both the legal and physical custody of the Department.[7] The circuit court set the adjudicatory hearing for August 30, 2012.

During the August 30, 2012, adjudicatory hearing, the mother admitted the allegations in the Department's Petition. She further admitted telling the Department's Child Protective Services ("CPS") worker, Marta Ware, that she was currently prescribed and [7]On September 19, 2013, the guardian ad litem filed a status update with the Court pursuant to Rule 11 of the West Virginia Rules of Appellate Procedure. The guardian reported that J.C. is approximately fourteen months old; that he has remained with the same foster parents since July 23, 2012; that the permanency plan for J.C. remains adoption; and that J.C.'s foster parents seek to adopt him pending the outcome of the instant appeal. The Department also filed a child status update with the Court on September 23, 2013, in which it reported that J.C. has been diagnosed with pulmonary artery stenosis (a narrowing of the arteries which lead from the heart to the lungs); has two holes in his heart; has developed acid reflux; has suffered from chronic ear infections and Respiratory Syncytial Virus (RSV); and has significant developmental delays.

taking Suboxone and that she took it throughout her pregnancy.[8] The mother also admitted that she and the father have a history of domestic violence in the home and that the most recent incident occurred in March 2012, while she was pregnant with J.C. It was after this incident that the parties separated.[9] It is undisputed that the mother's parental rights to three other children were involuntarily terminated by the Circuit Court of Webster County in 2006. The circuit court accepted these admissions, adjudicated the mother as an abusive and neglectful parent, and took her motion for a post-adjudicatory improvement period under advisement. The circuit court awarded the mother weekly, two-hour, supervised visits with J.C. The disposition hearing was scheduled for September 19, 2012.

During the disposition hearing, CPS worker Ware testified since the inception of this proceeding, the mother had been compliant with services and had participated in the supervised visitation. Ms. Ware further testified that while the mother had tested positive for Suboxone at the beginning of the case, her drug screens had been negative since approximately August 8, 2012, although she was not undergoing any substance abuse treatment. When questioned regarding the mother's economic situation, Ms. Ware testified that the mother had no income, that she did not think that she was employed, and that she did not know how the mother sustained her household or where she got money for food. Notwithstanding this testimony, and based solely on the mother's participation in services since the initiation of the instant proceedings, Ms. Ware stated that she would "not object to an improvement period[.]"

The record reflects that the circuit court then questioned CPS worker Ware concerning the prior involuntary termination of the mother's rights to three other children, as follows:

> Q. Ma'am, just how much investigation and review of the Webster County case have you done?
> A. Not a lot, sir. I have no copy of the disposition - -
> Q. Well, don't you think that might be an appropriate thing to do?
> A. Yes.
> Q. Because, I mean, I was the trial judge in that case.
> A. Yes.
> Q. And if you look to my order . . . or at the finding of abuse and neglect, the parties[10] were engaged in domestic violence, excessive corporal punishment; the respondent parents were requiring their children to go out and beg for money because they didn't have money to live on. That's the same condition we have here today. They required their children to rear the other children, and as an aside to that, I suspected at the time, subsequent to this Court's finding, one of the individuals that the daughter was being > required to go beg from was sexually assaulting the daughter, and has been criminally convicted of that, as well as the drug use at the time of the dispositional hearing. So how can you come in here and say that you recommend - - when we have the mother in the same situation, she has no income, we don't know how she's living, and that was the same thing that happened in 2005 in Webster County. How do you do that? I mean, how do you not read that [disposition] order?

(Footnote and emphasis added.).

During the disposition hearing, an effort was also made to determine exactly how the mother supported herself. The mother testified that the rent for her mobile home is paid by "Raleigh County Housing" and, as for utilities and other living expenses, she explained that she relies upon the travel reimbursement checks that she receives for medical appointments. In that regard, she testified:

> A. To be honest, the non-emergency medical transportation . . . . Almost anybody would know that you never put that much in your gas tank. You always make really good profit when you go to doctors, and whenever all that extra came, I just kept the checks and I kept piling them up until it's enough to pay the bills.

> The Court: Non-emergency - - for whom?
>
> A. For me. Like when you draw Medicaid, you get reimbursed for the mileage, going to the doctor's, and I was in the Suboxone program, I got reimbursed for that. I was pregnant, seeing the OB/GYN, I got reimbursed for that.

When asked whether she had any other source of income, the mother responded that she picked up odd jobs, such as sewing and mowing grass.[11]

The mother was also questioned about her use of Suboxone during her pregnancy with J.C. She testified that it was prescribed for her, explaining that given the "past problems that I've had, I tried my best to look at it in a way to keep me from falling, and I figured the Suboxone would be the best route to take throughout pregnancy to make sure that I wouldn't fall." The mother admitted that she failed to undergo drug treatment that was offered to her in the prior termination proceeding. When asked what she had done to remedy her drug addiction in the approximately seven years since the prior termination proceeding was instituted, the mother cited only her participation in the Suboxone program during her pregnancy with J.C.

In addition to the above, the mother testified that since the prior termination proceeding, she had served a penitentiary sentence following her conviction for selling hydrocodone; that she was released from prison in 2008; that she did not use drugs from 2008, through 2011; and that "the only thing that made [her] start taking again was being a [11]The mother also testified that she had filed for a social security disability based on her "history of migraines . . . the problems with her neck, and the neuropathy." The mother also noted that J.C. would receive benefits based upon the father's social security disability.

patient at the Beckley Pain Clinic" in 2011.[12] The mother admitted that she had "pain clinic issues back in 2006" during the prior termination proceeding. She further testified after the institution of the instant proceedings, she ceased taking Suboxone, but added that she had been prescribed Tramadol[13] for "severe pain, severe headaches."

After the testimony concluded at the disposition hearing, the prosecutor stated, as follows:

> Regarding [the mother], I believe the Court knows her history better than anyone here, I suppose, and I'm sure the Court [is] troubled by things that came out during her testimony, including that she was going to a pain clinic in 2011. She had pain issues in the 2006 case in Webster County. She admitted she started using drugs in 2011 when she went to the pain clinic. Then she got on the Suboxone when she became pregnant with her child and all of those are issues that would indicate that until the filing of this petition that probably circumstances haven't changed a whole lot from the 2006 case until now when this petition was filed.

[12]As indicated above, the mother testified that she suffers from migraine headaches, neuropathy, and neck issues from a car accident.

[13]Although the mother testified that Tramadol had been prescribed for her by a physician for pain, this is troubling to the Court given her history of abusing drugs and the apparently highly addictive qualities of Tramadol. See Farmer v. State, No. 02–09–00278–CR, 2011 WL 1601311 *1 (Tex. App. Apr. 8, 2011) ("Tramadol is the generic name for Ultram[.]"), vacated on other grounds, 2011 WL 4072126 (Tex.Crim.App. Sept. 14, 2011); see also Disciplinary Counsel v. Wolf, 853 N.E.2d 1169, 1170 (OH 2006) ("Ultram[] [is] a drug that turned out to have highly addictive qualities. . . . reliance on the drug evolved into serious substance abuse . . . .").

The circuit judge was clearly concerned about the mother having custody of J.C. while continuing to be unemployed. He described it as "the same condition [as before]- - she sent her children out to beg, she was selling drugs . . . I don't know how she's living. I have my suspicions, but from the evidence, I don't know how she's living." The mother's counsel responded that, in fact, the mother's circumstances had changed because, until her separation from the father in March 2012, she received the financial benefits of his income.[14] The circuit court observed, however, that having the father's disability income was not "substantially different from 2005 or 2006. At that time[,] she had children who had a father who had been . . . murdered, and she was drawing benefits, so it wasn't any different." The circuit court further noted that even with those benefits in the prior proceeding, "which she doesn't have now[,] [s]he was sending kids out to beg. She was selling controlled substances . . . And I don't know how she's supporting herself, much less a child. And that is something I have to be concerned about." The circuit court concluded, as follows:

> [the mother] does not have any income at this particular point in time, and I don't know how she's living in regards to that, but she doesn't have any ability to support a child, she engaged in inappropriate conduct because of lack of income in the prior proceedings, and I do not believe that the conditions out of which the prior abuse and neglect arose which resulted in the termination of parental rights have been substantially corrected, therefore the Court finds that it would be in the best interest of the child that the parental rights of the natural mother are hereby terminated.

[14]The father testified that his income consisted of $700 per month in disability payments.

In its January 3, 2013, dispositional order, the circuit court took judicial notice of the mother's prior involuntary termination of parental rights and found that the mother had been "non compliant" with the court-ordered substance abuse treatment in that case; that she engaged in acts of domestic violence with her then husband; that she subjected her children to inappropriate conduct, such as making them beg for money so she could purchase illegal substances; and that she was convicted of selling hydrocodone. With regard to the mother's recent situation, the circuit court further found, inter alia, as follows:

> 3. The respondent mother has shown some improvement but she has had no significant substance abuse counseling. She was attending a pain clinic in 2011.
> 4. Further, the respondent mother has no income and no ability to support the child. This was an issue during her previous case and remains a problem that has not been substantially corrected.

The circuit court ruled that the "mother's parental and custodial rights to the child are hereby permanently terminated as there is no likelihood that the conditions of abuse and neglect has [sic] been or can be substantially corrected in the reasonable future." This appeal followed.

II. Standard of Review

We are asked to review a circuit court's order entered upon a petition for termination of parental rights. Our standard of review in this regard is well established: > neglect case, is tried upon the facts without a jury, the circuit court shall make a determination based upon the evidence and shall make findings of fact and conclusions of law as to whether such child is abused or neglected. These findings shall not be set aside by a reviewing court unless clearly erroneous. A finding is clearly erroneous when, although there is evidence to support the finding, the reviewing court on the entire evidence is left with the definite and firm conviction that a mistake has been committed. However, a reviewing court may not overturn a finding simply because it would have decided the case differently, and it must affirm a finding if the circuit court's account of the evidence is plausible in light of the record viewed in its entirety." Syl. Pt. 1, In Interest of Tiffany Marie S., 196 W.Va. 223, 470 S.E.2d 177 (1996).

Syl. Pt. 1, In re Cecil T., 228 W.Va. 89, 717 S.E.2d 873 (2011). As we explained in State ex rel. Diva P. v. Kaufman, 200 W.Va. 555, 490 S.E.2d 642 (1997), "the above standard of review requires deference by this Court to the findings of a circuit court in a civil abuse and neglect proceeding. The critical nature of unreviewable intangibles justify the deferential approach we accord findings by a circuit court." Id. at 562, 490 S.E.2d at 649. Furthermore, "a circuit court's substantive determinations in abuse and neglect cases on adjudicative and dispositional matters—such as whether neglect or abuse is proven, or whether termination is necessary—is entitled to substantial deference in the appellate context." In re Rebecca K.C., 213 W.Va. 230, 235, 579 S.E.2d 718, 723 (2003) (internal citations omitted). With these standards in mind, the parties' arguments will be considered.

III. Discussion

In the present appeal, the mother asserts that the circuit court's denial of her request for a post-adjudicatory improvement period and its termination of her parental rights are not supported by the evidence. More specifically, she argues that West Virginia Code § 49-6-5(a)(6) (2009 & Supp. 2013) requires a finding that there is no reasonable likelihood that the conditions of abuse or neglect can be substantially corrected in the near future and that none of the "conditions," as set forth in West Virginia Code § 49-6-5(b)(1) through (7), are present in this case.[15] The mother further argues that there was no bar to awarding her an improvement period and that the circuit court erroneously concluded that her circumstances had not changed since the prior termination of her parental rights to her three other children. The mother contends that her incarceration for selling hydrocodone "surely

[15]West Virginia Code § 49-6-5(b) (2009) provides, in pertinent part, as follows:

> (B) As used in this section, "no reasonable likelihood that conditions of neglect or abuse can be substantially corrected" shall mean that, based upon the evidence before the court, the abusing adult or adults have demonstrated an inadequate capacity to solve the problems of abuse or neglect on their own or with help. Such conditions shall be considered to exist in the following circumstances, which shall not be exclusive:
> (1) The abusing parent or parents have habitually abused or are addicted to alcohol, controlled substances or drugs, to the extent that proper parenting skills have been seriously impaired and such person or persons have not responded to or followed through the recommended and appropriate treatment which could have improved the capacity for adequate parental functioning[.]

would have had some rehabilitative benefits," and that she, contrary to the circuit court's findings, has income through odd jobs, in addition to the mileage reimbursement payments discussed above.[16] Lastly, the mother contends that the circuit court failed to adhere to the evidentiary threshold set forth in In Re: Rebecca K.C., 213 W.Va. 230, 579 S.E.2d 718, wherein the Court stated that "regardless of past events, unless the evidence is clear and convincing to the effect that an improvement period would be pointless, our law requires that one must be ordered." Id. at 235, 579 S.E.2d at 723.

For his part, the guardian ad litem argues in favor of affirming the circuit court's decision to deny a post-adjudicatory improvement period and to terminate the mother's parental rights to J.C. The guardian asserts that the facts, circumstances, and other conditions that gave rise to the prior termination of the mother's parental rights have neither been addressed nor corrected by the mother, thus warranting a termination of her parental rights in the instant proceeding.[17] During oral argument, the guardian stated that J.C.'s placement with his foster parents has been in his best interest.

[17]While the guardian ad litem's position has remained constant in this matter, the Department's position has vacillated. During the disposition hearing, the Department had no objection to the mother being awarded an improvement period given her participation and sobriety during the pendency of the case which, at that time, was less than two months. In its one and a half page summary response filed with this Court in lieu of an appellate brief, the Department stated that while it did not object to the mother's request for an improvement period, it was now concerned about J.C.'s permanency. Then, in the Department's status update filed during the pendency of this appeal, it states that J.C.'s adoption by his foster parents is now in his best interest because he is a medically fragile, fourteen-month-old child who has lived with his foster parents since he was three days old.

Syl. Pt. 4, In re George Glen B., Jr., 207 W.Va. 346, 532 S.E.2d 64 (2000). Importantly, when there has been a prior termination of parental rights, the Department is not required to make reasonable efforts to preserve the family:

> (7) For purposes of the court’s consideration of the disposition custody of a child pursuant to the provisions of this subsection, the department is not required to make reasonable efforts to preserve the family if the court determines:
>
> (A) The parent has subjected the child, another child of the parent . . . to aggravated circumstances which include, but are not limited to, abandonment, torture, chronic abuse and sexual abuse;
> ••••
> (C) The parental rights of the parent to another child have been terminated involuntarily.

W. Va. Code § 49-6-5(a)(7)(A) & (C) (emphasis added).

Here, the evidence surrounding the prior involuntary termination was developed through the adjudicatory and dispositional hearings held before the circuit court.[18]

[18]As previously discussed, the record reveals that the Department was woefully unprepared to address the circumstances that led to the prior involuntary termination of the mother’s parental rights to her three other children, even though the prior termination was one of the primary bases for the Department instituting the current proceeding. Simply stated, it was imperative that the Department thoroughly review the circumstances of the prior proceeding so that it could make a reasoned and informed recommendation in the current matter. Regrettably, it did not.

The mother argues that her prior involuntary termination does not mean that she does not have the right to prove herself in an improvement period. However, the decision as to whether to award an improvement period is discretionary with the lower court "based upon all of the evidence, including evidence from any prior abuse and neglect cases[.]" In re Rebecca K.C., at 235, 579 S.E.2d at 723 (emphasis added). Indeed, the Legislature has expressly stated that improvement periods are not mandatory and are granted at the circuit court's discretion. W.Va. Code § 49-6-12 (2009 & Supp. 2013). Furthermore, as we explained in State ex rel. Virginia M. v. Virgil Eugene S. II, 197 W.Va. 456, 475 S.E.2d 548 (1996):

> West Virginia Code § 49-6-12 (1996) . . . now requires a parent seeking an improvement period in cases of neglect or abuse to file a written motion requesting it, and to demonstrate by clear and convincing evidence that he or she is likely to fully participate in the improvement period. Thus rather than presuming the entitlement of a parent to an improvement period . . . the law now places on the parent the burden of proof regarding whether an improvement period is appropriate.

Id. at 461 n.9, 475 S.E.2d at 553 n.9 (emphasis added). Here, the mother's request for an improvement period fails in two ways. First, although she indicates in her appellate brief that she "moved" for an improvement period at the adjudicatory hearing, she does not state nor does the record reflect that she filed a written motion for an improvement period as required by West Virginia Code § 49-6-12. Second, she failed in her burden of proof. After holding two evidentiary hearings, the circuit court found that the conditions out of which the prior abuse and neglect arose have not been substantially corrected by the mother. The circuit court specifically expressed concern regarding the mother's continued lack of income. As discussed above, the circuit court noted that in the prior termination proceeding, the mother's lack of income resulted in her requiring her children to beg for money, which, in turn, led to the sexual assault of her daughter. Further, the circuit court was not convinced that the mother's abuse of drugs had been resolved. See In re Faith C., 226 W.Va. 188, 195, 699 S.E.2d 730, 737 (2010) (quoting, in part, In Interest of Tiffany Marie S., 196 W.Va. 223, 470 S.E.2d 177 (1996) (we have previously stated that "due regard shall be given to the opportunity of the trial court to judge the credibility of witnesses."). The circuit court was appropriately concerned given the mother's admission that she started "taking again" after going to a pain clinic in 2011, particularly when she had pain clinic issues in the prior termination proceeding. Moreover, although Suboxone was prescribed for her to take during her pregnancy with J.C., the very fact that she was prescribed this medication demonstrates that she had not resolved her drug issues since the prior termination proceeding.[19]

The circuit court recognized the mother's clean drug screens and compliance with the Department's services in the weeks leading up to the dispositional hearing when it stated in its disposition order that the mother had "shown some improvement[.]" However, the circuit court also correctly concluded that the mother was "non compliant" with the court-ordered substance abuse treatment in the prior termination proceeding and, that in the years since the prior termination, not only had she failed to undergo any "significant substance abuse counseling[,]" she had been convicted of selling hydrocodone and began attending a pain clinic in 2011. Under these circumstances, a few weeks of clean drug screens and compliance with the Department's services fail to sustain the mother's burden of proving by clear and convincing evidence that she was entitled to a post-adjudicatory improvement period. Accordingly, we conclude that the circuit court acted within its discretion in denying an improvement period in this matter.

Similarly, we also agree with the circuit court's conclusion that the mother's failure to substantially resolve the problems that led to the prior involuntary termination of parental rights warrant a termination of her parental rights in the present proceeding. As we have previously explained,

> "'Termination of parental rights, the most drastic remedy under the statutory provision covering the disposition of neglected children, W.Va. Code, 49-6-5 [1977] may be employed without the use of intervening less restrictive alternatives when it is found that there is no reasonable likelihood under W.Va. Syl. Pt. 6, In re Isaiah A., 228 W.Va. 176, 718 S.E.2d 775 (2010). Here, the circuit court found that there is no likelihood that the conditions of abuse and neglect have been or can be "substantially corrected in the reasonable future." Based on this Court's review of the record, which demonstrates that the mother has failed to resolve these conditions in the several years since the prior involuntary termination, we agree.

We have held that "'courts are not required to exhaust every speculative possibility of parental improvement . . . where it appears that the welfare of the child will be seriously threatened . . . .' Syl. Pt. 1, in part, In re R.J.M., 164 W.Va. 496, 266 S.E.2d 114 (1980)." Syl. Pt. 4, in part, In re Cecil T., 228 W.Va. 89, 717 S.E.2d 873 (2011). In this case, the mother had approximately seven years to resolve the problems that led to the prior involuntary termination of her parental rights and she clearly failed to do so. Instead, she continued to engage in domestic violence; continued to have drug problems, including a drug-related incarceration; continued to fail to participate in any significant substance abuse counseling; and continued to have no regular income.[20] Moreover, this evidence must be examined under a reduced minimum threshold given the mother's prior involuntary termination. See Syl. Pt. 3, In re George Glen B., Jr., 207 W.Va. 346, 532 S.E.2d 64.

On appeal, this Court "must affirm a finding if the circuit court's account of the evidence is plausible in light of the record viewed in its entirety." Syl. Pt. 1, In re Cecil T., 228 W.Va. 89, 717 S.E.2d 873. Given the substantial deference owed the circuit court's decision,[21] as well as our examination of the evidence under a lower minimum threshold, and being guided by the polar star of the child's welfare,[22] we find no error in the circuit court's termination of the mother's parental rights to J.C.

IV. Conclusion

For the foregoing reasons, we find no error in either the Circuit Court of Braxton County's denial of the mother's request for a post-adjudicatory improvement period or in its termination of the mother's parental rights to her child, J.C. Accordingly, the circuit court's order entered January 3, 2013, is hereby affirmed.

CHIEF JUSTICE DAVIS delivered the Opinion of the Court.

SYLLABUS BY THE COURT

1. "The jurisdiction of family courts is limited to only those matters specifically authorized by the Legislature, while circuit courts have original and general jurisdiction and other powers as set forth in Article VIII, § 6 of the Constitution of West Virginia." Syllabus point 5, in part, Lindsie D.L. v. Richard W.S., 214 W. Va. 750, 591 S.E.2d 308 (2003).

2. "A circuit court has jurisdiction to entertain an abuse and neglect petition and to conduct proceedings in accordance therewith as provided by W. Va. Code § 49-6-1, et seq." Syllabus point 3, State ex rel. Paul B. v. Hill, 201 W. Va. 248, 496 S.E.2d 198 (1997).

3. "When a child is the subject of an abuse or neglect or other proceeding in a circuit court pursuant to Chapter 49 of the West Virginia Code, the circuit court, and not the family court, has jurisdiction to establish a child support obligation for that child." Syllabus point 3, West Virginia Department of Health and Human Resources, Bureau for Child Support Enforcement v. Smith, 218 W. Va. 480, 624 S.E.2d 917 (2005).

5. Pursuant to Rule 16a(d) of the West Virginia Rules of Procedure for Child Abuse and Neglect Proceedings, a circuit court cannot transfer or remand a child support order that it has entered in an abuse and neglect case to the family court for enforcement or modification.

Davis, Chief Justice:

The petitioner herein, the West Virginia Department of Health and Human Resources, Bureau for Child Support Enforcement [hereinafter "BCSE"], appeals from an order entered July 16, 2013, by the Circuit Court of Wood County.[1] By that order, the circuit court remanded the case to the Family Court of Wood County with instructions to enforce the circuit court's order, entered in the underlying abuse and neglect case, modifying the child support obligation of the respondent father herein, Jason L.[2] On appeal to this Court, the BCSE assigns error to the circuit court's decision to remand the case to the family court for enforcement of the circuit court's modification order. Upon a review of the parties' arguments, the appendix record, and the pertinent authorities, we agree with the BCSE that it was improper for the circuit court to remand the case to the family court for enforcement of a child support order entered by the circuit court. Accordingly, we reverse the July 16,

[1]This case originated in the Family Court of Wood County as a divorce action (Civil Action No. 05-D-95). During the pendency of child support enforcement proceedings therein, the underlying abuse and neglect case was filed in the Circuit Court of Wood County (Juvenile Abuse Neglect No. 11-JA-134). Because the child support order being enforced in the instant contempt proceeding was entered by the circuit court in the abuse and neglect case, we have adopted that case's style to maintain consistency therewith. For further discussion of the procedural posture giving rise to the case sub judice, see Section I, infra.

2013, order of the Circuit Court of Wood County and remand this case for further proceedings consistent with this opinion.

I.

FACTUAL AND PROCEDURAL HISTORY

The facts of this case are straightforward and not disputed by the parties. The respondent parents herein, Mary P. [hereinafter "Mary"] and Jason L. [hereinafter "Jason"], previously were married and had one child. During their 2005 divorce proceedings, Mary was awarded custody of the parties' child, and Jason was ordered to pay child support in the amount of $165.66 per month.

In 2011, the BCSE initiated enforcement proceedings against Jason in the divorce case in the Family Court of Wood County for nonpayment of child support. On April 11, 2011, the family court entered an order declaring Jason to be in arrears and granting judgment against him in the amount of $13,130.53. When Jason still failed to fulfill his child support obligation or pay his arrearage, the BCSE initiated contempt proceedings against Jason seeking to enforce its judgment against him. During the pendency of the contempt proceedings, the instant abuse and neglect case was filed in the Circuit Court of Wood County alleging that the parties' child was an abused or neglected child because Jason had committed various acts of domestic violence in the child's presence and Mary had failed to shield the child from such incidents.[3] Due to the pending abuse and neglect case, the family court determined that Rule 6 of the West Virginia Rules of Procedure for Child Abuse and Neglect Proceedings[4] prohibited it from hearing the contempt petition insofar as the circuit court now had jurisdiction of child support matters and dismissed the contempt petition without prejudice.

Thereafter, in the abuse and neglect case, the circuit court, by "Order of Modified Support" entered November 21, 2012, terminated Jason's parental rights to the parties' child and modified his child support obligation by reducing it by one-half to $82.83 per month and setting his arrearage amount at $50.00 per month until it has been satisfied. When Jason failed to pay this amount, or any portion of the arrearages he owes, Mary filed a pro se petition for contempt. The circuit court held a hearing on Mary's petition for contempt, and, on July 16, 2013, entered the order at issue in the case sub judice. In its July 16, 2013, order, the circuit court held Jason to be in contempt for nonpayment of child support as ordered by the circuit court's November 21, 2012, order modifying his child support obligation, issued a capias warrant to secure his arrest, directed he be returned to the family court, and remanded the case to the family court for enforcement of the circuit court's modified child support order entered in the abuse and neglect case as well as "for all future contempt hearings and all future modification hearings regarding child support."

[3]The appendix record in this case is exceedingly sparse, consisting of a mere twenty-four pages comprised of four orders entered during the course of this matter. While the Court appreciates counsel's attempt at brevity, such an abbreviated record leaves many questions about the procedural posture of this case unanswered, most notably the current status of the underlying abuse and neglect proceeding that has been pending for nearly three years and the permanency plan for the parties' child. See W. Va. R. P. Child Abuse & Neglect Proceed. 43 ("Permanent placement of each child shall be achieved within twelve (12) months of the final disposition order, unless the court specifically finds on the record extraordinary reasons sufficient to justify the delay.").

From this order, the BCSE appeals to this Court.

II.

STANDARD OF REVIEW

In the case sub judice, the BCSE challenges the correctness of the circuit court's order. We previously have held that > [i]n reviewing challenges to the findings and conclusions of the circuit court, we apply a two-prong deferential standard of review. We review the final order and the ultimate disposition under an abuse of discretion standard, and we review the circuit court's underlying factual findings under a clearly erroneous standard. Questions of law are subject to de novo review.

Syl. pt. 2, Walker v. West Virginia Ethics Comm'n, 201 W. Va. 108, 492 S.E.2d 167 (1997). Mindful of this standard, we proceed to consider the parties' arguments.

III.

DISCUSSION

Before this Court, the BCSE assigns error to the circuit court's order remanding the case to the family court for enforcement of the circuit court's order modifying child support and for all further modifications of child support. In its July 16, 2013, order, the circuit court ruled:

> [I]t is hereby ADJUDGED and ORDERED:
> 1. Jason L[.] shall be found in willful and contumacious contempt for failure to pay child support and failing to appear for this hearing.
>
> 2. This Order herein shall serve as a Capias warrant, and it is hereby ORDERED that any law enforcement officer authorized to execute a warrant in the State of West Virginia is hereby authorized to take JASON L[.] into custody and retain custody of him until the next judicial day that Family Court is in session in Wood County, West Virginia, and then delivery [sic] the body of JASON L[.] to appear before the Honorable C. Darren Tallman, Family Court Judge, between the hours of 9:00 a.m. and 4:00 p.m. to explain his failure to comply with the Order of the Court and to be further dealt with as the Court determines necessary.
>
> 3. This matter shall be remanded back to Family Court for all future contempt hearings and all future modification hearings regarding child support.
> 4. This matter shall be set for further hearing on the Petition for Contempt for failure to pay child support before the Honorable C. Darren Tallman, Family Court Judge of Wood County on August 7, 2013 at 9:15 a.m. in Civil Action Number 05-D-95.

(Emphasis in original). In so ruling, the circuit court explained its reasoning as follows:

> Family Court is the more convenient forum for actions relating to child support as it addresses such issues on a daily basis.
>
> The WVBCSE attorney appears more frequently in Family Court and the WVBCSE is a party to all actions involving the collections and enforcement of child support, so Family Court would be the more appropriate forum based upon judicial economy.
>
> The State of West Virginia and the public defenders services should not be paying for an attorney, appointed in a circuit court proceeding unrelated to the enforcement and collection of child support, to defend an issue of contempt or modification on [sic] child support.
>
> An executed capias may be heard more expeditiously in Family Court as Circuit Court may be in the middle of a jury trial or may have hearings scheduled which would take precedence over the capias.
> Disregarding the arguments of the WVBCSE, all further proceedings concerning the support of this child should be heard in Family Court regardless of the mandate in Rule 6.

(Emphasis added). Therefore, we must determine whether the circuit court properly disregarded Rule 6 of the West Virginia Rules of Procedure for Child Abuse and Neglect Proceedings when it remanded the case to the family court with instructions to preside over the present contempt proceedings for nonpayment of child support and to hear any future modifications of child support and contempt proceedings related thereto. In light of the limited jurisdiction of family courts, the exclusive jurisdiction of circuit courts over child abuse and neglect proceedings, and our Rules specifically directing circuit courts to award child support in abuse and neglect cases, to retain jurisdiction over such awards, and to refrain from transferring such child support determinations to family courts, we conclude that the circuit court clearly exceeded its authority when it remanded the instant child support matter to the family court.

We begin our analysis by reviewing the jurisdiction with which family courts are vested. Pursuant to article VIII, § 16 of the West Virginia Constitution, "[f]amily courts shall have original jurisdiction in the areas of family law and related matters as may hereafter be established by law. Family courts may also have such further jurisdiction as established by law." In recognition of these jurisdictional limits, we have expressly held that "[t]he jurisdiction of family courts is limited to only those matters specifically authorized by the Legislature, while circuit courts have original and general jurisdiction and other powers as set forth in Article VIII, § 6 of the Constitution of West Virginia." Syl. pt. 5, in part, Lindsie D.L. v. Richard W.S., 214 W. Va. 750, 591 S.E.2d 308 (2003).

W. Va. Code § 51-2A-2 (2012) (Supp. 2014) defines the precise parameters of the family court's jurisdiction. Of particular relevance to our resolution of the case sub judice is the express recognition that the ambit of authority granted to family courts is limited and particularly defined:

> A family court is a court of limited jurisdiction. A family court is a court of record only for the purpose of exercising > jurisdiction in the matters for which the jurisdiction of the family court is specifically authorized in this section and in chapter forty-eight [§§ 48-1-101 et seq.] of this code. A family court may not exercise the powers given courts of record in section one [§ 51-5-1], article five, chapter fifty-one of this code or exercise any other powers provided for courts of record in this code unless specifically authorized by the Legislature. A family court judge is not a "judge of any court of record" or a "judge of a court of record" as the terms are defined and used in article nine [§§ 51-9-1 et seq.] of this chapter.

W. Va. Code § 51-2A-2(e). Among such limits imposed upon a family court's jurisdiction are the inability of a family court to hear a matter involving child abuse or neglect insofar as such cases are within the exclusive authority of the circuit court and the corresponding directive to the family courts to stay proceedings pending therein when a related abuse and neglect case is simultaneously pending before the circuit court:

> If an action for divorce, annulment or separate maintenance is pending and a petition is filed pursuant to the provisions of article six [§§ 49-6-1 et seq.], chapter forty-nine of this code alleging abuse or neglect of a child by either of the parties to the divorce, annulment or separate maintenance action, the orders of the circuit court in which the abuse or neglect petition is filed shall supercede and take precedence over an order of the family court respecting the allocation of custodial and decision-making responsibility for the child between the parents. If no order for the allocation of custodial and decision-making responsibility for the child between the parents has been entered by the family court in the pending action for divorce, annulment or separate maintenance, the family court shall stay any further proceedings concerning the allocation of custodial and decision-making responsibility for the child between the parents and defer to the orders of the circuit court in the abuse or neglect proceedings.

W. Va. Code § 51-2A-2(c).

By contrast, circuit courts, being courts of general jurisdiction, have more expansive authority. See Syl. pt. 5, in part, Lindsie D.L. v. Richard W.S., 214 W. Va. 750, 591 S.E.2d 308. Of relevance to the case sub judice is the exclusive authority of circuit courts to hear cases alleging the abuse and/or neglect of a child. In this regard, we specifically have recognized that "[a] circuit court has jurisdiction to entertain an abuse and neglect petition and to conduct proceedings in accordance therewith as provided by W. Va. Code § 49-6-1, et seq." Syl. pt. 3, State ex rel. Paul B. v. Hill, 201 W. Va. 248, 496 S.E.2d 198 (1997). See also W. Va. Code § 49-6-1(a) (2005) (Repl. Vol. 2014) (specifying that abuse and neglect petition is to be presented to circuit court of county in which subject child resides). Because child and abuse proceedings are confidential in nature, access to the records of such cases is limited, with even the family court being afforded restricted access to only certain documents in an abuse and neglect case file:

> All records and information maintained by the courts in child abuse and neglect proceedings shall be kept confidential except as otherwise provided in W. Va. Code, Chapter 49 and this rule. In the interest of assuring that any determination made in proceedings before a family court arising under W. Va. Code, Chapter 48, or W. Va. Code § 44-10-3, does not contravene any determination made by a circuit court in a related prior or pending child abuse and neglect case arising under W. Va. Code, Chapter 49, family courts and staff shall have access to all circuit court orders and case indexes in this State in all such related Chapter 49 proceedings.

W. Va. R. P. Child Abuse & Neglect Proceed. 6a(b). See also W. Va. R. P. Child Abuse & Neglect Proceed. 3a(d) (similarly restricting access to pre-petition investigation in abuse and neglect cases). Therefore, it is clear that exclusive jurisdiction over abuse and neglect cases is reposed in the circuit courts of this State, and that the family courts are required to defer to the circuit courts' rulings in such matters.

Included within a circuit court's abuse and neglect jurisdiction is the authority to decide child support issues arising in an abuse and neglect case. Recognizing that circuit courts, and not family courts, are vested with jurisdiction over child abuse and neglect cases, we previously have held that "[w]hen a child is the subject of an abuse or neglect or other proceeding in a circuit court pursuant to Chapter 49 of the West Virginia Code, the circuit court, and not the family court, has jurisdiction to establish a child support obligation for that child." Syl. pt. 3, West Virginia Dep't of Health & Human Res., Bureau for Child Support Enforcement v. Smith, 218 W. Va. 480, 624 S.E.2d 917 (2005). This holding serves to clarify not only that the circuit court has exclusive jurisdiction over abuse and neglect matters but also that the establishment of an award of child support is a necessary and integral part of the resolution of an abuse and neglect proceeding: "A circuit court terminating a parent's parental rights pursuant to W. Va. Code, § 49-6-5(a)(6), must ordinarily require that the terminated parent continue paying child support for the child, pursuant to the Guidelines for Child Support Awards found in W. Va. Code, § 48-13-101, et seq. [2001]." Syl. pt. 2, in part, In re Ryan B., 224 W. Va. 461, 686 S.E.2d 601 (2009). See Syl. pt. 4, Smith, 218 W. Va. 480, 624 S.E.2d 917 ("When a circuit judge enters an order on an abuse or neglect petition filed pursuant to Chapter 49 of the West Virginia Code, and in so doing alters the custodial and decision-making responsibility for the child and/or commits the child to the custody of the Department of Health and Human Resources, W. Va. Code, 49-7-5 [1936] requires the circuit judge to impose a support obligation upon one or both parents for the support, maintenance and education of the child. The entry of an order establishing a support obligation is mandatory; it is not optional." (emphasis added)). See also Syl. pt. 1, In re Ryan B., 224 W. Va. 461, 686 S.E.2d 601 ("The Legislature's 2006 amendment of W. Va. Code, § 49-6-5(a)(6), changing the statute's "guardianship rights and/or responsibilities" language to "guardianship rights and responsibilities" was not intended to relieve parents who have their parental rights terminated in an abuse and neglect proceeding from providing their child(ren) with child support."). The requisite imposition of a child support obligation in an abuse and neglect case also is detailed in Rule 16a of the West Virginia Rules of Procedure for Child Abuse and Neglect Proceedings:

> (a) Entry of support orders. – Every order in a child abuse and neglect proceeding that alters the custodial and decision-making responsibility for a child and/or commits the child to the custody of the Department of Health and Human Resources must impose a support obligation upon one or both parents for the support, maintenance and education of the child.
> (b) Use of guidelines. – Any order establishing a child support obligation in an abuse and neglect proceeding must use the Guidelines for Child Support Awards found in W. Va. Code § 48-13-101, et seq. The Guidelines may be disregarded, or the calculation of an award under the Guidelines may be adjusted, only if the court makes specific findings that use of the Guidelines is inappropriate.

> (c) Modifications. – Any order establishing a child support obligation in a child abuse and neglect proceeding may be modified by the court upon motion of any party. An order granting modification of a support obligation must use the Guidelines for Child Support Awards found in W. Va. Code § 48-13-101, et seq. . . .

(Emphasis in original).

Insofar as the authority to determine matters involving the abuse and/or neglect of a child is reposed in the circuit court, not the family court, continuing jurisdiction over such cases likewise is vested in the circuit court:

> Each civil child abuse and neglect proceeding shall be maintained on the circuit court's docket until permanent placement of the child has been achieved. The court retains exclusive jurisdiction over placement of the child while the case is pending, as well as over any subsequent requests for modification, including, but not limited to, changes in permanent placement or visitation, except that (1) if the petition is dismissed for failure to state a claim under Chapter 49 of the W. Va. Code, or (2) if the petition is dismissed, and the child is thereby ordered placed in the legal and physical custody of both his/her cohabiting parents without any visitation or child support provisions, then any future child custody, visitation, and/or child support proceedings between the parents may be brought in family court. However, should allegations of child abuse and/or neglect arise in the family court proceedings, then the matter shall proceed in compliance with Rule 3a.

W. Va. R. P. Child Abuse & Neglect Proceed. 6. Moreover, the exclusivity of such jurisdiction in the circuit court precludes the transfer of any portion of an abuse and neglect case to the family court, even if the issue involved concerns a matter usually within the purview of the family court's jurisdiction. Rule 16a(d) of the West Virginia Rules of Procedure for Child Abuse and Neglect Proceedings makes it patently clear that circuit courts, and not family courts, possess and retain abuse and neglect jurisdiction and specifically prohibits circuit courts from transferring abuse and neglect matters to family court: "No portion of a child abuse and neglect proceeding may be transferred or remanded to a family court for assessment of a child support obligation."

Based upon the foregoing authorities, we therefore hold that, pursuant to Rule 6 of the West Virginia Rules of Procedure for Child Abuse and Neglect Proceedings, when a circuit court enters an order awarding or modifying child support in an abuse and neglect case, the circuit court retains jurisdiction over such child support order. We further hold that, pursuant to Rule 16a(d) of the West Virginia Rules of Procedure for Child Abuse and Neglect Proceedings, a circuit court cannot transfer or remand a child support order that it has entered in an abuse and neglect case to the family court for enforcement or modification.

Applying these holdings and the foregoing authorities to the facts of the case sub judice, it is clear that the circuit court did not have the authority to remand this case to the family court for enforcement of its modified order of support through contempt proceedings or for the family court's determination of future child support matters herein insofar as the circuit court entered its modified order in the instant abuse and neglect proceeding and, thus, retained jurisdiction over the same. Moreover, it goes without saying that, as a tribunal of limited jurisdiction, the family court neither has full access to the record giving rise to the order of modified support in the abuse and neglect case nor the authority to modify or reverse the circuit court's child support order. Accordingly, we reverse the July 16, 2013, order of the Circuit Court of Wood County that remanded the case to the Family Court of Wood County for the enforcement of the circuit court's modified child support order through contempt proceedings and directed the family court to hear all future proceedings concerning the enforcement and modification of child support. We further remand this case to the circuit court with directions that it retain jurisdiction over its modified order of child support that it entered in the underlying abuse and neglect case and instructions to the circuit court to see to fruition the pending contempt proceedings as well as any future proceedings concerning the enforcement or modification of said child support order.

Finally, we would be remiss if we did not address the many procedural issues that have come to our attention during our review of the underlying abuse and neglect proceedings. First, and foremost, the order from whence the contempt petition in this case originates, the circuit court's November 21, 2012, "Order of Modified Support" very tersely describes the respondent father's modified support obligation as follows: "Jason L[.]'s current child support obligation shall be reduced in that his current child support obligation shall be Eighty-Two and 83/100 dollars ($82.83) per month effective on the first day of August 1st [sic], 2012[,] and arrearages in the amount of $50.00 (Fifty) dollars per month until paid."

As we noted previously in this opinion, Rule 16a(b) of the West Virginia Rules of Procedure for Child Abuse and Neglect Proceedings requires the use of the child support Guidelines to calculate an award of child support:

> Any order establishing a child support obligation in an abuse and neglect proceeding must use the Guidelines for Child Support Awards found in W. Va. Code § 48-13-101, et seq. The Guidelines may be disregarded, or the calculation of an award under the Guidelines may be adjusted, only if the court makes specific findings that use of the Guidelines is inappropriate.

W. Va. R. P. Child Abuse & Neglect Proceed. 16a(b) (emphasis added). Use of the Guidelines is mandatory. "Any order establishing a child support obligation in an abuse or neglect action filed pursuant to Chapter 49 of the West Virginia Code must use the Guidelines for Child Support Awards found in W. Va. Code, 48-13-101, et seq." Syl. pt. 5, Smith, 218 W. Va. 480, 624 S.E.2d 917 (emphasis added).

Although both Rule 16a(b) and our prior precedent recognize that use of the Guidelines may not be appropriate in a given case, a court still is required to explain why it has chosen not to follow them.

> A circuit court terminating a parent's parental rights pursuant to W. Va. Code, § 49-6-5(a)(6), must ordinarily require that the terminated parent continue paying child support for the > child, pursuant to the Guidelines for Child Support Awards found in W. Va. Code, § 48-13-101, et seq. [2001]. If the circuit court finds, in a rare instance, that it is not in the child's best interest to order the parent to pay child support pursuant to the Guidelines in a specific case, it may disregard the Guidelines to accommodate the needs of the child if the court makes that finding on the record and explains its reasons for deviating from the Guidelines pursuant to W. Va. Code, § 48-13-702 [2001].

Syl. pt. 2, In re Ryan B., 224 W. Va. 461, 686 S.E.2d 601.

In the circuit court's modified support order, no explanation is given as to whether the Guidelines were used or were not used, and, if they were not used, why the court found them to be inapplicable to this case. Therefore, on remand, the circuit court should correct its November 21, 2012, order awarding modified child support to comply with this Court's directives for the calculation of child support in abuse and neglect cases in accordance with the Guidelines for Child Support Awards as set forth in Syllabus point 5 of West Virginia Department of Health and Human Resources, Bureau for Child Support Enforcement v. Smith, 218 W. Va. 480, 624 S.E.2d 917 (2005), and Syllabus point 2 of In re Ryan B., 224 W. Va. 461, 686 S.E.2d 601 (2009).

Moreover, while it is apparent to this Court that the respondent father's parental rights have been terminated in the circuit court's order of modified support, we are unable to locate an order finally concluding the abuse and neglect proceedings. Rather, the circuit court's November 21, 2012, "Order of Modified Support" succinctly terminates the respondent father's parental rights with a passing reference to the fact that this disposition was achieved by the agreement of the parties. In so ruling, the circuit court states that

> [c]ounsels for both Mary . . . P[.] and Jason L[.] have entered into an agreement wherein Jason L[.]'s parental rights should be terminated and Jason L[.]'s current child support obligation established by Family Court should be reduced in half.
>
> . . . .
>
> Therefore, it is hereby Adjudged and Ordered:
> Jason L[.]'s parental rights shall be terminated.

While we do not believe that the circuit court's failure to render more detailed findings of fact regarding the termination of Jason's parental rights warrants reversal on this point where none of the parties have raised the issue on appeal, we do instruct the circuit court, when composing its corrected order of child support, to thoroughly detail the factual findings giving rise to its termination of Jason's parental rights. See Syl. pt. 2, State v. T.C., 172 W. Va. 47, 303 S.E.2d 685 (1983) ("W. Va. Code, 49-6-1 et seq., does not foreclose the ability of the parties, properly counseled, in a child abuse or neglect proceeding, to make some voluntary dispositional plan. However, such arrangements are not without restrictions. First, the plan is subject to the approval of the court. Second, and of greater importance, the parties cannot circumvent the threshold question which is the issue of abuse or neglect."). See also Syl. pt. 5, In re Edward B., 210 W. Va. 621, 558 S.E.2d 620 (2001) ("Where it appears from the record that the process established by the Rules of Procedure for Child Abuse and Neglect Proceedings and related statutes for the disposition of cases involving children adjudicated to be abused or neglected has been substantially disregarded or frustrated, the resulting order of disposition will be vacated and the case remanded for compliance with that process and entry of an appropriate dispositional order.").

Lastly, we cannot discern from the record in this case whether a guardian ad litem has been appointed to represent the subject child. If no such guardian has been appointed, we remind the circuit court of the child's entitlement to such representation and direct that a guardian be so appointed for the minor child in this case. See Syl. pt. 5, in part, In re Jeffrey R.L., 190 W. Va. 24, 435 S.E.2d 162 (1993) ("Each child in an abuse and neglect case is entitled to effective representation of counsel. To further that goal, W. Va. Code, 49–6–2(a) [1992] mandates that a child has a right to be represented by counsel in every stage of abuse and neglect proceedings. Furthermore, Rule XIII of the West Virginia Rules for Trial Courts of Record provides that a guardian ad litem shall make a full and independent investigation of the facts involved in the proceeding, and shall make his or her recommendations known to the court. Rules 1.1 and 1.3 of the West Virginia Rules of Professional Conduct , respectively, require an attorney to provide competent representation to a client, and to act with reasonable diligence and promptness in representing a client.").

IV.

CONCLUSION

For the foregoing reasons, we reverse the July 16, 2013, order of the Circuit Court of Wood County and remand this case for further proceedings consistent with this opinion.

Reversed and Remanded.

JUSTICE WORKMAN delivered the Opinion of the Court.

SYLLABUS BY THE COURT

1. "Although conclusions of law reached by a circuit court are subject to de novo review, when an action, such as an abuse and neglect case, is tried upon the facts without a jury, the circuit court shall make a determination based upon the evidence and shall make findings of fact and conclusions of law as to whether such child is abused or neglected. These findings shall not be set aside by a reviewing court unless clearly erroneous. A finding is clearly erroneous when, although there is evidence to support the finding, the reviewing court on the entire evidence is left with the definite and firm conviction that a mistake has been committed. However, a reviewing court may not overturn a finding simply because it would have decided the case differently, and it must affirm a finding if the circuit court's account of the evidence is plausible in light of the record viewed in its entirety." Syl. Pt. 1, In re Tiffany Marie S., 196 W. Va. 223, 470 S.E.2d 177 (1996).

2. "A trial court's ruling on a motion in limine is reviewed on appeal for an abuse of discretion." Syl. Pt. 1, McKenzie v. Carroll Intern. Corp., 216 W.Va. 686, 610 S.E.2d 341 (2004).

3. "The West Virginia Rules of Evidence and the West Virginia Rules of Civil Procedure allocate significant discretion to the trial court in making evidentiary and procedural rulings. Thus, rulings on the admissibility of evidence . . . are committed to the discretion of the trial court. Absent a few exceptions, this Court will review evidentiary and procedural rulings of the circuit court under an abuse of discretion standard." Syl. Pt. 1, in part, McDougal v. McCammon, 193 W.Va. 229, 455 S.E.2d 788 (1995).

4. "In a contest involving the custody of an infant the welfare of the child is the polar star by which the discretion of the court will be guided." Syl. Pt. 1, State ex rel. Cash v. Lively, 155 W.Va. 801, 187 S.E.2d 601 (1972).

5. "Applicable standards for procedural due process, outside the criminal area, may depend upon the particular circumstances of a given case. However, there are certain fundamental principles in regard to procedural due process embodied in Article III, Section 10 of the West Virginia Constitution, which are: First, the more valuable the right sought to be deprived, the more safeguards will be interposed. Second, due process must generally be given before the deprivation occurs unless a compelling public policy dictates otherwise. Third, a temporary deprivation of rights may not require as large a measure of procedural due process protection as a permanent deprivation." Syl. Pt. 2, North v. Bd. of Regents, 160 W.Va. 248, 233 S.E.2d 411 (1977).

6. "Under article [VIII], section three of our Constitution, the Supreme Court of Appeals shall have the power to promulgate rules for all of the courts of the State related to process, practice, and procedure, which shall have the force and effect of law." Syl. Pt. 1, Bennett v. Warner, 179 W.Va. 742, 372 S.E.2d 920 (1988).

7. In a child abuse and neglect civil proceeding held pursuant to West Virginia Code § 49-6-2 (2009), a party does not have a procedural due process right to confront and cross-examine a child. Under Rule 8(a) of the West Virginia Rules of Procedure for Child Abuse and Neglect Proceedings, there is a rebuttable presumption that the potential psychological harm to the child outweighs the necessity of the child's testimony. The circuit court shall exclude this testimony if it finds the potential psychological harm to the child outweighs the necessity of the child's testimony.

8. "Generally, out-of-court statements made by someone other than the declarant while testifying are not admissible unless: 1) the statement is not being offered for the truth of the matter asserted, but for some other purpose such as motive, intent, state-of-mind, identification or reasonableness of the party's action; 2) the statement is not hearsay under the rules; or 3) the statement is hearsay but falls within an exception provided for in the rules." Syl. Pt. 1, State v. Maynard, 183 W.Va. 1, 393 S.E.2d 221 (1990).

9. "The language of Rule 804(b)(5) of the West Virginia Rules of Evidence and its counterpart in Rule 803(24) requires that five general factors must be met in order for hearsay evidence to be admissible under the rules. First and most important is the trustworthiness of the statement, which must be equivalent to the trustworthiness underlying the specific exceptions to the hearsay rule. Second, the statement must be offered to prove a material fact. Third, the statement must be shown to be more probative on the issue for which it is offered than any other evidence the proponent can reasonably procure. Fourth, admission of the statement must comport with the general purpose of the rules of evidence and the interest of justice. Fifth, adequate notice of the statement must be afforded the other party to provide that party a fair opportunity to meet the evidence." Syl. Pt. 5, State v. Smith, 178 W.Va. 104, 358 S.E.2d 188 (1987).

10. "'"'Termination of parental rights, the most drastic remedy under the statutory provision covering the disposition of neglected children, W.Va. Code, 49-6-5 [1977] may be employed without the use of intervening less restrictive alternatives when it is found that there is no reasonable likelihood under W.Va. Code, 49-6-5b [1977] that conditions of neglect or abuse can be substantially corrected.' Syllabus Point 2, In re R.J.M., 164 W.Va. 496, 266 S.E.2d 114 (1980)." Pt. 6, In re Isaiah A., 228 W.Va. 176, 718 S.E.2d 775 (2010).

Workman, Justice:

In this proceeding we address two appeals from the final order of the Circuit Court of Fayette County, West Virginia, entered on May 3, 2013. This is a child abuse and neglect matter brought against the petitioner father J.S.[1] and the petitioner mother C.S. (hereinafter collectively "the petitioners" or individually "the father" and "the mother"). This Court considers the primary issue of whether the petitioners' procedural due process rights were violated when out-of-court statements of two children were admitted to prove allegations of sexual abuse when the petitioners were not given the opportunity to confront and cross-examine the children. The West Virginia Department of Health and Human Resources ("the DHHR") and the guardian ad litem on behalf of the children contend the circuit court properly excluded the testimony of the children pursuant to Rule 8(a) of the West Virginia Rules of Procedure for Child Abuse and Neglect because the petitioners offered no evidence to overcome the presumption that the potential psychological harm to the children outweighed the necessity of their testimony.

Upon careful review of the briefs, the appendix record, the arguments of the parties, and the applicable legal authority, we find that the circuit court adequately safeguarded the petitioners' procedural due process rights. We find no error and affirm the termination of their parental rights.

[1] We follow our normal practice in juvenile and domestic relations cases which involve sensitive facts and use the parties' initials. See, e.g., W.Va. Dept. of Human Servs. v. La Rea Ann C.L., 175 W.Va. 330, 332 S.E.2d 632 (1985); see also W.Va. R. App. P. 40(e).

I. FACTUAL AND PROCEDURAL HISTORY

This case arises out of a child abuse and neglect petition filed following allegations of sexual abuse and failure to protect. N.L. (age 11), the niece of the mother, reported that the father had sexually assaulted her. A DHHR child protective services case worker spoke with N.L. and the child disclosed in graphic detail repeated sexual assaults by the father. N.L. stated that she told the mother about the abuse but the mother did not believe her.

The father was living with the mother, their infant son J.S. Jr., N.L., and his son from a previous relationship, D.S. (age 14). N.L. reported that the father would lock D.S. in his room, put J.S. Jr. in his crib and sexually assault her when the mother was at work. The DHHR filed an amended petition that added allegations against the father concerning D.S. (discussed below). The DHHR alleged in the petition that the mother ignored repeated warnings from the DHHR that the presence of the father in the home presented a significant risk to the safety of the children.

The mother had guardianship of N.L. from the fall of 2009 until early June of 2011.[2] In the guardianship case, the court ordered that the father was not to have contact with N.L. or reside in the home with N.L. and the mother due to substantiated prior sexual misconduct by the father.[3] This order was ignored by the mother and she married the father in November of 2010. N.L. lived in the home with the mother and the father until June of 2011.[4]

As a result of filing the petition, D.S. and J.S. Jr. were removed from the home. The couple's infant daughter, D.S.,[5] was born after the filing of the petition, and the DHHR sought her custody soon after birth due to these pending allegations.

[2] N.L. is the daughter of the mother's sister. N.L.'s grandmother had custody of N.L. since the child was born but she suffered medical problems and was hospitalized. Thereafter, the mother gained guardianship of N.L. in 2009.

[3] The father was indicted and found not guilty of second degree sexual assault of his former wife. However, in November of 2009, an investigator with child protective services noted in a status report that the DHHR had substantiated the sexual assault. Further, the investigator noted the father, by his own admission, had previously been accused of inappropriately touching his daughter, although he denied this accusation.

[4] In May of 2011, the DHHR informed the judge presiding in the guardianship case that the couple had married and had a child. A hearing was conducted in this matter in June of 2011, and the mother testified that she allowed the father to live in her home with their child and N.L. knowing that she was in violation of the provisions of the guardianship order. Thereafter, the court entered an order terminating the mother's guardianship and appointing the paternal great uncle and great aunt of N.L. as guardians.

[5] The father has seven children -- two with the mother.

Prior to the adjudicatory hearing, the DHHR filed a motion in limine to exclude the testimony of the children and instead procure the evidence through viewing previously recorded forensic interviews of N.L. and D.S. The DHHR informed the circuit court that the children feared having to testify against the father. The petitioners filed a response objecting to this evidence and asserting they had the right to cross-examine the children. At the beginning of the adjudicatory hearing, the circuit court granted the DHHR's motion in limine and stated:

> Rule 8 of the [West Virginia Rules of Procedure for Child Abuse and Neglect Proceedings][6] . . . talks about a rebuttable presumption that it's psychologically harmful to children of young and tender years to undergo testimony in front of total strangers, adult total strangers, and then be cross-examined. And there is nothing in the record to, no

[6] Rule 8(a) of the West Virginia Rules of Procedure for Child Abuse and Neglect Proceedings states:

> Restrictions on the testimony of children. – Notwithstanding any limitation on the ability to testify imposed by this rule, all children remain competent to testify in any proceeding before the court as determined by the Rules of Evidence and the Rules of Civil Procedure. However, there shall be a rebuttable presumption that the potential psychological harm to the child outweighs the necessity of the child's testimony and the court shall exclude this testimony if the potential psychological harm to the child outweighs the necessity of the child's testimony. Further, the court may exclude the child's testimony if (A) the equivalent evidence can be procured through other reasonable efforts; (B) the child's testimony is not more probative on the issue than the other forms of evidence presented; and (C) the general purposes of these rules and the interest of justice will best be served by the exclusion of the child's testimony.

> professional evidence in the record, or otherwise, which rebuts that presumption. And I think it goes without saying in this case, considering the ages of these two children and the nature of what they would have to talk about, even if they just talked to me in camera, is very, very horrific and will clearly only compound whatever simply being in a foster home has done to them, can only compound the psychological harm, most of which we would not – I'll probably be dead and gone by the time it manifests itself, maybe. It's not something you can see next week or this afternoon or tomorrow morning, it comes out over a period of gestation as it stews and bubbles in peoples' heads for years and years and years.
> So I grant your motion in limine to those two children for the reasons that the rebuttable presumption has not been rebutted, no evidence offered, as I said, to do that, other than to say that, basically, they need the testimony and it would be harmful to their clients' interest if [the testimony was not taken]. I disagree. (footnote added).

At the adjudicatory hearing held July 9, 2012, the DHHR submitted the videotaped interviews of N.L. and D.S., and the handwritten notes taken from those interviews. The interviews were videotaped by the Fayette County Sheriff's Department at the Just for Kids Center in Oak Hill, West Virginia. The interviews were conducted by an employee with the child services agency. N.L. detailed graphic sexual abuse by the father. There are various timeframes in the interview where N.L. denies telling anyone about the abuse, but she later indicates she told the mother and the mother did not believe her. In his interview, D.S. disclosed that on one occasion, the father accused him of masturbating, scolded him, and touched his penis. D.S. stated that he was repeatedly locked in his room, with the lock on the outside of the door so he could not get out.

The DHHR submitted a letter dated January 18, 2012, addressed to "mommy," wherein N.L. described details of sexual assaults suffered at the hands of the father. N.L. wrote that the father threatened violence against the mother and N.L.'s grandparents if she were to tell anyone about the sexual assaults. This letter was admitted into evidence without objection. The therapy treatment records of N.L. were also admitted without objection.[7]

The father testified and denied any inappropriate contact with the children. The mother testified and denied that N.L. made any disclosures that the father had sexually abused her. The mother testified that the first time she learned about the abuse allegations was when her sister called her after N.L. had left a therapy session in February of 2012. The mother acknowledged that when she was granted guardianship of N.L., the court prohibited the father from having contact with N.L. In spite of that prohibition, she allowed him to live in the home with N.L.

In the adjudicatory order entered December 17, 2012, the circuit court found that the father sexually abused N.L. on numerous occasions, in a variety of ways. The circuit court also found that the mother permitted the father to remain in her home despite having knowledge of past sexual abuse allegations against him and in violation of the guardianship order entered in 2009. The circuit court held that the father sexually abused D.S. by inappropriately touching the child on one occasion. The circuit court found that the children were abused and neglected as defined by West Virginia Code §§ 49-1-3(a) (2009)[8] and 49-1-3(a)(4) (2009).[9]

At the dispositional hearing held on April 12, 2013, the DHHR called Barbara A. Nelson, M.A., psychologist, to testify regarding an evaluation of the mother. She stated the mother's failure to recognize the danger that the father presents to her children stems from poor judgment and a tendency to put her own desires above the safety of others. The DHHR also called child protective services worker Amanda Hayhurst to testify regarding the DHHR's decision to seek termination of the petitioners' rights. Ms. Hayhurst testified that during the entire time this case was pending, members of the multidisciplinary team told the mother repeatedly that she needed to have the father move out of her home. The mother refused and continued to reside with the father even though serious allegations of sexual abuse were substantiated. The petitioners did not testify at the dispositional hearing.

[8] West Virginia Code 49-1-3(a) defines an "abused child" as a child whose health or welfare is harmed or threatened by: "(1) A parent, guardian or custodian who knowingly or intentionally inflicts, attempts to inflict or knowingly allows another person to inflict, physical injury or mental or emotional injury, upon the child or another child in the home; or (2) Sexual abuse or sexual exploitation[.]"

[9] West Virginia Code 49-1-3(a) defines an "abused child" as a child whose health or welfare is harmed or threatened by "(4) Domestic violence[.]" In these appeals, the parties do not address the evidence regarding domestic violence between the father and the mother.

The circuit court terminated the parental rights of the petitioners by order entered May 3, 2013. The circuit court found "[t]here is no reasonable likelihood that the conditions of neglect or abuse" can be substantially corrected and the welfare of the child respondents in this case necessitates the termination of their parental rights. This appeal followed. [10]

II. STANDARD OF REVIEW

We are asked to review a circuit court's order entered upon a petition for termination of parental rights. This Court has explained that "[f]or appeals resulting from abuse and neglect proceedings, such as the case sub judice, we employ a compound standard of review: conclusions of law are subject to a de novo review, while findings of fact are weighed against a clearly erroneous standard." In re Emily, 208 W.Va. 325, 332, 540 S.E.2d 542, 549 (2000). In addition, we have held:

> Although conclusions of law reached by a circuit court are subject to de novo review, when an action, such as an abuse and neglect case, is tried upon the facts without a jury, the circuit court shall make a determination based upon the evidence and shall make findings of fact and conclusions of law as to whether such child is abused or neglected. These findings shall not be set aside by a reviewing court unless > clearly erroneous. A finding is clearly erroneous when, although there is evidence to support the finding, the reviewing court on the entire evidence is left with the definite and firm conviction that a mistake has been committed. However, a reviewing court may not overturn a finding simply because it would have decided the case differently, and it must affirm a finding if the circuit court's account of the evidence is plausible in light of the record viewed in its entirety.

Syl. Pt. 1, In re Tiffany Marie S., 196 W. Va. 223, 470 S.E.2d 177 (1996).

In this appeal, the petitioners challenge the circuit court's decision to grant the DHHR's motion in limine to exclude the children's testimony. "A trial court's ruling on a motion in limine is reviewed on appeal for an abuse of discretion." Syl. Pt. 1, McKenzie v. Carroll Intern. Corp., 216 W.Va. 686, 610 S.E.2d 341 (2004). The petitioners also contest the circuit court's evidentiary rulings. Our pertinent standard of appellate review is set forth in Syllabus Point 1, in part, of McDougal v. McCammon, 193 W.Va. 229, 455 S.E.2d 788 (1995):

> The West Virginia Rules of Evidence and the West Virginia Rules of Civil Procedure allocate significant discretion to the trial court in making evidentiary and procedural rulings. Thus, rulings on the admissibility of evidence . . . are committed to the discretion of the trial court. Absent a few exceptions, this Court will review evidentiary and procedural rulings of the circuit court under an abuse of discretion standard.

With these principles in mind, we turn to the parties' arguments.

III. DISCUSSION

A. Procedural Due Process

The petitioners challenge the circuit court's decision to exclude the children's testimony under Rule 8(a) of the West Virginia Rules of Procedure for Child Abuse and Neglect Proceedings. The petitioners concede they did not present evidence to overcome the presumption that the potential psychological harm to the children outweighed the necessity of the children's testimony. Nevertheless, the petitioners contend they have a constitutional due process right to confront and cross-examine the children.[11] Stated abstractly, this is by no means a frivolous claim. A parent has a fundamental liberty interest in the care and custody of his or her child. See Santosky v.

[11] The petitioners appropriately refrain from arguing they were denied the Sixth Amendment right of confrontation, which applies only to criminal cases.

> "The Confrontation Clause contained in the Sixth Amendment to the United States Constitution provides: 'In all criminal prosecutions, the accused shall . . . be confronted with the witnesses against him.' This clause was made applicable to the states through the Fourteenth Amendment to the United States Constitution." Syl. Pt. 1, State v. James Edward S., 184 W.Va. 408, 400 S.E.2d 843 (1990), overruled on other grounds by, State v. Mechling, 219 W.Va. 366, 633 S.E.2d 311 (2006).

Syl. Pt. 2, State v. Kaufman, 227 W.Va. 537, 711 S.E.2d 607 (2011). Because abuse and neglect proceedings are civil proceedings, the Confrontation Clause of the Sixth Amendment of the United States Constitution is not applicable here. See e.g., In re J.D.C., 159 P.3d 974, 981 (Kan. 2007) (discussing Confrontation Clause did not apply to "child in need of care" proceeding); and In re S.A., 708 N.W.2d 673, 679 (S.D. 2005) (recognizing Sixth Amendment right of confrontation did not apply to civil abuse and neglect proceedings).

Kramer, 455 U.S. 745, 753 (1982) (recognizing this fundamental liberty interest requires the State to "provide the parents with fundamentally fair procedures" in termination proceedings); and Syl. Pt. 1, In re Willis, 157 W.Va. 225, 207 S.E.2d 129 (1973) (holding parental custody of minor child is a fundamental personal liberty protected and guaranteed by the Due Process Clauses of the West Virginia and United States Constitutions). In child abuse and neglect proceedings, we have long espoused the position that the rights of the parents are an essential consideration. The government's interest in protecting the welfare of children is also significant. However, the best interest and welfare of the child outweigh all other considerations. See Syl. Pt. 3, In re Katie S., 198 W.Va. 79, 479 S.E.2d 589 (1996) ("Although parents have substantial rights that must be protected, the primary goal in cases involving abuse and neglect, as in all family law matters, must be the health and welfare of the children."). In other words, "'[i]n a contest involving the custody of an infant the welfare of the child is the polar star by which the discretion of the court will be guided." Syl. Pt. 1, State ex rel. Cash v. Lively, 155 W.Va. 801, 187 S.E.2d 601 (1972).

We begin with the relevant parameters of the petitioners' due process claim. Any right that a civil litigant can claim to confrontation and cross-examination is grounded in the Due Process Clauses of the Fifth and Fourteenth Amendments of the United States Constitution[12] and article III, section 10 of the West Virginia Constitution. We are mindful that proceedings to terminate parental rights implicate fundamental liberty interests. Without question, a parent is entitled to due process of law before he or she can be deprived of his or her right to the custody, care and control of his or her child. The right is not absolute in that it can be limited or terminated by the State if a parent is proven unfit through proceedings affording the parent due process of law.

Statutorily, termination is proper only when "there is no reasonable likelihood that the conditions of neglect or abuse can be substantially corrected in the near future" and "when necessary for the welfare of the child[.]" W. Va. Code § 49-6-5(a)(6) (2009). "Given the significance of parental rights, a heightened level of evidentiary proof is necessary to warrant termination. 'The standard of proof required to support a court order limiting or terminating parental rights to the custody of minor children is clear, cogent and convincing proof.'" In re Jessica M., 231 W.Va. 254, __, 744 S.E.2d 652, 658 (2013) (quoting Syl. Pt. 6, In re Willis, 157 W.Va. 225, 207 S.E.2d 129).

The fundamental requirement of procedural due process in a civil proceeding is "the opportunity to be heard at a meaningful time and in a meaningful manner." Mathews v. Eldridge, 424 U.S. 319, 333 (1976). What would constitute due process in this case must be determined by weighing the competing interests of the children, the parents, and the State. It is well established that > [t]he very nature of due process negates any concept of inflexible procedures universally applicable to every imaginable situation and firmly established that what procedures due process may require under any given set of circumstances must begin with a determination of the precise nature of the government function involved as well as of the private interest that has been affected by governmental action.

Stanley v. Illinois, 405 U.S. 645, 650-51 (1972); see e.g., U.S. v. Alisal Water Corp., 431 F.3d 643, 658 (9th Cir. 2005) ("[I]n the context of a civil suit, cross-examination is not, in every instance, a sine qua non of due process. It all depends on the situation.") (quotations omitted).

This Court has recognized that due process in the civil context "is a flexible concept which requires courts to balance competing interests in determining the protections to be accorded one facing a deprivation of rights." Clarke v. W.Va. Bd. of Regents, 166 W.Va. 702, 710, 279 S.E.2d 169, 175 (1981); see generally, Kremer v. Chem. Constr. Corp., 456 U.S. 461, 483 (1982) (commenting that "no single model of procedural fairness, let alone a particular form of procedure, is dictated by the Due Process Clause"). In syllabus point two of North v. Board of Regents, 160 W.Va. 248, 233 S.E.2d 411 (1977), this Court found > circumstances of a given case. However, there are certain fundamental principles in regard to procedural due process embodied in Article III, Section 10 of the West Virginia Constitution, which are: First, the more valuable the right sought to be deprived, the more safeguards will be interposed. Second, due process must generally be given before the deprivation occurs unless a compelling public policy dictates otherwise. Third, a temporary deprivation of rights may not require as large a measure of procedural due process protection as a permanent deprivation.

In North, a medical student challenged the administrative process that ultimately led to his expulsion from a State-supported university for falsification of his application for admission. Therefore, his due process claim involved a property interest, not a liberty interest. Because of the substantial property interest involved in North, we held due process procedures included "a formal written notice of charges; sufficient opportunity to prepare to rebut the charges; opportunity to have retained counsel at any hearings on the charges, to confront his accusers, and to present evidence on his own behalf; an unbiased hearing tribunal; and an adequate record of the proceedings." Syl. Pt. 3, in part, North, 160 W.Va. 248, 233 S.E.2d 411.

In the instant case, we find the petitioners were afforded procedural due process. They were provided with fundamentally fair procedures including proper notice of the petition, amended petitions and proceedings pursuant to West Virginia Code § 49-6-1(b) (2009). The circuit court appointed the petitioners counsel pursuant to West Virginia Code § 49-6-2(a) (2009). They had a full and fair opportunity to review and present evidence at the adjudicatory and dispositional hearings before an unbiased tribunal pursuant to West Virginia Code § 49-6-2 (2009). The petitioners viewed the videotaped interviews of the children prior to the adjudicatory hearing and were given the opportunity to rebut this evidence. Notably, they did not raise any alleged impropriety in the questioning techniques employed by the interviewer or attack the reliability of this evidence. Finally, the petitioners were provided a record of the proceedings below along with the right of appellate review.

The petitioners complain that they were denied the opportunity to confront and cross-examine the children. While their argument lacked development below, essentially the petitioners complain that the procedures were inadequate to minimize the risk of an erroneous finding of abuse. This assertion lacks merit. There may be situations where a circuit court could find the evidence was sufficient to overcome the rebuttable presumption that the potential psychological harm to the child outweighs the necessity of the child's testimony. The West Virginia Rules of Procedure for Child Abuse and Neglect Proceedings provide guidance when the presumption is overcome and the circuit court determines it is necessary to take testimony from a child to enhance the integrity of the fact-finding process. [13] However, the petitioners have failed to articulate with any degree

[13] Rule 8(b) provides:

> Procedure for taking testimony from children. – The court may conduct in camera interviews of a minor child, outside the presence of the parent(s). The parties' attorneys shall be allowed to attend such interviews, except when the court determines that the presence of attorneys will be of specificity how confrontation and cross-examination would have enhanced the fact-finding process in this case.

We next turn to the petitioners' argument that Rule 8(a) of the West Virginia Rules of Procedure for Child Abuse and Neglect Proceedings violates their statutory right of confrontation and cross-examination under West Virginia Code § 49-6-2(c) (2009).[14] The petitioners appear to equate this statutory provision with the rule set forth in Crawford v. Washington, 541 U.S. 36 (2004):

> especially intimidating to the child witness. When attorneys are not allowed to be present for in camera interviews of a child, the court shall, unless otherwise agreed by the parties, have the interview electronically or stenographically recorded and make the recording available to the attorneys before the evidentiary hearing resumes. Under exceptional circumstances, the court may elect not to make the recording available to the attorneys but must place the basis for a finding of exceptional circumstances on the record. Under these exceptional circumstances, the recording only will be available for review by the Supreme Court of Appeals. When attorneys are present for an in camera interview of a child, the court may, before the interview, require the attorneys to submit questions for the court to ask the child witness rather than allow the attorneys to question the child directly, and the court may require the attorney to sit in an unobtrusive manner during the in camera interview. Whether or not the parties' attorneys are permitted to attend the in camera interview, they may submit interview questions and/or topics for consideration by the court.

[14] West Virginia Code 49-6-2(c), provides, in part:

> In any proceeding pursuant to the provisions of this article, the party or parties having custodial or other parental

> Pursuant to Crawford v. Washington, 541 U.S. 36, 124 S.Ct. 1354, 158 L.Ed.2d 177 (2004), the Confrontation Clause contained within the Sixth Amendment to the United States Constitution and Section 14 of Article III of the West Virginia Constitution bars the admission of a testimonial statement by a witness who does not appear at trial, unless the witness is unavailable to testify and the accused had a prior opportunity to cross-examine the witness. Syl. Pt. 6, State v. Mechling, 219 W.Va. 366, 633 S.E.2d 311 (2006).

Syl. Pt. 6, State v. Kaufman, 227 W.Va. 537, 711 S.E.2d 607 (2011). We reject this claim because there is no authority for it in a civil proceeding. As discussed above, a child abuse and neglect hearing is a civil rather than criminal action, with the right to confront witnesses subject to "due limitations." In re Murphy, 414 S.E.2d 396, 400 (N.C.App. 1992). [15]

We find that to the extent Rule 8(a) may conflict with West Virginia Code § 49-6-2(c), there is no doubt the rule would control. See Rule 1 of the Rules of Procedure for Child Abuse and Neglect Proceedings ("These rules set forth procedures for circuit courts in child and abuse neglect proceedings instituted pursuant to W.Va.

> rights or responsibilities to the child shall be afforded a meaningful opportunity to be heard, including the opportunity to testify and to present and cross-examine witnesses.

[15] In In re Lauren R., 715 A.2d 822 (Conn. App. Ct. 1998), the court addressed a similar statute in a child abuse and neglect proceeding. The mother alleged the trial court violated her statutory right of confrontation and cross-examination when it refused to allow her daughter to testify. The appellate court upheld the trial court's decision not to question the child because requiring her to testify could "victimize" her and the child's testimony was not necessary based on the evidence. Id. 715 A.2d at 831.

Code § 49-6-1, et seq. If these rules conflict with other rules or statutes, these rules shall apply."). Moreover, the Legislature lacks the constitutional authority to direct the courts in procedural matters. West Virginia Constitution, article VIII, § 3 confers upon this Court the power to promulgate rules for all cases and proceedings, civil and criminal. "Under article [VIII], section three of our Constitution, the Supreme Court of Appeals shall have the power to promulgate rules for all of the courts of the State related to process, practice, and procedure, which shall have the force and effect of law." Syl. Pt. 1, Bennett v. Warner, 179 W.Va. 742, 372 S.E.2d 920 (1988).

Based on the foregoing, we hold that in a child abuse and neglect civil proceeding held pursuant to West Virginia Code § 49-6-2 (2009), a party does not have a procedural due process right to confront and cross-examine a child. Under Rule 8(a) of the West Virginia Rules of Procedure for Child Abuse and Neglect Proceedings, there is a rebuttable presumption that the potential psychological harm to the child outweighs the necessity of the child's testimony. The circuit court shall exclude this testimony if it finds the potential psychological harm to the child outweighs the necessity of the child's testimony.

B. Admission of Out-of-Court Statements

We now address the admissibility of the children's videotaped interviews under the West Virginia Rules of Evidence, which remain the paramount authority in determining the admissibility of evidence in circuit courts.[16] See Syl. Pt. 7, State v. Derr, 192 W.Va. 165, 451 S.E.2d 731 (1994); 1 Franklin D. Cleckley, Handbook on Evidence for West Virginia Lawyers § 101.02 at 1-6 (5th ed. 2012). We note from the onset the petitioners did not make a sufficient objection to the use of this evidence. In In re Tiffany Marie S., 196 W.Va. 223, 234, 470 S.E.2d 177, 188 (1996), we stated:

> The West Virginia Rules of Evidence declare that parties must object to the wrongful offer of evidence at a particular time and with reasonable specificity. The failure to object at the time and in the manner designated by Rule 103(a) of the West Virginia Rules of Evidence is treated as a procedural default, with the result that the evidence, even if erroneous, becomes the facts of the case. West Virginia practice imposes the same duty of diligence in regard to nonjury cases. Silence in the circuit court typically constitutes a waiver of objection. See W.Va. R. Evid. 103(a)(1).

The petitioners' only objection on hearsay grounds to the introduction of the children's out-of-court statements came in their response to the DHHR's motion in limine filed prior to the adjudicatory hearing. At oral argument in this matter, the petitioners contended that, by its very nature, a motion in limine does not require an objection to preserve the alleged error for appeal. This argument would be correct had they objected to the circuit court's ruling. "An objection to an adverse ruling on a motion in limine to bar evidence at trial will preserve the point, even though no objection was made at the time the evidence was offered, unless there has been a significant change in the basis for admitting the evidence." Syl. Pt. 1, Wilmer v. Hinkle, 180 W.Va. 660, 379 S.E.2d 383 (1989). However, the petitioners did not object to the circuit court's ruling on the motion in limine at the adjudicatory hearing.

In addition, when the children's videotaped interviews were introduced and admitted into the record, the petitioners failed to object.[17] Our general rule is "[w]here objections were not shown to have been made in the trial court, and the matters concerned were not jurisdictional in character, such objections will not be considered upon appeal." Syl. Pt. 7, Wheeling Dollar Savings & Trust Co. v. Leedy, 158 W.Va. 926, 216 S.E.2d 560 (1975). (Citation omitted). Clearly, the response to the motion in limine did not relate to a jurisdictional matter. It was made for the purpose of excluding out-of-court statements. Therefore, "[a]t most, it went to the admissibility of the evidence. As such, the matter was not jurisdictional and, in the absence of an objection, was not preserved for appeal." Smith v. Holloway Constr. Co., 169 W.Va. 722-23, 289 S.E.2d 230-31 (1982); see also Coleman v. Sopher, 201 W.Va. 588, 601, 499 S.E.2d 592, 605 (1997) (discussing failure to preserve alleged errors when party presented motion in limine for exclusion of evidence but record failed to establish that specific challenges raised were presented to or addressed by court below on the record).

[17] The circuit court's adjudicatory order provides, in error, that the petitioners objected to the admission of the videotaped interviews.

The petitioners' failure to object to the admission of the children's statements at the adjudicatory hearing is significant for purposes of our appellate review. Because this evidence was not challenged, the circuit court did not specify on the record what hearsay exception(s) applied. However, we find the issue warrants brief discussion and we may review an unpreserved error if the error is "plain." See W.Va. R. Evid. 103(d). Under a plain error analysis "the alleged error must have seriously affected the fairness or integrity of the trial." In re Tiffany Marie S., 196 W.Va. at 234, 470 S.E.2d at 188.

In reviewing the circuit court's admission of this evidence, we begin with the well-established rule that

> [g]enerally, out-of-court statements made by someone other than the declarant while testifying are not admissible unless: 1) the statement is not being offered for the truth of the matter asserted, but for some other purpose such as motive, intent, state-of-mind, identification or reasonableness of the party's action; 2) the statement is not hearsay under the rules; or 3) the statement is hearsay but falls within an exception provided for in the rules.

Syl. Pt. 1, State v. Maynard, 183 W.Va. 1, 393 S.E.2d 221 (1990). The purpose of excluding hearsay testimony at trial is to prevent unreliable information from reaching the jury.

The first step of our analysis is to determine whether the videotaped interviews of the children were hearsay under West Virginia Rule of Evidence 801(c).

We answer this question in the affirmative as the out-of-court statements were offered to prove the truth of the matter asserted. See id.

We now proceed to determine if the out-of-court statements fell within any of the hearsay exceptions. "[W]hen a child is the declarant, virtually every state has a child hearsay exception, or uses a catch all to permit hearsay that would otherwise be barred." Myrna Raeder, Domestic Violence, Child Abuse, and Trustworthiness Exceptions After Crawford, 20 Crim. Just. 24, 33 (Summer 2005). "A few states have also adopted exceptions that require the videotaping of the child interviews typically by law enforcement, psychologists, social workers, or others employed by the local child services agency. This approach is designed to show . . . that the child has not been misled by suggestive questioning techniques[.]" Id.

Under circumstances factually similar to the instant case, other jurisdictions have found videotaped interviews of child sexual abuse victims admissible under the "catch all" or residual exception to the hearsay rule. In In re A.S.W., 834 P.2d 801 (Alaska 1992) the court addressed the question of whether a videotaped interview of a child identifying her father as an abuser was properly admissible in parental termination proceedings. The videotaped interview lasted approximately one hour and the victim described in child-like terms explicit sexual abuse. Prior to the adjudicatory hearing, the guardian ad litem moved for a protective order precluding the use of the child as a witness. In granting the motion, the court found the child was unavailable because the trauma of testifying could aggravate her medical problems. Both parties briefed this issue before the adjudicatory hearing. The court admitted the videotaped statement under the residual exceptions to the hearsay rules. On appeal, the father claimed the court abused its discretion in admitting the videotaped interview because it lacked the circumstantial guarantees of trustworthiness that would justify its admission. The Supreme Court of Alaska disagreed and held "[t]he out-of-court statements of a child in proceedings where abuse is alleged are often quite necessary to the administration of justice. Therefore, if the child is unavailable to testify, the courts should admit the statements if the statements are sufficiently reliable." Id. at 804.

In In re Pamela A.G., 134 P.3d 746 (N.M. 2006), the state filed a notice of intent to offer a child's videotaped interview in an abuse and neglect proceeding in lieu of her testimony but did not indicate which hearsay exception it relied upon. The court analyzed the statements and found they were unambiguous in both the detailed description of the abuse and the identity of the abuser. The court admitted the statements under the catch all exception to the hearsay rule. On appeal, the Supreme Court of New Mexico upheld the termination of parental rights and found the child's out-of-court statements had sufficient guarantees of trustworthiness to be admissible under the hearsay catch all exception. Id. at 752.

In the instant case, we find no error in the circuit court's decision to admit the videotaped interviews of the children because the record reflects they fall under the residual exceptions to the hearsay rules, embodied in West Virginia Rules of Evidence 803(24) and 804(b)(5). [18] This Court has held:

> The language of Rule 804(b)(5) of the West Virginia Rules of Evidence and its counterpart in Rule 803(24) requires that five general factors must be met in order for hearsay evidence to be admissible under the rules. First and most important is the trustworthiness of the statement, which must be equivalent to the trustworthiness underlying the specific exceptions to the hearsay rule. Second, the statement must be offered to prove a material fact. Third, the statement must be shown to be more probative on the issue for which it is offered than any other evidence the proponent can reasonably procure. Fourth, admission of the statement must comport with the general purpose of the rules of evidence and the interest of justice. Fifth, adequate notice of the statement must be afforded the other party to provide that party a fair opportunity to meet the evidence.

[18] The residual exceptions to the hearsay rules permit the admission of hearsay statements that do not fall within one of the traditional exceptions. Rule 803(24) (availability of declarant immaterial) provides, in part:

> A statement not specifically covered by any of the foregoing exceptions but having equivalent circumstantial guarantees of trustworthiness, if the court determines that (A) the statement is offered as evidence of a material fact; (B) the statement is more probative on the point for which it is offered than any other evidence which the proponent can procure through reasonable efforts; and (C) the general purposes of these rules and the interests of justice will best be served by admission of the statement into evidence. However, a statement may not be admitted under this exception unless the proponent of it makes known to the adverse party sufficiently in advance of the trial or hearing to provide the adverse party with a fair opportunity to prepare to meet it, his intention to offer the statement and the particulars of it, including the name and address of the declarant.

Rule 804(b)(5) (declarant unavailable) contains the identical wording.

Syl. Pt. 5, State v. Smith, 178 W.Va. 104, 358 S.E.2d 188 (1987).

It is apparent the DHHR proved requisite compliance with the above factors. As we stated in Smith, our major concern with any evidence admitted under this exception is its reliability. Id. First, the petitioners do not attack the trustworthiness of the children's hearsay statements or the interview techniques. Second, this evidence is clearly probative on the material issue of whether the children were sexually abused. Third, the circuit court assessed these videotaped interviews and was in the best position to determine if they were more probative on the point for which they were offered than other evidence, and whether they had sufficient guarantees of trustworthiness to be reliable. Fourth, the interest of justice would be served by admission of these statements considering the restrictions on taking a child's testimony under Rule 8(a) of the West Virginia Rules of Procedure for Child Abuse and Neglect. Finally, the DHHR provided notice prior to the adjudicatory hearing that it intended to offer this evidence and the petitioners were provided with a fair opportunity to prepare to meet it. See Smith, 178 W.Va. at 113, 358 S.E.2d at 197.

As discussed above, because the evidence was not challenged at the adjudicatory hearing, the circuit court did not articulate its reason(s) for admitting these statements. Nevertheless, this Court allocates significant discretion to the circuit court in making evidentiary rulings. "Unlike a jury, a trial judge in a bench trial is presumed to know the law and to follow it" and this presumption may only be rebutted when the record shows otherwise. Misty D.G. v. Rodney L.F., 144 W.Va. 144, 151, 650 S.E.2d 243, 250 (2007) (quoting People v. Thorne, 817 N.E.2d 1163, 1177 (Ill.App. 2004)).[19]

C. Termination of Father's Parental Rights

We now turn to the merits of the circuit court's adjudication and disposition of the father. In view of the elaborate statement of the facts in the circuit court's adjudicatory order, we can greatly abbreviate our own. The circuit court reviewed the evidence and found the father "forced [N.L.] to engage in sexual intercourse with him" on multiple occasions. The circuit court also found the father sexually abused D.S. on one occasion. Determining whether a parent has neglected or abused his children is a predominantly fact-bound endeavor. It follows that, absent a mistake of law, an appellate tribunal should disturb a circuit court's determination only if it is clearly erroneous. No clear error appears, and we find the circuit court was not clearly wrong in holding the DHHR satisfied its burden of proof.

The father testified at the adjudicatory hearing and denied all allegations against him. Clearly, the circuit court was not persuaded by his testimony. This Court [19] "This Court may, on appeal, affirm the judgment of the lower court when it appears that such judgment is correct on any legal ground disclosed by the record, regardless of the ground, reason or theory assigned by the lower court as the basis for its judgment." Syl. Pt. 3, Barnett v. Wolfok, 149 W.Va. 246, 140 S.E.2d 466 (1965).

confers great deference to credibility determinations made following a bench trial because the circuit court has viewed the demeanor of the witnesses. See Brown v. Gobble, 196 W.Va. 559, 565, 474 S.E.2d 489, 495 (1996); see generally, State v. Guthrie, 194 W.Va. 657, 669 n.9, 461 S.E.2d 163, 175 n.9 (1995) ("An appellate court may not decide the credibility of witnesses . . . as that is the exclusive function and task of the trier of fact.").

Based on the foregoing, we find that termination of the father's parental rights in the present proceeding is warranted. We believe the DHHR proved that the father sexually abused N.L. and D.S. Furthermore, the children remain at substantial risk of significant harm from the father as there was no showing of a reasonable likelihood that the conditions of abuse could be substantially corrected. As we have previously explained:

> "'"Termination of parental rights, the most drastic remedy under the statutory provision covering the disposition of neglected children, W.Va. Code, 49-6-5 [1977] may be employed without the use of intervening less restrictive alternatives when it is found that there is no reasonable likelihood under W.Va. Code, 49-6-5(b) [1977] that conditions of neglect or abuse can be substantially corrected." Syllabus Point 2, In re R.J.M., 164 W.Va. 496, 266 S.E.2d 114 (1980).' Syllabus point 4, In re Jonathan P., 1982 W.Va. 302, 387 S.E.2d 537 (1989)." Syl. Pt. 1, In re Jeffrey R.L., 190 W.Va. 24, 435 S.E.2d 162 (1993).

Syl. Pt. 6, In re Isaiah A., 228 W.Va. 176, 718 S.E.2d 775 (2010).

D. Termination of Mother's Parental Rights

In her appeal, the mother asserts the circuit court erred by terminating her parental rights without granting a post-adjudicatory improvement period when the DHHR failed to make reasonable efforts to reunify the family. The mother contends the only service offered to her for almost a year while the case was pending was supervised visitation. Further, the mother argues that she is entitled to a remand for another adjudicatory hearing because N.L. testified under oath in the father's subsequent criminal trial that she did not tell the mother about the sexual abuse. We are not persuaded by these arguments.

The circuit court did not err in holding the DHHR satisfied its burden of proof with regard to the mother. The evidence throughout this case concerned the mother's repeated pattern of allowing the father to have contact with the children despite clear warnings to the contrary.[20] The mother knowingly violated the court's order in the 2009 guardianship matter that specified the father was not to live in the home with or have any contact with N.L. because of substantiated sexual abuse claims against him. As the DHHR explained, the mother was not offered services or an improvement period because she was living with the father, even at the time of the dispositional hearing. At [20] The mother also criticizes the circuit court's adjudicatory findings and states the ruling essentially implies that she "should have known" of the risk the father posed. We reject this argument because the circuit court found her claims of ignorance not credible. In its adjudicatory order, the circuit court stated the mother failed to investigate N.L.'s accusations and "casually dismissed the child's serious accusations by simply telling the child that she did not believe" her.

oral argument in this matter, the guardian ad litem for the children expressed his frustration that throughout the entire time this case was pending, the mother did nothing but ignore his requests and the requests of her attorney to have the father move out of the home.

Considering the foregoing, we find the circuit court did not err in denying the mother's request for an improvement period because any attempt would be futile. "'[C]ourts are not required to exhaust every speculative possibility of parental improvement . . . where it appears that the welfare of the child will be seriously threatened. . . .' Syl. Pt. 1, in part, In re R.J.M., 164 W.Va. 496, 266 S.E.2d 114 (1980)." Syl. Pt. 4, in part, In re Cecil T., 228 W.Va. 89, 717 S.E.2d 873 (2011). Moreover, the DHHR was not required to make reasonable efforts in this case to preserve the family because the children were subjected to aggravated circumstances of sexual abuse. See W.Va. Code § 49-6-3(d)(1).

Accordingly, we find the circuit court had before it sufficient evidence with which to terminate the mother's parental rights and deny her request for an improvement period. We deny her request to remand the case for a new adjudicatory hearing because we find N.L.'s testimony at the father's subsequent criminal trial would not change the outcome of these proceedings.

IV. CONCLUSION

Based upon the foregoing, the final order of the Circuit Court of Fayette County entered May 3, 2013, is affirmed.

Affirmed.

JUSTICE McGRAW delivered the Opinion of the Court.

SYLLABUS BY THE COURT

1. "When the parental rights of a parent to a child have been involuntarily terminated, W. Va. Code, 49-6-5b(a)(3) [1998] requires the Department of Health and Human Resources to file a petition, to join in a petition, or to otherwise seek a ruling in any pending proceeding, to terminate parental rights as to any sibling(s) of that child." Syl. pt. 1, In re George Glen B. Jr., 207 W. Va. 346, 532 S.E.2d 64 (2000).

2. "While the Department of Health and Human Resources has a duty to file, join or participate in proceedings to terminate parental rights in the circumstances listed in W. Va. Code, 49-6-5b(a)(3) [1998], the Department must still comply with the evidentiary standards established by the Legislature in W. Va. Code, 49-6-2 [1996] before a court may terminate parental rights to a child, and must comply with the evidentiary standards established in W. Va. Code, 49-6-3 [1998] before a court may grant the Department the authority to take emergency, temporary custody of a child." Syl. pt. 2, In re George Glen B. Jr., 207 W. Va. 346, 532 S.E.2d 64 (2000).

3. In the context of an abuse and neglect proceeding, a court may accept a parent's voluntary relinquishment of parental rights without the consent of the West Virginia Department of Health and Human Resources, provided that the agreement meets the requirements of W.Va. Code § 49-6-7 (1977), where applicable, and the relevant provisions of the Rules of Procedure for Abuse and Neglect Proceedings.

4. A circuit court has discretion in an abuse and neglect proceeding to accept a proffered voluntary termination of parental rights, or to reject it and proceed to a decision on involuntary termination. Such discretion must be exercised after an independent review of all relevant factors, and the court is not obliged to adopt any position advocated by the Department of Health and Human Resources.

McGraw, Justice:

The West Virginia Department of Health and Human Services (the "Department") filed a Petition for Finding of Abuse and/or Neglect and/or Abandonment against a mother, eventually seeking the involuntary termination of her parental rights with respect to her two children. As the termination proceedings neared their end, the mother offered to execute a voluntary relinquishment of her parental rights, to which the Department refused to agree. The lower court held that because the Department did not agree to the mother's voluntary relinquishment, the court was obliged to rule on the petition and to terminate her rights involuntarily or not at all. The mother appeals, arguing that the Department's consent was not required for the court to consider her voluntary relinquishment. She argues that the court should have approved her voluntary relinquishment, and not proceeded to an involuntary termination. We agree with the mother, in part, and therefore reverse the decision of the lower court.

BACKGROUND

Victoria M. is the biological mother of the two children who are the subject of this action, Emmett M. L. and James G. Child James is the older of the two children, born in July 1996, and is the child of Victoria M. and James, Sr. Child Emmett was born later, in July of 1999, and is the biological child of Victoria M. and Emmett Sr.[1] During most of the time periods at issue in this case, Victoria M. and the children lived with her boyfriend, Emmett Sr.

The family has had frequent contact with the criminal justice and child welfare systems. The West Virginia Department of Health and Human Services (the "Department") is the state agency with ultimate responsibility for child abuse and neglect cases. Within the Department, the Division of Child Protective Services ("CPS") is responsible for investigating allegations of child abuse or neglect. W.Va. Code § 49-6A-9 (2001). During 1997, CPS received a referral that James, who had been born prematurely, was not being taken to his scheduled medical appointments by his mother. Later, in January 1999, CPS received a referral that James, then two, had cigarette burns on the palms of both hands, a cigarette burn on his chest, various bruises on his head and cheek, and burns on his genitalia. Apparently the Department attempted to provide the family with parenting and behavior management services, but these efforts failed, in part because James moved temporarily to his maternal grandmother's house in Ohio, and Emmett Sr. was jailed for domestic battery of Victoria.

[1]As we have done in the past in domestic and juvenile cases involving sensitive facts, we do not use the last names of the parties. See State v. George W. H., 190 W. Va. 558, 562 n.1, 439 S.E.2d 423, 427 n.1 (1993). Also, for ease of reading we omit most initials and use the suffix "Sr." to differentiate father from child, though the parties may not actually use such suffix.

In July 1999, CPS received another referral, this one stating that Victoria had spanked James with a fly swatter, leaving a bruise on the child's leg and buttocks. As a result, the Department filed a "Petition for Finding of Abuse and/or Neglect and/or Abandonment" (a "petition") on behalf of both children on July 28, 1999, in the Circuit Court of Raleigh County. W. Va. Code § 49-1-1 et seq. provides for a preliminary hearing to be held shortly after the filing of a petition, followed later by an adjudicatory hearing, which in turn is followed by a disposition hearing. The court may allow improvement periods for the parents at various times during the proceedings.

In the instant case, the lower court held the preliminary hearing on August 19, 1999, at which time the parties informed the court of an agreed upon three-month improvement period during which the mother would attend parenting classes and behavior modification counseling to help control her anger, and would have weekly supervised visitation with the children.[2]

The court held an adjudicatory hearing on January 21, 2000. The court found that Victoria had not complied with the agreement, that the Department's evidence that James had suffered abuse was uncontested, and that the allegations in the petition were supported by clear and convincing evidence. The court then terminated Victoria's parental rights to both children, and left legal and physical custody of the children with the Department. The court left unresolved the question of the parental rights of the respective fathers, pending further investigation.

As the case proceeded, boyfriend Emmett Sr., asked for a paternity test, which established that he was the father of child Emmett, and the court ordered a home study of James Sr., father of child James. Also during this time, Victoria M. moved the court to reconsider its termination of her parental rights. In April 2000, the court reconsidered its January ruling and granted Victoria and her boyfriend Emmett an improvement period, during which they had the opportunity to demonstrate that conditions in the home had improved.

Apparently Victoria and Emmett were unable to comply with the improvement plan, and the Department renewed its request for the permanent involuntary termination of Victoria's and Emmett's parental rights. The court held a final disposition hearing on February 1, 2001, some eighteen months after the Department first filed a petition. At this hearing, at which the court was prepared to order the involuntary termination of the parental rights of Emmett and Victoria, Victoria tendered a signed voluntary relinquishment of her parental rights.

The court refused to accept and ratify the voluntary relinquishment, finding that this offer was in the nature of a settlement to which the Department did not agree, and finding further that the Court had no power to force the Department to agree to such a settlement. By order dated February 1 and filed April 27, 2001, the court involuntarily and permanently terminated Victoria's parental rights as to both children and Emmett's parental rights as to child Emmett. The order granted custody of both children to the Department, but required the Department to attempt to unify James with his natural father, James Sr. Finally, the order stated that "the Department shall not be required to accept the voluntary relinquishment of [Victoria] the respondent mother."

Only Victoria appeals, and in her appeal she does not ask that her parental rights be reinstated, but claims only that the court erred in not accepting her offer of a voluntary relinquishment. She argues that there is no legal authority whereby during the pendency of an abuse and neglect case, the Department of Health and Human Services, or the circuit court may reject a parent's offer to voluntarily relinquish his or her parental rights. Because we partially agree with her on this limited point, we must reverse the decision of the lower court.

II.

STANDARD OF REVIEW

We have often explained the standard of review used by this Court in cases such as this: "For appeals resulting from abuse and neglect proceedings, such as the case sub judice, we employ a compound standard of review: conclusions of law are subject to a de novo review, while findings of fact are weighed against a clearly erroneous standard." In re

Emily, 208 W. Va. 325, 332, 540 S.E.2d 542, 549 (2000). Or, as we explained at greater length in another case:

> Although conclusions of law reached by a circuit court are subject to de novo review, when an action, such as an abuse and neglect case, is tried upon the facts without a jury, the circuit court shall make a determination based upon the evidence and shall make findings of fact and conclusions of law as to whether such child is abused or neglected. These findings shall not be set aside by a reviewing court unless clearly erroneous. A finding is clearly erroneous when, although there is evidence to support the finding, the reviewing court on the entire evidence is left with the definite and firm conviction that a mistake has been committed. However, a reviewing court may not overturn a finding simply because it would have decided the case differently, and it must affirm a finding if the circuit court's account of the evidence is plausible in light of the record viewed in its entirety.

Syl. pt. 1, In re Tiffany Marie S., 196 W. Va. 223, 470 S.E.2d 177 (1996). In the instant case, because we are only asked to consider a question of law, our review is simply de novo.

III.

DISCUSSION

The basis of Victoria's argument is that there is no authority that would allow the Department, or the circuit court, to refuse her offer to voluntarily relinquish her rights. The Department argues that there is no authority that requires it or the court to accept such a relinquishment. Furthermore, the Department suggests that Victoria only made the voluntary offer because she knew she would lose these children, but wished to limit the Department's ability to take action against her should she later have another child.

Our law provides for the voluntary termination of parental rights, but places certain limits on such an action: "An agreement of a natural parent in termination of parental rights shall be valid if made by a duly acknowledged writing, and entered into under circumstances free from duress and fraud." W. Va. Code § 49-6-7 (1977). The Rules of Procedure for Child Abuse and Neglect Proceedings place other requirements on any such voluntary termination. First, the Rules demand that any stipulation made by a party in an abuse or neglect proceeding must be made voluntarily and in the best interest of the child:

> (b) Voluntariness of consent.—Before determining whether or not to accept a stipulation of disposition, the court shall determine that the parties and persons entitled to notice and the opportunity to be heard, understand the contents of the stipulation and its consequences, and that the parties voluntarily consent to its terms. The court must ultimately decide whether the stipulation of disposition meets the purposes of these rules, controlling statutes and is in the best interests of the child. The court shall hear any objection to the stipulation of disposition made by any party or persons entitled to notice and the opportunity to be heard. The stipulations shall be specifically incorporated in their entirety into the court's order reflecting disposition of the case.

Child Abuse and Neglect Proceedings Rule 33 (2000). And the Rules have specific requirements for a voluntary termination of parental rights:

> (a) Uncontested termination of parental rights.—If a parent voluntarily relinquishes parental rights or fails to contest termination of parental rights, the court shall make the following inquiry at the disposition hearing: . . .
> (3) If the parent(s) is/are present in court and voluntarily has/have signed a relinquishment of parental rights, the court shall determine whether the parent(s) fully understand(s) the consequences of a termination of parental rights, is/are aware of > possible less drastic alternatives than termination, and was/were informed of the right to a hearing and to representation by counsel.

Child Abuse and Neglect Proceedings Rule 35 (2000). While the statute and the Rules demonstrate a strong concern that any so-called voluntary termination of parental rights truly be a voluntary decision, i.e., made with an understanding of the consequences and free of duress, they do not authorize the Department, by withholding its agreement, to preclude a circuit court from accepting a parent's truly voluntary agreement to the termination of his or her parental rights.

The Department is correct that an involuntary termination of parental rights carries lasting consequences for the parent beyond the termination of rights with respect to the child or children in question. As the Department points out, it is required by statute to file a petition regarding any other children of a parent who has had his or her rights involuntarily terminated.

> (a) Except as provided in subsection (b) of this section, the department shall file or join in a petition or otherwise seek a ruling in any pending proceeding to terminate parental rights:
> (1) If a child has been in foster care for fifteen of the most recent twenty-two months as determined by the earlier of the date of the first judicial finding that the child is subjected to abuse or neglect or the date which is sixty days after the child is removed from the home;
> (2) If a court has determined the child is abandoned; or

> (3) If a court has determined the parent has committed murder or voluntary manslaughter of another of his or her children; has attempted or conspired to commit such murder or voluntary manslaughter or has been an accessory before or after the fact of either crime; has committed unlawful or malicious wounding resulting in serious bodily injury to the child or to another of his or her children; or the parental rights of the parent to a sibling have been terminated involuntarily.

W. Va. Code § 49-6-5b (1998) (emphasis added). Thus, if the termination of Victoria's parental rights with respect to her two children is deemed involuntary, the Department will have a duty to file a petition if she has any additional children.

We have explained that the involuntary termination of a parent's rights, while requiring the Department to file a petition, does not result in the automatic termination of rights as to other children born to the same parent:

> When the parental rights of a parent to a child have been involuntarily terminated, W. Va. Code, 49-6-5b(a)(3) [1998] requires the Department of Health and Human Resources to file a petition, to join in a petition, or to otherwise seek a ruling in any pending proceeding, to terminate parental rights as to any sibling(s) of that child.
> While the Department of Health and Human Resources has a duty to file, join or participate in proceedings to terminate parental rights in the circumstances listed in W. Va. Code, 49-6-5b(a)(3) [1998], the Department must still comply with the evidentiary standards established by the Legislature in W. Va. Code, 49-6-2 [1996] before a court may terminate parental rights to a child, and must comply with the evidentiary standards established in W. Va. Code, 49-6-3 [1998] before a court may grant the Department the authority to take emergency, temporary custody of a child.

Syl. pts. 1 and 2, In re George Glen B. Jr., 207 W. Va. 346, 532 S.E.2d 64 (2000). While this language is instructive, it does not bear directly on the outcome of the instant case. The question before this Court today is whether the Department, or the circuit court, may refuse to accept a voluntary termination of parental rights in an abuse and neglect proceeding.

The Department directs us to a case where a mother consented to the adoption of her child by a third party during the pendency of a child abuse and neglect proceeding. We found in that case that language in W. Va. Code § 49-6-5(a)(6)(1992) prevented such an action before the abuse and neglect proceeding reached its end:

> This language [of W.Va. Code, 49-6-5(a)(6)(1992)] is designed to forestall any attempt by anyone to obtain custody of an abused or neglected child through adoption until there is a final disposition of the abuse and neglect case by the circuit court. Thus, the consent to adopt given by Jacqueline F. is a nugatory act until the final disposition of this case.
> From the foregoing provisions, we conclude that where a child abuse and neglect proceeding has been filed against a parent, such parent may not confer any rights on a third party by executing a consent to adopt during the pendency of the proceeding.

Alonzo v. Jacqueline F., 191 W. Va. 248, 250, 445 S.E.2d 189, 191 (1994).

While it is true that Alonzo stands for the proposition that a parent's right to control the custody or placement of a child is limited while the state is proceeding against that parent, we are faced with a somewhat different issue in the instant case. In this case, the nature of the termination of rights, voluntary or involuntary, does not affect these children; their legal relationship with their mother has in any event been severed. The nature of the termination of rights basically affects, at present, only one person -- Victoria.

We agree with the Department that a parent like Victoria may have similar problems with later-born children. We understand the Department's concern that later-born children not "fall through the cracks" and escape the notice of the authorities. The guiding principle in any child abuse or neglect proceeding is to do what is best for the child: "First and foremost in a contest involving the custody of a child is the consideration of that child's welfare. It has been held repeatedly by this Court that the welfare of the child is the polar star by which the discretion of the court will be guided." State ex rel. Cash v. Lively, 155 W. Va. 801, 804, 187 S.E.2d 601, 604 (1972); accord, Michael K. T. v. Tina L. T., 182 W. Va. 399, 405, 387 S.E.2d 866, 872 (1989); State ex rel. Rose L. v. Pancake, 209 W. Va. 188, 192, 544 S.E.2d 403, 407 (2001) (Davis, J. concurring).

We cannot overstate this precept. Doing what can be done to rescue a child from an abusive situation is more than a metaphorical celestial aid to our navigation; the welfare of the child is the raison d'etre for our abuse and neglect law - nothing is more important. Nothing in this opinion should be construed as a departure from this principle.

We note that while W.Va. Code § 49-6-5b (1998) does not include the voluntary termination of parental rights as one of the factors triggering a new petition against a parent with additional children, the absence of one of these factors does not in any way prevent the Department from filing such a petition should conditions warrant. Nothing prevents the Department from conducting an investigation if it believes that a parent who has voluntarily terminated parental rights with respect to one child might be mistreating another child, or from providing such a parent with assistance or counseling where available.

We also recognize that in some circumstances a truly voluntary termination is clearly the best disposition of an abuse and neglect petition. The statutes do not say that the DHHR is the determiner of when such circumstances exist, nor is the parent appointed by statute as the determiner of such circumstances. Rather, the statutes provide that the circuit judge must independently make such a determination, having heard from all sides.

We hold, therefore, that in the context of an abuse and neglect proceeding, a court may accept a parent's voluntary relinquishment of parental rights without the consent of the West Virginia Department of Health and Human Resources, provided that the agreement meets the requirements of W.Va. Code § 49-6-7 (1977)[3], where applicable, and the relevant provisions of the Rules of Procedure for Abuse and Neglect Proceedings. The Department, of course, had every right to oppose the agreement that was offered by Victoria for the voluntary termination of her parental rights. But we find no authority for the proposition that the circuit court was bound to adopt the Department's position.

[3]Our ruling in this case is in harmony with our decision in the case of In re: Tessla N. M. and Sarah S. B., ___ W. Va. ___, ___ S.E.2d ___ (No. 29964, June 13, 2002). While the instant case deals with a written agreement, the Tessla opinion deals with a voluntary relinquishment of rights made orally in open court, which the court in that case willingly accepted, but which the mother later wished to retract. We held in Tessla that, because the Rules of Procedure for Child Abuse and Neglect Proceedings have provisions for making an oral relinquishment of parental rights, no writing is needed so long as one complies with the (continued...)

We hold, therefore, that a circuit court has discretion in an abuse and neglect proceeding to accept a proffered voluntary termination of parental rights, or to reject it and proceed to a decision on involuntary termination. Such discretion must be exercised after an independent review of all relevant factors, and the court is not obliged to adopt any position advocated by the Department of Health and Human Resources.

In the instant case, the circuit court did not exercise its discretion, but rather viewed itself as bound by the non-acquiescence of the DHHR to a voluntary termination. This, we conclude, was erroneous.

v.

Honorable Elliott E. MAYNARD, Judge of the Circuit Court of Mingo County, and Steve M., Respondents.

No. 19948

Submitted March 12, 1991

Decided July 29, 1991

SYLLABUS BY THE COURT

1. " '[C]ourts are not required to exhaust every speculative possibility of parental improvement before terminating parental rights where it appears that the welfare of the child will be seriously threatened and this is particularly applicable to children under the age of three years who are more susceptible to illness, need consistent close interaction with fully committed adults, and are likely to have their emotional and physical development retarded by numerous placements.' Syl.Pt. 1, in part, In re R.J.M., [164] W.Va. [496], 266 S.E.2d 114 (1980)." Syl.Pt. 1, in part, In re Darla B., 175 W.Va. 137, 331 S.E.2d 868 (1985).

2. Abandonment of a child by a parent(s) constitutes compelling circumstances sufficient to justify the denial of an improvement period.

3. It is a traumatic experience for children to undergo sudden and dramatic changes in their permanent custodians. Lower courts in cases such as these should provide, whenever possible, for a gradual transition period, especially where young children are involved. Further, such gradual transition periods should be developed in a manner intended to foster the emotional adjustment of the children to this change and to maintain as much stability as possible in their lives.

4. In cases where there is a termination of parental rights, the circuit court should consider whether continued association with siblings in other placements is in the child's best interests, and if such continued association is in such child's best interests, the court should enter an appropriate order to preserve the rights of siblings to continued contact.

5. The guardian ad litem's role in abuse and neglect proceedings does not actually cease until such time as the child is placed in a permanent home.

Jane Moran, Williamson, for petitioners.

Teresa McCune, Williamson, for respondent Steve M.

WORKMAN, Justice:
This case is before the Court upon a petition for writ of prohibition See footnote 1 against the Honorable Elliott E. Maynard, Judge of the Circuit Court of Mingo County, by the petitioners, James M. See footnote 2, Timothy M., Ike S.M., and Brandon M., who seek relief from a January 11, 1991, order in which the lower court granted the respondent father, Steve M.'s, motion for an in-home improvement period in Ohio and further ordered that Timothy M. and James M. be surrendered to respondent's custody on the night of January 11, 1991, with Ike S.M. and Brandon M. being surrendered to his custody within thirty days thereafter. See footnote 3 Petitioners contend that the court abused its discretion in awarding the father of the children an in-home improvement period and disregarding the compelling needs and best interests of the children. We agree with the petitioners' contention and award the writs of prohibition requested, thereby reversing the lower court's ruling and directing the lower court to enter an order terminating the parental rights to these children.

During the course of the proceedings below, Betty M. related a marital history marked by her husband's alcohol abuse and physical abuse toward her severe enough to have required her hospitalization. There were frequent separations, the last in late December 1988, when Steve M. quit his job, abandoned the family and moved to Ohio. When Steve M. departed, he left his wife no transportation and a $1,500.00 heating bill. At that time, James (or Jamie) was three years old, Timothy (or Timmy) was two years old, Ike was approximately twelve months old, and Betty M. was pregnant with their fourth child, Brandon. The family had been living in a trailer in Justice, Mingo County, for approximately three weeks, but was unable to pay the rent after Steve M's departure and stayed temporarily at the Tug Valley Recovery Shelter.

When Betty M. was abandoned with three children under four and another on the way, she was not well-equipped to survive. The record reflects that she had also been a victim of physical and emotional abuse by an alcoholic father. Married at seventeen, she had a full scale I.Q. of seventy-six, and her verbal comprehension skills were also very low. Psychological evaluations indicated she was unable to cope with many of life's simplest problems, with one of her most pronounced ineptitudes being in the area of parenting.

Meanwhile, on December 29, 1988, not long after Steve M. left his family, the Department of Human Services See footnote 4 (hereinafter referred to as DHS) was referred to the home where Betty M. and her three children were then living. The DHS report indicated that at the time of the referral, the children were found to be dirty and improperly dressed, with no coats or shoes. Further, the oldest child was suffering from swollen genitals, a condition which Betty M. told DHS had existed for some time, and the youngest child had a cold and severe diarrhea. The family was living a somewhat nomadic lifestyle, moving about from place to place. At the time of the referral to DHS, they were residing with three men, at least one of whom was described as very loud, intoxicated, and rude on the occasion of the DHS visit.

On that same day, DHS transported the family to a health care center where the children were examined and treated. Jamie was referred to a physician for his genital condition. The family was also assisted with food, shelter, clothing, transportation, and parenting counselling. They were placed at the Mountaineer Hotel from December 29, 1988, through January 4, 1989, under a homeless program, because they had no money, relatives, or any other place to stay.

The DHS on January 10, 1989, rented an apartment for the family, and continued to assist them with food, diapers, medicine and clothing. However, Mrs. M. left the apartment without notifying the landlord or DHS, leaving behind two large boxes of food, a lot of the children's clothing, and substantial damage to the apartment.

Jamie had been diagnosed as having a cyst on his scrotum, and scheduled for surgery on February 15, 1989. However, Betty M. failed to bring the child for the appointment.

Mrs. M. surfaced again on February 16, 1989, when she called DHS to advise that they were once again homeless and that the youngest child (Ike) had been sick and not had anything to drink for seven days. DHS provided immediate medical attention and assigned a DHS volunteer to work with Betty M. to care for the children. Prescriptions were given for the child, but never filled. The family left the Williamson area almost immediately. The family had also apparently been receiving AFDC benefits from the State of Ohio, and Mrs. M. would go there periodically to pick up her check. The D.H.S. would lose contact with her until she needed more assistance.

Therefore, the DHS, on February 16, 1989, filed a petition seeking removal of the three children from the custody of their mother for both physical and medical neglect. The petition also alleged that Steve M. had left the family home. The children were taken into the custody of DHS, and a preliminary hearing was scheduled for February 21, 1989. Although the DHS was forced to give Steve M. notice of the preliminary hearing via publication in a Columbus, Ohio, newspaper, since his whereabouts were unknown, the record does indicate that, by his own admission, he learned of the removal of his children by the DHS in March 1989 in a phone conversation with his sister. A preliminary hearing was conducted on February 21, 1989, and the lower court granted a six- month out-of-home improvement period to Betty M. and Steve M. However, since Steve M. had left the children, his voluntary absence precluded him from taking advantage of this improvement period.

The children were subsequently placed in foster care. Jamie and Timmy were so aggressive and violent that the Mingo County foster parents with whom they were originally placed requested that they be removed from their home. They were then placed in a special needs home See footnote 5 in the Charleston, West Virginia, area through a special needs foster placement agency. Ike was successfully placed in a Mingo County foster care home. Brandon was not born until September 5, 1989. The DHS subsequently returned Ike to his mother's physical custody on October 6, 1989. Both Brandon and Ike remained in their mother's custody until the DHS filed an amended petition on February 5, 1990, and took emergency custody See footnote 6 of both children on the basis of physical abuse and medical neglect by the mother and failure to provide proper care. In addition to the petition for emergency custody, the DHS filed a second amended petition on behalf of all four children, alleging continuing physical and medical neglect and abuse, and re-alleging that Steve M. had left the family home and that he had not contacted the West Virginia DHS to inquire about his children.

Specifically, the DHS alleged in the petition for emergency custody that Mrs. M. had left Ike and Brandon with Gail A. on February 1, 1990, with only one can of Similac and four jars of baby food. Mrs. M. dropped the children off at 4:00 p.m. and was to return to pick them up at 9:00 p.m., but failed to return as agreed. Finally, on February 3, 1990, Mrs. A. returned the children to Mrs. M. Mrs. M. reported that she had been too intoxicated to pick up the children. The DHS also alleged other instances where Mrs. M. had left her children with inappropriate care. For instance, on January 6, 1990, the DHS learned that Mrs. M. had left her children overnight with Abby B., an elderly man in a wheelchair. Mrs. M. indicated that she had also left her children in the care of a sixteen-year-old juvenile and one of her male friends. Additionally, on January 31, 1990, Patrolman Dave Tincher reported to the DHS that he had been called to Mrs. M.'s residence on two recent occasions by neighbors who heard a baby crying for several hours. Patrolman Tincher reported that when he answered the calls, Mrs. M. along with a male friend, were intoxicated with beer cans strewn around the bed and he had difficulty waking them. Also, the DHS noted in the petition that Brandon appeared malnourished, weighing only twelve pounds at five months of age.

A hearing was conducted on March 23, 1990, based upon the amended petition. The record reflects that Steve M. did attend the March 23, 1990, hearing and at that time, an evaluation of the father's home in Ohio was ordered for the purpose of possible placement of the children. The respondent, however, did not request an improvement period at that time, nor did he ask to see his children. Although several hearings were scheduled during the fall of 1990, another hearing was not held until January 11, 1991, after several continuances were granted because service of process could not be obtained on the father. During this hearing, the father moved for an improvement period, and the court proceeded to take evidence regarding the motion.

The record before this Court is replete with psychological and medical data concerning the children. First, regarding the younger children Ike and Brandon, the January 11, 1991, testimony of Sherry Wise, a caseworker with the specialized foster care agency, indicated that both Brandon and Ike were special needs cases from the time that they arrived at the home. Ike was suffering from severe asthma and had frequent ear infections. The medical evidence indicated that the child had suffered a partial hearing loss of forty percent in his right ear due to chronic untreated ear infections. Because of these medical problems, extraordinary measures were taken by the foster parents at their own expense. Ike and Brandon's foster mother testified that they added a filtering system to the furnace in their home to help eliminate dust particles. She also stated that they purchased a humidifier and two vaporizers, and removed the carpeting from the boys' bedroom, all to aid their respiratory problems. Wise testified that it had been necessary to take Ike to the hospital approximately thirty times for his medical problems after his initial placement.

Additionally, Ike exhibited behavioral problems, including aggressiveness and hyperactivity requiring medication. Further, both the caseworker and the foster mother's testimony reflected that after his natural father finally decided to visit in August, 1990, Ike suffered substantial deterioration in his progress, demonstrating vastly increased aggressiveness, having problems at his daycare facility (where his foster mother was employed), and suffering nightmares and sleeplessness. After the child's second visit with the father, he again demonstrated aggressive behavior and nightmares. His foster mother's testimony indicated that it took almost two weeks to settle Ike back into his normal behavior pattern. Consequently, Dr. R. Jenee Walker, a child psychiatrist who examined and treated Ike subsequent to the visits with his father, recommended that "because of the severe negative emotional impact visits with his natural father has on this child, [it is my recommendation] that visits be withheld for the time being." There was, however, no move by DHS to restrict visits with the natural father, but no more were requested.

Further testimony from Sherry Wise regarding Brandon revealed that the child suffers from asthma, chronic untreated ear infections, gastroesophagel reflex disorder and bacterial viral infections all of which had required some forty hospitalizations. There was no psychological evidence offered concerning Brandon.

Next, the behavior reported by Jamie's foster mother after his initial placement in foster care included kicking, hitting, biting and spitting at family members. Jamie told his foster mother, just after his placement in March 1989, that his father had "stomped" him in the groin area and in the head. Jamie also informed his foster parent that he, along with his brother and mother, had hidden from his father because his father had threatened to shoot his mother. Jamie's foster parents also reported excessive sexual acting out by the child, primarily in the form of masturbation out of the norm (e.g. rubbing against furniture and people). Dr. LaRee D. Naviaux, a psychologist, also testified at the January 11, 1991, hearing that Jamie exhibited characteristics of an abused and neglected child, suffered from an adjustment disorder and possibly had an attention deficit disorder.

From a medical standpoint, Jamie had to undergo hydroseal and hernia surgery and dental surgery. Further, at the time of his placement in a special needs foster care home, he also suffered from a rash, thrash and scabies and had many colds and viruses, according to Debbie Wells, a case manager and counselor with the foster care agency.

Dr. Naviaux also diagnosed Timmy as having an adjustment disorder based upon abuse, neglect and sexual abuse. Dr. Naviaux found characteristics of sexual abuse on the basis of the foster parents' reports that Timmy was acting out explicit sexual behavior, including masturbation and rubbing himself up against furniture and people. Timmy was also observed inserting his finger into his rectum. The child would also scream "don't hurt me," when his foster mother attempted to diaper him. Also, the child had indicated on a sentence completion test that "his daddy jumped on Jamie with his boots." She further testified that this child appears to have "no conscience" in that he never felt guilty about things he had done. The doctor indicated that a child of his age exhibiting this characteristic created real concern. The child also liked to play with knives and guns and went through dangerous periods of throwing objects. Timmy also had chronic ear infections and his speech was developmentally delayed, according to Debbie Wells.

Finally, regarding the two visits by the father in August and September of 1990, and the effect of those visits on Jamie and Timmy, negative changes were noted in both of these children's behavior and verbalization. It was noted by the caseworker present during the visits that Mr. M. showed "only superficial interest in the boys ... in that very little interaction occurred." The foster parents of these two boys, James Pauley, testified that the visit affected Timmy the most. Particularly, after the August visit, Timmy became very aggressive and "would talk about himself and say, 'I'm stupid. I'm going to kill somebody or kill myself.' " Additionally, Jamie expressed fear and anxiety prior to one of these visits with his father when he asked a caseworker: " 'What will we do if he has his boots? What will we do it he kicks us with his boots? I don't want to see him. I have a stomach ache.' " Dr. Naviaux testified that Jamie and Timmy were fearful of their father as indicated by the regressive behaviors they displayed after visits with him. Dr. Naviaux opined that the father should not be granted an improvement period due to the amount of regression that had taken place in the two children as a result of just the two visits. Dr. Naviaux further testified that Jamie and Timmy had made dramatic improvements in all arenas of their lives since being stabilized in specialized foster care, and recommended both the children continue to live in such a stable environment. Finally, the testimony of Debbie Wells regarding Jamie and Timmy included a recommendation that "the children not be placed back with their biological parents because we [the agency] have not seen them [the natural parents] work with the children to alleviate any of their fears or provide for any of their needs." Clearly, these were children with special problems and special needs.

The evidence offered by the respondent father included his own testimony and that of Kathy C., the woman with whom he was residing. Steve M. testified that he loves his kids and that he wants custody of them. He testified that while he did have problems with his wife Betty M. and admitted that he had hit her, he testified that he has not shown any violence toward Ms. C. or her four children who resided with them. His testimony also revealed that he was arrested for driving under the influence at a time subsequent to when he claimed to have given up alcohol totally.

Additional evidence offered by the respondent included two reports from Franklin County (Ohio) Children Services which performed a home study at the request of the DHS. Even though Steve M. contends that the home studies were somewhat favorable to him and Kathy C., it is significant to note that information contained therein reflects several concerns.

In the first report, dated May 8, 1990, Steve M. admitted to having been a heavy drinker, but denied any continued alcohol use. Yet according to the second report, dated November 30, 1990, he had "recently lost his driver's license for 45 days due to an arrest while driving under the influence of alcohol and reports he spent five days in the county jail for reckless driving."

Also in that second report, the social worker indicated concern that despite having not been ordered to pay any child support, Steve M. had neither called, written, nor visited his children. The home was approved with reservations "due to the special needs of the children and father's ability to distance himself from his children."

The Franklin County Children Services agency further recommended that, if the children were to be placed in the home, it be done gradually. See footnote 7

> At the end of the hearing See footnote 8 the trial court rendered the following decision:
>
> I'm going to rule at this time on the motion for an improvement period. I'm going to grant an improvement period to the father in this case.
> ....
> In this case, I am unable to find compelling circumstances to justify denying the natural father the chance to see if he is able to be a father to these children. This man has never really had a chance, absent the presence of the natural mother, to try to be a parent to these children.

It is from this decision that the children bring this petition for a writ of prohibition.

IMPROVEMENT PERIODS

The law in West Virginia is clear that in child neglect and abuse proceedings > the parents or custodians may, prior to final hearing, move to be allowed an improvement period of three to twelve months in order to remedy the circumstances or alleged circumstances upon which the proceeding is based. The court shall allow one such improvement period unless it finds compelling circumstances to justify a denial thereof, but may require temporary custody in the state department or other agency during the improvement period.

W.Va.Code § 49-6-2(b) (1984) (emphasis added). This code provision makes it clear that such an improvement period must be granted "unless the court finds compelling circumstances to justify a denial." Syl.Pt. 2, in part, State ex rel. Dept. of Human Serv. v. Cheryl M., 177 W.Va. 688, 356 S.E.2d 181 (1987); accord Syl.Pt. 2, In re Jonathan P., 182 W.Va. 302, 387 S.E.2d 537 (1989).

However, we have also previously held that

> 'courts are not required to exhaust every speculative possibility of parental improvement before terminating parental rights where it appears that the welfare of the child will be seriously threatened, and this is particularly applicable to children under the age of three years who are more susceptible to illness, need consistent close interaction with fully committed adults, and are likely to have their emotional and physical development retarded by numerous placements.'

Syl.Pt. 1, in part, In re Darla B., 175 W.Va. 137, 331 S.E.2d 868 (1985) (quoting Syl.Pt. 1, in part, In re R.J.M., 164 W.Va. 496, 266 S.E.2d 114 (1980)).

We have also previously upheld the termination of parental rights without an improvement period where the evidence indicated potential danger to the children's welfare had they been returned home. State v. C.N.S., 173 W.Va. 650, 319 S.E.2d 775, 779 (1984). This conclusion was reached in C.N.S. as a result of evidence which indicated that the children had suffered from improper feeding habits causing their hospitalization, as well as improper supervision and discipline of the children. 319 S.E.2d at 777; see In re R.J.M., 266 S.E.2d 114, 266 S.E.2d 114 (Court upheld denial of improvement period where evidence indicated that parents had starved child and parents had deliberately missed child's doctor appointments and concealed themselves from Department of Welfare). We also upheld the denial of an improvement period in the case of In re Darla B., 331 S.E.2d at 870-71, where the evidence indicated that the parents had inflicted such serious life-threatening injuries upon the child that termination was the only reasonable course of action.

In examining other grounds which would justify the denial of an improvement period, we turn to our decision in Nancy Viola R. v. Randolph W., 177W.Va. 710, 356 S.E.2d 464 (1987). In Nancy Viola R., this Court ordered that the parental rights of a child's natural father be terminated where there was evidence before the court that the father had habitually abused alcohol, had continually been absent from the home, had not provided his family with adequate support and had abused his spouse. See footnote 9 356 S.E.2d at 467-68. See also State v. C.N.S., 319 S.E.2d 775; In re R.J.M., 266 S.E.2d 114.

In the present case, it is significant to note that an improvement period was granted to both the mother and father, although obviously the father's voluntary absence prevented him from benefitting from it. Moreover, not only had the father simply walked out on his wife and children, but he evinced no interest whatsoever in the children until some fifteen months later in March of 1990, despite the fact that, by his own admission, he learned of their taking in March 1989. The evidence showed that the respondent did not actually visit or have any contact with his children until August 20, 1990, almost two years after he left them. Further, during this two-year absence from his children's lives, he made no effort whatsoever to lend any financial or emotional support. It is difficult to perceive a more compelling set of circumstances to justify the denial of an improvement period.

The tender ages of these children must also be considered. As we pointed out in In re Carlita B., 185 W.Va. 613, 408 S.E.2d 365 (1991) (citing White, The First Three Years of Life at v., (1985)), the experiences of the first three years of a child's life form the foundation for all his later development. Id.

Consequently, we hold that the abandonment of a child by a parent constitutes compelling circumstances sufficient to justify the denial of an improvement period.

TERMINATION

The circuit court was presented with a plethora of evidence that these four small children were severely and profoundly abused and neglected during their most crucial and formative years. This was clearly proven not only through direct and unrefuted evidence, but also by the reports and testimony of psychiatrists, psychologists, and social workers along with the children's current foster parents. Not one of the individuals who either testified or submitted a report recommended that it would be in any of the children's best interest to be placed in the respondent's custody for an improvement period. As a matter of fact, there was compelling evidence introduced from one of the psychiatrists recommending that Ike not even have visitation with the father due to the extent of the negative impact from the previous visits with the respondent father on that child.

We have indicated that the focus of child abuse and neglect proceedings must be what is in the child's best interest and welfare. See Syl.Pt. 1, in part, In re Darla B., 175 W.Va. 137, 331 S.E.2d 868; see also W.Va.Code § 49- 6-5. It becomes apparent, however, that in this case, the lower court was attempting to exhaust "every speculative possibility of parental improvement" before making a determination of whether to terminate parental rights. See Syl.Pt. 1, in part, In re Darla B., 175 W.Va. 137, 331 S.E.2d 868. This is evidenced by the trial court's ruling as follows:

> If Mr. M. is given an improvement period, it may not even be necessary to terminate the parental rights of the natural mother. If we proceed to the conclusion of this hearing today, I would have to tell you, frankly, that I've heard enough evidence to where I think it would probably warrant terminating her parental rights. If it was a question of giving her the children or terminating her parental rights, there's grounds to terminate her parental rights. If the children can be given to the father, and if that will work, then it is not necessary to terminate the mother's parental rights. So, this improvement period, if it is successful, might and probably will prevent the harsh remedy of terminating the natural mother's parental rights.... If the improvement period is not granted, the only remedy left open to me today is to terminate the parental rights of both sets of parents.

Furthermore, the lower court has overlooked the law in this jurisdiction which stresses the protection of the parent and child relationship, but " 'recognizes that the right of the natural parent to the custody of his child is not absolute ... [but] limited and qualified by the fitness of the parent to honor the trust of the guardianship and custody of the child.' " In re Darla B., 175 W.Va. at 139, 331 S.E.2d at 870 (quoting In re Willis, 157 W.Va. 225, 237, 207 S.E.2d 129, 137 (1973)).

The standard for determining the fitness of a parent to maintain custody of his child was recently reiterated in syllabus point 1 of Nancy Viola R., 177 W.Va. 710, 356 S.E.2d 464. We stated the following:

> A parent has the natural right to the custody of his or her infant child, and, unless the parent is an unfit person because of misconduct, neglect, immorality, abandonment, or other dereliction of duty, or has waived such right, or by agreement or otherwise has permanently transferred, relinquished or surrendered such custody, the right of the parent to the custody of his or her infant child will be recognized and enforced by the courts. Syllabus, State ex rel. Kiger v. Hancock, 153 W.Va. 404, 168

> S.E.2d [798] (1969). Syl. pt. 2, Hammack v. Wise, 158 W.Va. 343, 211 S.E.2d 118 (1975).

Id.

Additionally, W.Va.Code §§ 49-6-5(a)(6), (b)(1), (b)(3), (b)(4), and (b)(5) (1988) which provide for the disposition of neglected or abused children specifically state that:

> Upon a finding that there is no reasonable likelihood that the conditions of neglect or abuse can be substantially corrected in the near future, and when necessary for the welfare of the child, [the court can] terminate the parental or custodial rights and responsibilities.... Such conditions shall be deemed to exist in the following circumstances, which shall not be exclusive:
> (1) The abusing parent or parents have habitually abused or are addicted to alcohol, controlled substances or drugs, to the extent that proper parenting skills have been seriously impaired and such abusing parent or parents have not responded to or followed through the recommended and appropriate treatment which could have improved the capacity for adequate parental functioning;
> ....
> (3) The abusing parent or parents have not responded to or followed through with a reasonable family case plan or other rehabilitative efforts of social, medical, mental health or other rehabilitative agencies designed to reduce or prevent the abuse or neglect of the child, as evidenced by the continuation or insubstantial diminution of conditions which threatened the health, welfare, or life of the child;
> (4) The abusing parent or parents have abandoned the child;
> (5) The abusing parent or parents have repeatedly or seriously injured the child physically or emotionally, or have sexually abused or sexually exploited the child, and the degree of family stress and the potential for further abuse and neglect are so great as to preclude the use of resources to mitigate or resolve family problems or assist the abusing parent or parents in fulfilling their responsibilities to the child....

Consequently, based upon the evidence presented to the lower court, it is the determination of this Court that the record is abundantly clear that these parents were unfit, and that accordingly, the lower court should have terminated parental rights on the basis of abandonment by the respondent father, and physical and medical neglect and abuse by the natural mother and father, and on the further basis that there is no reasonable likelihood that these conditions of neglect and abuse can be substantially corrected in the near future.

TRANSFER OF PHYSICAL CUSTODY

An ancillary matter that bears discussion is the manner in which the physical custody of the children was transferred to the father. At the time the circuit court ordered the transfer of the children, Brandon was one year old, Ike was three years old, Timmy was four years old, and Jamie was five years old. Except for the two visits in August and September 1990, none of the children had any contact with the father for almost two years. Despite the guardian ad litem's protestations and request for a stay from Friday afternoon until the following Monday, the court directed that Timmy and Jamie be turned over to the father that evening and that Ike and Brandon be turned over to the father within thirty days.

The lower court virtually ignored the extensive evidence regarding the children's fear of their father and their special needs for stability and consistency. Even the Franklin County Children Services recommended that any transfer in custody to the respondent father occur gradually due to the special needs of the children, as well as the fact that the father and his companion already had her four children in their care. Consequently, it is beyond comprehension as to why the lower court ordered that two of the children be surrendered to the respondent father on the night of the hearing with denial of even a three-day stay.

As we noted in Honaker v. Burnside, 182 W.Va. 448, 452-453, 388 S.E.2d 322, 326 (1989) in upholding a gradual transition from the step- father to the natural father, it is a traumatic experience for children to undergo sudden and dramatic changes in their permanent custodians. See footnote 10 Lower courts in cases such as these should provide, whenever possible, for a gradual transition period, especially where young children are involved. Further, such gradual transition periods "should be developed in a manner intended to foster the emotional adjustment of ... [the] children to this change ..." and to maintain as much stability as possible in their lives. Honaker, 182 W.Va. at 453, 388 S.E.2d at 326. These same principles may apply whenever a child is to be removed from the custody of anyone with whom he has formed an important attachment. See Hegar,Foster Children's and Parents' Rights to a Family, Soc.Serv.Rev., Sept.1983, 429.

CHILDREN'S RIGHT OF ASSOCIATION

It is also important to address the rights of these children to continued association amongst themselves as siblings. The guardian ad litem indicated during oral argument that these children will more than likely remain in long- term or permanent foster care, hopefully in the homes where they have resided since being placed in special needs foster care, wherein they have made such good progress. Also, according to the guardian ad litem, the DHS and the foster families have worked to maintain contact among the children, and every effort should be made to continue their familial connection.

In Honaker, we recognized that a child's best interests must be the primary standard by which his rights to continued contact with other significant figures in his life are to be determined. 182 W.Va. at 452-453, 388 S.E.2d at 326. Certainly in a case wherein children, by virtue of termination of parental rights, are losing their biological parents, all efforts should be made to preserve their rights to a continued relationship with their only other immediate family blood relatives.

Trends both in social work and the law relating to child placement indicate an increased awareness of children's rights to such continued association with siblings and other meaningful figures. See generally, Hegar, Legal and Social Work Approaches to Sibling Separation in Foster Care, 67 Child Welfare 113 (1988); Reddick, Juv.Just., Nov. 1974, 31- 32. The increased professional emphasis in social work on the sibling relationship is consistent with the broadening focus of the literature about separation. Hegar, supra, 67 Child Welfare at 113. The growing legal emphasis on the best interests of the child as the primary criterion for child placement decisions facilitates efforts to preserve stable relationships for children. Hegar, supra, Soc.Serv.Rev., Sept., 1983, at 429; see also Note, Visitation Beyond the Traditional Limitations, 60 Ind.L.J. 191 (1984).

Because sibling relationships often become more meaningful for brothers and sisters when they are permanently separated from their mothers and fathers, there is a growing judicial recognition of sibling rights in other jurisdictions. See id.

"[I]n a 1977 New York case, a child-placing agency was ordered by the court to present a plan for integrating a brother into the lives of sisters in a different placement, despite the brother having been separated from his sisters for seven years. The opinion note[d] that 'in the final analysis when these children become adults, they will have only each other to depend on.' " Hegar, supra, 67 Child Welfare at 117-18 (quoting In re Patricia Ann W., 89 Misc.2d 368, 379, 392 N.Y.S.2d 180, 187 (1977)).

In In re Elizabeth M., 232 Cal.App.3d 553, 283 Cal.Rptr. 483 (1991), wherein parental rights were terminated because of abuse and neglect, the court concluded that the statutory scheme which required the court to consider the best interests of the child in such proceedings included an implicit requirement that the court consider whether continuing sibling visitation is in the child's best interests.

As stated in Honaker, the best interests of the child concept with regard to visitation emerges from the reality that " '[t]he modern child is considered a person, not a sub-person over whom the parent has an absolute and irrevocable possessory right. The child has rights....' " 182 W.Va. at 452, 388 S.E.2d at 326 (quoting Note, supra, at 221 (footnote omitted)). Therefore, in the present case, we direct the court the DHS and any permanent families or custodians involved in these children's lives to make every effort to facilitate the children's continued association with one another.

In doing so, we follow Honaker and adopt the reasoning of the New York and California courts in determining that in cases where there is a termination of parental rights, the circuit court should consider whether continued association with siblings in other placements is in the child's best interests, and if such continued association is in such child's best interests, the court should enter an appropriate order to preserve the rights of siblings to continued contact.

ROLE OF GUARDIAN AD LITEM

Finally, in State v. Scritchfield, 167 W.Va. 683, 688-89, 280 S.E.2d 315, 319 (1981) we recognized that in neglect and abuse proceedings the child has the right to be represented by an attorney at all stages of the proceedings, including any appeal. See Syl. Pt. 3, In re Scottie D., 185 W.Va. 191, 406 S.E.2d 214, 220 (1991) (guardian ad litem's duty to exercise reasonable diligence in protecting rights of children includes exercising appellant rights of children). Likewise, a child has a right to continued legal representation pursuant to W.Va.Code § 49-6-8, Scritchfield and In re Scottie D., until such time as he is adopted or placed in permanent foster care.

Specifically, West Virginia Code §§ 49-6-8(a) and (b) mandate a twelve-month review by the court after the state department has received the child where no permanent placement has been made. Further, the statute requires the state department to file with the lower court a petition for review of the case and a report detailing all efforts to place the child in a permanent home. The court then must conduct a hearing to review the child's case, determine what efforts are necessary to provide the child with a permanent home and what services are required to meet the child's needs, and otherwise determine what is in the child's best interest. The statute requires a supplemental review of the child's case within eighteen months and every eighteen months thereafter until the child has a permanent placement.

Thus, the guardian ad litem's role in abuse and neglect proceedings does not actually cease until such time as the child is placed in a permanent home.

Based upon the foregoing opinion, we hereby reverse the lower court's granting of an improvement period to the respondent father and further direct the lower court to issue a ruling in this matter consistent with this opinion.

Supreme Court Of Appeals Of West Virginia

STATE OF WEST VIRGINIA, Plaintiff Below, Appellant,

v.

JAMES R., II, Defendant Below, Appellee

No. 20933
Submitted: September 23, 1992
Filed: October 9, 1992

SYLLABUS BY THE COURT

1. "Prosecutorial disqualification can be divided into two major categories. The first is where the prosecutor has had some attorney-client relationship with the parties involved whereby he obtained privileged information that may be adverse to the defendant's interest in regard to the pending criminal charges. A second category is where the prosecutor has some direct personal interest arising from animosity, a financial interest, kinship, or close friendship such that his objectivity and impartiality are called into question." Syllabus point 1, Nicholas v. Sammons, 178 W.Va. 631, 363 S.E.2d 516 (1987).

2. "As the primary responsibility of a prosecuting attorney is to seek justice, his affirmative duty to an accused is fairness." Syllabus point 2, State v. Britton, 157 W.Va. 711, 203 S.E.2d 462 (1974).

3. No evidence that is acquired from a parent or any other person having custody of a child, as a result of medical or mental examinations performed in the course of civil abuse and neglect proceedings, may be used in any subsequent criminal proceedings against such person. W.Va. Code § 49-6-4(a) (1992).

Mario J. Palumbo, Attorney General
Michael J. Basile, Assistant Attorney General
Charleston, West Virginia
Attorney for the Appellant

Thomas R. Michael
Michael & Kupec
Clarksburg, West Virginia
Attorney for the Appellee

Brotherton, Justice:

In an order dated November 6, 1991, the Circuit Court of Harrison County disqualified the Prosecuting Attorney of Harrison County and his assistants from pursuing sexual abuse charges against the appellee. The basis for this decision was the prosecution's representation of the State of West Virginia in a civil abuse and neglect case which arose from the same facts and circumstances. The appellant, the State of West Virginia, now appeals from this order.

A child abuse and neglect petition was initially filed against the appellee, James R., and his wife, Cindy R., in the Juvenile Court of Harrison County on March 4, 1991. The petition alleged that the appellee sexually abused his three children and also forced his wife to engage in sexual relations with their oldest son, who was twelve years of age.

On April 11, 1991, the appellee moved for an improvement period which is provided by W.Va. Code § 49-6-2(b).See footnote 1 The circuit court granted the appellee's motion on April 29, 1991, and set forth various terms and conditions of the improvement period, one of which was the requirement that the appellee undergo a psychological examination.

The appellee subsequently filed a motion seeking a grant of immunity that would serve to suppress any inculpatory evidence revealed in the course of his psychological treatment. The appellee also sought to disqualify the prosecuting attorney and his assistants from pursuing criminal charges against him because of their involvement in the civil abuse and neglect case.

A hearing was held on this motion on August 13, 1991. The appellee argued that the prosecuting attorney would obtain privileged information as a result of his involvement in the abuse and neglect proceeding, and he should therefore be disqualified and precluded from pursuing any criminal charges against the appellee that would arise from these proceedings. The State pointed out that W.Va. Code § 49-6-4(a) specifically prohibits the use of such evidence in subsequent criminal proceedings. Nonetheless, the circuit court found in favor of the appellee and disqualification, but did not enter an order at this time.

On September 9, 1991, a Harrison County grand jury returned a nine-count indictment against the appellee, alleging that he had committed various sexual offenses against his own children as well as other children who lived in his home. See footnote 2

On September 25, 1991, a hearing was held on the appellee's motion to dismiss the indictment and his motion to have the court enter an order reflecting its decision regarding prosecutorial disqualification. First, the lower court dismissed the indictment, and then on November 6, 1991, an order was entered disqualifying the prosecutor's office from pursuing criminal charges against the appellee.

On appeal, the State of West Virginia now argues that the circuit court erred in disqualifying the prosecutor. The State contends that the prosecutor's office has not represented conflicting interests in the case. Furthermore, the State points out that "[a] prosecutor's duty as a public officer is to serve the interest of the State in securing convictions of those who violate the laws of this organized society." State v. Britton, 157 W.Va. 711, 715, 203 S.E.2d 462, 466 (1974).

In this instance, the prosecution maintains that its first duty as counsel for the State in the abuse and neglect proceeding was "to assure the safety and well-being of the abused children." However, "once the prosecutor had reason to believe the appellee sexually abused his children and others, there was a statutory duty incumbent upon him to prosecute criminal charges against the appellee." It is the State's position that "[c]learly, these interests are not conflicting." We agree.

In Nicholas v. Sammons, 178 W.Va. 631, 363 S.E.2d 516 (1987), at syllabus point 1, we recognized two major categories of prosecutorial disqualification:

> The first is where the prosecutor has had some attorney-client relationship with the parties involved whereby he obtained privileged information that may be adverse to the defendant's interest in regard to the pending criminal charges. A second category is where the prosecutor has some direct personal interest arising from animosity, a financial interest, kinship, or close friendship such that his objectivity and impartiality are called into question.

Neither category is applicable to the facts of this case. There was never an attorney-client relationship between the prosecutor and the appellee herein, See footnote 3 nor was there even a hint of a direct personal interest of any kind. Instead, at all times the prosecution has represented only the interests of the State of West Virginia against those of the defendant, first in the civil proceedings and then when initiating criminal charges. However, a prosecutor does not represent conflicting interests by representing the State first in a civil abuse and neglect proceeding and then in subsequent criminal proceedings against the same person. See footnote 4 "As the primary responsibility of a prosecuting attorney is to seek justice, his affirmative duty to an accused is fairness." Syl. pt. 2, State v. Britton, 157 W.Va. 711, 203 S.E.2d 462 (1990).

More significant for purposes of our decision is the fact that the Legislature has already anticipated and addressed the situation with which we are now confronted. In W.Va. Code § 49-6-4(a) (1992), the Legislature dealt specifically with medical and mental examinations of parties to abuse and neglect proceedings and provided that, "[n]o evidence acquired as a result of any such examination of the parent or any other person having custody of the child may be used against such person in any subsequent criminal proceedings against such person."

We find this statutory provision to be dispositive of the issue which is now before us. Therefore, we reverse the November 6, 1991, order of the Circuit Court of Harrison County which disqualified the prosecuting attorney and his assistants from pursuing criminal charges against the appellee.

Reversed.

Footnote: 1West Virginia Code § 49-6-2(b) (1992) states that:

(b) In any proceeding under this article, the parents or custodians may, prior to final hearing, move to be allowed an improvement period of three to twelve months in order to remedy the circumstances or alleged circumstances upon which the proceeding is based. The court shall allow one such improvement period unless it finds compelling circumstances to justify a denial thereof, but may require temporary custody in the state department or other agency during the improvement period. An order granting such improvement period shall require the department to prepare and submit to the court a family case plan in accordance with the provisions of section three [§ 49-6D-3], article six-d of this chapter.

Before becoming an assistant prosecutor, the attorney was in private practice and was appointed guardian ad litem for the appellant's three daughters in a child abuse and neglect proceeding. As assistant prosecutor, the attorney subsequently represented the interests of the State in the appellant's criminal prosecution.

Supreme Court Of Appeals Of West Virginia

SYLLABUS

1. "Although conclusions of law reached by a circuit court are subject to de novo review, when an action, such as an abuse and neglect case, is tried upon the facts without a jury, the circuit court shall make a determination based upon the evidence and shall make findings of fact and conclusions of law as to whether such child is abused or neglected. These findings shall not be set aside by a reviewing court unless clearly erroneous. A finding is clearly erroneous when, although there is evidence to support the finding, the reviewing court on the entire evidence is left with the definite and firm conviction that a mistake has been committed. However, a reviewing court may not overturn a finding simply because it would have decided the case differently, and it must affirm a finding if the circuit court's account of the evidence is plausible in light of the record viewed in its entirety. Syl. Pt. 1, In re Tiffany Marie S., 196 W. Va. 223, 470 S.E.2d 177 (1996).

2. Pursuant to West Virginia Code § 49-6-12(g) (1998), before a circuit court can grant an extension of a post-adjudicatory improvement period, the court must first find that the respondent has substantially complied with the terms of the improvement period; that the continuation of the improvement period would not substantially impair the ability of the Department of Health and Human Resources to permanently place the child; and that such extension is otherwise consistent with the best interest of the child.

3. Since the procedural mechanisms for objecting to and modifying a family case plan are clearly in place, a parent cannot wait until the improvement period has lapsed to raise objections to the conditions imposed on him/her. The rules of procedure which govern abuse and neglect proceedings clearly require that a party seeking to modify a family case plan must act promptly and inform the court as soon as possible of the need for modification.

4. "When parental rights are terminated due to neglect or abuse, the circuit court may nevertheless in appropriate cases consider whether continued visitation or other contact with the abusing parent is in the best interest of the child. Among other things, the circuit court should consider whether a close emotional bond has been established between parent and child and the child's wishes, if he or she is of appropriate maturity to make such request. The evidence must indicate that such visitation or continued contact would not be detrimental to the child's well being and would be in the child's best interest." Syl. Pt. 5, In re Christina L, 194 W. Va. 446, 460 S.E.2d 692 (1995).

Justice Workman:

Dorothy H. See footnote 1appeals from the July 14, 1998, order of the Circuit Court of Braxton County terminating her rights to her minor children, Jamie H., who is currently eleven years old, and Thomas H., who is currently ten years old. Appellant asserts error with regard to the trial court's refusal to grant an extension of the ninety-day post-adjudicatory improvement period. In addition, Appellant maintains that the trial court, in refusing to extend the post-adjudicatory improvement period, wrongly relied on her failure to comply with certain improvement period objectives which had no bearing on her parental fitness. After carefully reviewing Appellant's assertions of error against the record in this matter, we conclude that the lower court did not error in terminating Appellant's parental rights or in denying an additional improvement period.

The most recent charges of neglect See footnote 2were instituted on December 19, 1997, when the Department of Health and Human Resources ("DHHR") filed a petition pursuant to West Virginia Code § 49-6-1 (1998), charging Appellant with "refusal, failure and inability to supply the infant children with necessary food, clothing, shelter, supervision, medical care and education." See footnote 3On this same date, the trial court entered an order temporarily transferring custody to DHHR. On December 29, 1997, Appellant waived the preliminary hearing and moved for a sixty-day improvement period, which the trial court granted.

At the adjudicatory hearing, held on February 2, 1998, Appellant admitted to multiple instances of neglect that were alleged in the petition. See footnote 4The trial court concluded that Jamie and Thomas H. were neglected, but recognized that there were no allegations of physical abuse. Appellant moved for a ninety-day improvement period to run from the December 29, 1997, hearing. While the lower court denied this request, it did grant a ninety- day improvement period which commenced on February 2, 1998. During the improvement period, Appellant was to achieve the following goals:

> (1) To maintain housing for the children;
> (2) To undergo a psychological evaluation and obtain counseling;
> (3) To work toward her GED;
> (4) To obtain employment;
> (5) To maintain an alcohol-free environment for the children without negative social behaviors.

During the post-adjudicatory improvement period, Appellant was incarcerated on two separate occasions. First, she was incarcerated from April 11, 1998, until April 23, 1998, for petit larceny. Within less than a full week of her release from jail, Appellant was arrested for battery and revocation of probation and then incarcerated on those charges from April 29, 1998, until May 15, 1998. At the dispositional hearing held on June 22, 1998,See footnote 5Appellant's parental rights were terminated. See footnote 6Appellant moved for a sixty-day extension of the post-adjudicatory improvement period based on a pattern of improvement and cooperation. See footnote 7 The trial court denied this motion, determining that it was too little, too late. See footnote 8In her prayer for relief, Appellant seeks a remand of this matter to the circuit court.

I. Standard of Review

In syllabus po int one of In re Tiffany S. , 196 W. Va. 223, 470 S. E.2d 177 (1996), we set forth the standard of review for abuse and neglect cases:

> Although conclusions of law reached by a circuit court are subject to de novo review, when an action, such as an abuse and neglect case, is tried upon the facts without a ju ry, the circuit court shall make a determination based upon the evid ence a nd shall m ake findi ngs of fact and conclusions of law as to whether such c hild i s abused or neglected. These findings shall not be set aside by a reviewing court unless clearly errone ous. A findin g is clearly erroneous w hen, although there is evidence to support the finding, the reviewing court on the entire evidence is left with the definite and firm conviction > that a mistake has been committed. However, a reviewing court may not overturn a finding simply because it would have decided the case differently, and it must affirm a finding if the circuit court's account of the evidence is plausible in light of the record viewed in its entirety.

II. Discussion

Appellant argues that the trial court erred in not granting her an extension of the post-adjudicatory improvement period. Related to this assignment is her contention that the trial court abused its discretion in imposing certain conditions with regard to the post- adjudicatory improvement period. Appellant argues that the trial court wrongly focused on her failure to diligently work toward the attainment of her GED and to find gainful employment. To rely on these conditions as a basis for denying her an additional improvement period was error, according to Appellant, since neither of these conditions impact on whether she is a good mother to her children.

Pursuant to West Virginia Code § 49-6-12(g) (1998), a trial court may grant up to a three-month extension of the post-adjudicatory improvement period, provided certain statutory requirements are met. Before a circuit court can grant an extension of a post- adjudicatory improvement period, the court must first find "that the respondent has substantially complied with the terms of the improvement period; that the continuation of the improvement period would not substantially impair the ability of the department [DHHR] to permanently place the child; and that such extension is otherwise consistent with the best interest of the child." W. Va. Code § 49-6-12(g). This Court recognized in In re Katie S., 198 W. Va. 79, 479 S.E.2d 589 (1996), that a circuit court's failure to extend an improvement period is not error where there is no "evidence showing a reasonable likelihood of improvement." Id. at 89, 479 S.E.2d at 599.

The record in this case demonstrates conclusively that Appellant was given more than adequate time to demonstrate whether she could provide a basic level of care for her two minor children. While Appellant claims to have been "making substantial progress toward meeting the conditions of the improvement period," the record in this case reveals otherwise. At the dispositional hearing held on June 22, 1998, Appellant admitted that she did not even begin to attempt to comply with the terms of her family case plan until late in April of 1998.See footnote 9 She further admitted that her efforts were prompted by the approaching date of the disposition hearing.

Appellant's efforts to comply with the family service plan amounted to her attendance at four counseling sessions following her release from jail on May 15, 1998.See footnote 10 In addition, Appellant attended six GED classes, with the first class beginning on June 2, 1998.See footnote 11 Appellant readily admits that she did not have employment or suitable housing See footnote 12 for her children by the date of the dispositional hearing. Moreover, as the trial court observed, Appellant spent a good part of her post-adjudicatory improvement period incarcerated. See footnote 13

The circuit court reviewed Appellant's history See footnote 14and her performance during the post-adjudicatory improvement period. The court observed the following:

> In this matter, Case 97-JA-5, is not the first occasion that the respondent mother had to come before the Court relative to the care that she was providing to her children.
>
> She was in the Court system as a result of a neglect petition previously filed in this case.
>
> . . .
>
> As a result of that encounter, the Department offered a range of services that it's called upon to offer . . . and worked with the respondent mother for a period of four years or thereabout.
>
> . . . .
>
> The Court find[s] -- I don't believe it's a question of ability. I think it's a question of what . . . [Appellant] desires to do with her time, and it appears to the Court that she desires to put what she wants to do ahead of her responsibility to the children.
>
> Her predicament probably wouldn't be as bad had she taken the step of securing support and maintenance for these children.
>
> . . . .
> The Court is of the opinion that Dorothy H[.] does not suffer from an inability to understand what is required of her as a mother.

> The Court concludes that Dorothy H[.] suffers from a lack of desire and a lack of desire to accept the responsibilities for properly rearing and caring for these children.
>
> . . . .
>
> The Court is of the opinion that maybe she shouldn't have -- maybe I shouldn't have returned the children to her when they were returned to her the first time, because it's the same pattern.
>
> These children are entitled to know that there is more to life than what they've been exposed to up to now.
>
> . . . .
> In this instance, this case is merely a continuation of what these children previously encountered, and the Court is of the opinion that the time for continued improvement periods and continued counseling and continued rendering of service by the Department of Health and Human Resources should be concluded.

Appellant faults the trial court for basing its decision not to extend her post-adjudicatory improvement period on two conditions that were made a part of her family case plan. The specific goals to which she now objects are the securement of employment and working towards the attainment of a GED. Pursuant to West Virginia Code § 49-6D-3 (1998), a family case plan must be developed by the DHHR and submitted to the circuit court. The conditions about which Appellant now complains were developed by the DHHR with her consent and input. Appellant signed the family case plan, thereby acknowledging what efforts were required on her part to remedy her parenting deficiencies. When the family case plan was introduced and made a part of the record of this case at the February 2, 1998, adjudicatory proceeding, Appellant made no objection to the plan.

Our statutes and rules of procedure both anticipate and provide for the modification of family case plans. West Virginia Code § 49-6D-3(b) states that "[t]he family case plan may be modified from time to time by the department to allow for flexibility in goal development, and in each such case the modifications shall be submitted to the court in writing." Rule 35(b)(2) of the West Virginia Rules of Procedure for Abuse and Neglect Proceedings expressly provides for modification of case plans where termination of parental rights is contested at a pre-dispositional hearing. That rule provides, in pertinent part:

> The guardian ad litem for the children, the other respondents and their counsel shall advise in the pre- dispositional hearing and, where termination is sought, after the co urt's findings on the f actual issues surrounding termination are announ ced, w hether a ny such pers ons seek a modification of the child' s case plan as submitted or desire to offer a substitute child's case plan for consideration by the court. The court shall require any proposed m odifications or substi tute plans to be promptly laid before the court and take such action, including the receipt of evidence with respect thereto, as the circumstances shall require. It shall be the dut y of a ll the parties to the pr oceeding a nd their counsel to co-operate with th e court in m aking this information available to the court as early as possible. . . .

W.Va.R.Pro.Abuse/Neglect 35(b)(2). These same rules provide that any party can seek a status conference "to advise the court of pertinent developments in the case or problems which arose during the formulation and implementation of a case plan." W.Va.R.Pro. Abuse/Neglect 47.

While the procedural mechanisms for objecting to and modifying a family case plan are clearly in place, a parent cannot wait until the improvement period has lapsed to raise objections to the conditions imposed on him/her. The rules of procedure which govern abuse and neglect proceedings clearly require that a party seeking to modify a family case plan must act with alacrity and inform the court as soon as possible of the need for modification. See W. Va. R. Pro. Child Abuse/Neglect 35(b)(2); see also In re Carlita B., 185 W. Va. 613, 625-26, 408 S.E.2d 365, 377 n.15 (1991) (stating that "[a]t the outset of an improvement period, the attorneys for the parents should apprise the court if their clients foresee any obstacles to compliance with the plan of improvement, and the court should make any directives as necessary to obliterate these obstacles"). In this case, Appellant never sought to modify the conditions set forth in the family case plan. Not until this appeal was filed did Appellant ever raise an objection to the objectives set forth in her case plan.

We disagree with Appellant's position that the conditions set forth in the family case plan have no bearing on her fitness to be a good mother to her children. As we stated in West Virginia Department of Human Services v. Peggy F., 184 W. Va. 60, 399 S.E.2d 460 (1990), "the ultimate goal is restoration of a stable home environment, not simply meeting the requirements of the case plan." Id. at 64, 399 S.E.2d at 464. Since Appellant's primary problem as a parent was her inability to provide even a "minimum level of care" for her children, See footnote 15 the inclusion of conditions designed to encourage Appellant to acquire a high school equivalency diploma and employment does not appear unreasonable to this Court. See footnote 16 Family case plans are to be designed with the overriding goal of "identifying family problems and the logical steps to be used in resolving or lessening those problems." W. Va. Code § 49-6D-3(a). The facts in this case support the goals delineated in the family case plan. Provision of shelter and financial support for children is one of the most basic components of parental responsibility. The DHHR, along with Appellant, determined that without employment Appellant was unlikely to ever graduate from her current level of failing to provide for her children. Requiring her to attend GED classes was simply a related method of helping her to secure a job. Thus, we conclude that the conditions of the improvement period and the family case plan were expressly tailored to address Appellant's problems with parenting her children. See footnote 17 See In re Renae Ebony W., 192 W. Va. 421, 426-27, 452 S.E.2d 737, 742-43 (1994) (discussing "importance of . . . crafting improvement periods in a manner designed to remedy the problem that led to the abuse and neglect action"); see also State v. Julie G., 201 W.Va. 764, 776, 500 S.E.2d 877, 889 (1997) (Workman, dissenting) ("recognizing that court's determination at the conclusion of the improvement period in an abuse/neglect case involves a decision regarding 'whether sufficient improvement has been made in the context of all the circumstances of the case to justify the return of the child'") (citing syl. pt. 6, in part, Carlita B., 185 W. Va. at 616, 408 S.E.2d at 368).

After fully reviewing Appellant's contentions in conjunction with the record in this case, we find no abuse of discretion with regard to the trial court's decision not to extend the post-adjudicatory improvement period. Under the statutory language of West Virginia Code § 49-6-12(g), the trial court properly denied Appellant's request for an extension, given her failure to comply with the improvement period conditions and the trial court's conclusion that an extension would not be in the best interests of Jamie and Thomas H. As to Appellant's contention that the trial court wrongly examined her conduct during the post-adjudicatory improvement period with regard to the conditions of obtaining employment and working towards her GED, we determine that she failed to timely object to such conditions or to seek a modification of the family case plan setting forth those conditions.

While Appellant has not raised the sufficiency of the trial court's dispositional order, we address this issue sua sponte. As we recognized in State v. Michael M., 202 W. Va. 350, 504 S.E.2d 177 (1998), a circuit court may

> [u]pon a finding that there is no reasonable likelihood that the conditions of neglect or abuse can be substantially corrected in the near future, and when necessary for the welfare of the child, terminate the parental, custodial or guardianship rights and/or responsibilities of the abusing parent and commit the child to the permanent sole custody of the nonabusing parent, if there be one, or, > if not, to either the permanent gua rdianship of the state departm ent or a licensed child welfare agency.

Id. at 357, 504 S.E.2d at 184 (quoting W. Va. Code § 46-6-5(a)(6)). We observed in Carlita B. that the finding required by West Virginia Code § 46-6-5(a)(6) concerning the absence of a "reasonable likelihood that the conditions of abuse and neglect could be substantially corrected in the near future" is a "prerequisite to termination of parental rights." 185 W. Va. at 622, 408 S.E.2d at 374 n.11. The dispositional order entered by the circuit court on July 13, 1998, in connection with the June 22, 1998, hearing does not track the language of West Virginia Code § 46-6-5(a)(6). Upon a review of the transcript from the dispositional hearing, however, we are convinced that the trial court first reached the conclusions required by West Virginia Code § 46-6-5(a)(6) before terminating Appellant's parental rights. See footnote 18 As to the issue of termination of rights, See footnote 19 we find no basis for reversing the lower court's findings. See Tiffany S., 196 W. Va. at 225-26, 470 S.E.2d at 179-80, syl. pt. 1.

It is of concern to this Court that, although there was evidence in the record of a parent/child emotional bond, See footnote 20 the court and counsel for Appellant appear to have totally dropped the ball as to the possibility of a post-termination relationship. We directed in syllabus point five of In re Christina L, 194 W. Va. 446, 460 S.E.2d 692 (1995) that:

> When pare ntal rights are term inated due t o ne glect or abuse, the circuit court m ay nevertheless in a ppropriate cases consider whether continued visitation or other contact with the abusing parent is in the best interest of the child. Am ong other things, the circuit court should consider whether a close emotional bond has been established between pa rent and child and t he child's wishes, if he or she is of appropriate maturity to make s uch request. The evidence mus t indicate that such visitation or continued contact would not be detrimental to the child's well being and would be in the child' s best interest.

While it does not appear that a formal petition seeking a post-termination relationship was filed, Appellant's counsel did inquire at the dispositional hearing regarding the circuit court's position on post-termination visitation. The trial court indicated that it would take the matter under advisement, while admitting on the record that it was disinclined to permit such visitation. It appears that a ruling was never issued on the subject; however, during the oral argument of this case DHHR represented that a hearing was finally to be held on this issue on May 14, 1999. If indeed such a hearing took place, it occurred almost a year after the issue of post-termination visitation was first raised. We find it utterly irresponsible that such a lengthy time period passed with no resolution of this issue. If the bond that once existed between these children and their mother is determined to be worth preserving, then the children have been detrimentally affected by this lengthy period of time with no contact.

Finally, we have once again determined that there has been no resolution as to the paternal rights with respect to one of the two minor children involved. During the course of this proceeding, the trial court approved the request of the biological parent of Jamie H. to voluntarily relinquish his parental rights. While the biological father of Thomas H. was both located and, in fact, appeared at the February 2, 1998, adjudicatory proceeding, the record does not reflect the termination of such parent's rights to Thomas H. See footnote 21 Obviously, without a voluntary or involuntary termination of parental rights, there can be no permanent placement of Thomas H. As we recognized in Christina L., "[d]angling, unresolved parental rights . . . have a chilling effect on potential adoptive parents." 194 W. Va. at 456, 460 S.E.2d at 702; see W. Va. Code § 49-6-1 (requiring abuse/neglect petition to be served on both parents). And, as we discover all too often in these cases, there is no permanency plan that has been filed by the DHHR concerning its recommended placement of these two children.

Based upon the foregoing, the decision of the Circuit Court of Braxton County is hereby affirmed as to the issue of termination and the denial of an extension of the post- adjudicatory improvement period. We are forced to remand this case, however, due to the apparently unresolved issue of post-termination visitation. See footnote 22 In the event that the lower court has still not ruled on the issue of a post-termination relationship between Appellant and her children, we direct the lower court to make a ruling on such issue post haste pursuant to this Court's directives in Christina L. See Syl. Pt. 5, 194 W.Va. at 448, 460 S.E.2d at 694. Because the paternal rights with regard to Thomas H. have never been resolved and because no permanency plan See footnote 23has apparently ever been prepared and submitted to the circuit court, we remand this case for resolution of those two specific issues.

Affirmed; Remanded with Direction.

Footnote: 2 Jamie H. and Thomas H. had previously been removed from Appellant's custody and placed in foster care from August 28, 1990, to April 24, 1995.

Footnote: 3 This petition resulted from an investigation by DHHR case worker, Patty Salisbury, in response to a complaint made by Appellant's brother and sister-in-law that Appellant had sold all of her furniture, was purportedly dying of cancer (or so she claimed), and attempting to get various local businesses to collect money for her benefit. Another averment set forth in the petition concerned Appellant's failure to return home after asking a teenager to watch her children for a few hours on December 16, 1997. While the record is unclear as to how much time passed before Appellant did return, the fact that Appellant's family members took her children to DHHR suggests that more than a nominal period of time was involved. Additional grounds of neglect cited in the petition included the fact that neither Jamie H. or Thomas H. were attending school on a regular basis and Thomas H. was not being given his Ritalin.

Footnote: 4 She admitted that Jamie H. and Thomas H. had been absent from school on all the days specified in the petition; that she had left them in the care of a teenager on December 16, 1997, and not returned; that she had been caught driving on a suspended license; and that her children had previously been in foster care for a lengthy period of time.

Footnote: 5 This hearing had been scheduled for May 8, 1998, but had to be continued because of Appellant's incarceration.

Footnote: 6 The trial court concluded, inter alia, that while Appellant did not lack the ability to understand what was expected of her, she "suffers from a lack of desire to accept the responsibilities of rearing and caring for these children."

Footnote: 7 Following Appellant's release from jail on May 15, 1998, she attended counseling on May 19, May 26, June 1, and June 12. Appellant states that during the first six months of 1998, she attended a total of ten counseling sessions, four of which were after her release from jail. Beginning on June 2, 1998, Appellant began attending GED classes. By the time of the dispositional hearing, she had attended six such classes. As to the other conditions of her improvement period, Appellant had not secured employment, but she had completed the required psychological evaluation.

Footnote: 8 The circuit court stated: "But the Court is of the opinion and views this case in which at the eleventh hour [the Appellant] is going to do all of these things." And the court also commented that, Appellant had "been afforded an opportunity to get her act in order and she chose to ignore it."

Footnote: 9 The post-adjudicatory improvement period was slated to end on May 3, 1998.

Footnote: 10 These sessions took place on May 19, May 26, June 1, and June 12. Appellant represents in her brief that the counselor canceled sessions scheduled for June 2 and June 19.

Footnote: 11 We observe that Appellant's GED class attendance actually took place after the time period when the post-adjudicatory improvement period had technically expired on May 3, 1998. It was only because of Appellant's imprisonment that the dispositional hearing held on June 22, 1998, could not be held as originally scheduled on May 8, 1998.

Footnote: 12 At the time of the dispositional hearing, Appellant and her two children were residing with Appellant's mother and brother in a two-bedroom mobile home.

Footnote: 13 The guardian ad litem stated at the June 22, 1998, proceeding that Appellant had been incarcerated five times during the eighteen-month period that preceded the dispositional hearing.

Footnote: 14 The trial court commented that it "has had occasion to observe the respondent mother here in Court on many occasions[.]"

Footnote: 15 This observation was made by the guardian ad litem at the February 2, 1998, adjudicatory hearing.

Footnote: 16 While we are not unmindful of the argument raised by Appellant that both a job and pursuit of her GED would take her away from her children, we do not perceive sincerity or proper motivation in Appellant's suggestion that she should be permitted to stay at home and spend more time with her children, rather than being forced out of the home to work or acquire an educational degree. Given Appellant's track record of ignoring the basic needs of her children while she pursued her own interests, such as alcohol consumption, plus her repeated stints of incarceration, we find it difficult to believe that Appellant genuinely desires to stay at home for the benefit of nurturing her children.

Footnote: 17 Even more important, however, is the fact that Appellant's parental rights, as the record makes clear, were terminated for reasons far more crucial to the issue of whether Appellant was meeting minimal standards for parenting, as opposed to her failure to obtain a GED or housing. This Court, and the court below, would be unlikely to terminate parental rights solely on the basis of failure to acquire a GED or adequate housing.

Footnote: 18 The order is similarly deficient in that it fails to state the following:

(1) That continuation in the home is not in the best interest of the child and why; (2) why reunification is not in the best interests of the child; (3) whether or not the department made reasonable efforts, with the child's health and safety being the paramount concern, to preserve the family and to prevent the placement or to eliminate the need for removing the child from the child's home and to make it possible for the child to safely return home, or that the emergency situation made such efforts unreasonable or impossible; and (4) whether or not the department made reasonable efforts to preserve and reunify the family including a description of what efforts were made or that such efforts were unreasonable due to specific circumstances.

W. Va. Code § 49-6-5(a)(6). Upon a thorough review of the transcript from the dispositional hearing, we are satisfied that the trial court considered each of these factors prior to making its ruling of termination.

Footnote: 19 We are not clear as to whether Appellant is even appealing the issue of termination as the petition for appeal seeks only a remand to the circuit court, ostensibly to revisit the issue of the lower court's denial of an extension of the improvement period.

Footnote: 20 The guardian ad litem acknowledged at the June 22, 1998, hearing that he had "no doubt that they [Jamie and Thomas H.] love their mother. The bond of the children toward the mother is strong in this case and they love her."

Footnote: 21 The trial court determined only that the father of Thomas H. had been regularly making child support payments in the amount of $14l.50 and that such individual desired no visitation with his son.

Footnote: 22 We recognize that a hearing resolving this issue may have been held on May 14, 1999, but to this Court's knowledge no order resolving this issue has been entered.

Footnote: 23 We observe that had a permanency plan been approved by the circuit court as required by West Virginia Code § 49-6-5a (permanency hearing must be held within thirty days of dispositional hearing wherein reunification is ruled out), then under the provisions of Rule 39 of the Rules of Procedure for Abuse and Neglect Proceedings, the trial court would have been obligated to hold periodic review conferences concerning the placement plan "[a]t least once every three months until permanent placement [wa]s achieved."

JUSTICE MAYNARD delivered the Opinion of the Court.

SYLLABUS BY THE COURT

1. "The manner in which a state administers a federal assistance program must be consistent with federal law." Syllabus Point 1, Harrison v. Ginsberg, 169 W.Va. 162, 286 S.E.2d 276 (1982).

2. Under the Federal Adoption Assistance and Child Welfare Act of 1980, 42 U.S.C. §§ 670 - 679b (2000 & 2003 Supp.), and W.Va. Code § 49-2-17 (2000), the West Virginia Department of Health and Human Resources has an affirmative duty to notify prospective adoptive parents and prospective legal guardians of the availability of assistance for the care of a potentially special needs child in instances where the Department has responsibility for placement and care of the child or is otherwise aware of the child.

Maynard, Justice:

Appellant West Virginia Department of Health and Human Resources ("DHHR") appeals the December 5, 2005, order of the Circuit Court of Wayne County that required DHHR to grant to the appellees, Charles M. and Twila M., medical assistance for the care of their adopted son, Jamison Nicholas C.[1] For the reasons set forth below, we affirm the circuit court.

I.

FACTS

Jamison Nicholas C. was born April 22, 1996, to Crystal C. and Clyde C. Crystal C. died of cancer on September 9, 1998, while she and Jamison were living with her parents, the appellees. Prior to that time, Crystal C. and Clyde C.'s marriage, which was volatile and involved many domestic disputes, had ended and Clyde C. had become a fugitive from justice. As a result, Clyde C. had very little contact with Jamison.

On the day that Crystal C. died, DHHR was granted emergency custody of Jamison on the grounds that Jamison would be in imminent danger if his father gained physical and legal custody of him. At a subsequent preliminary hearing, on September 18, 1998, Jamison was adjudged to be neglected, abused, and abandoned by his father. Upon the recommendation of DHHR, the court rescinded DHHR's temporary custody of Jamison and granted his full legal care, custody and control to the appellees.

Shortly thereafter, Jamison was diagnosed with Attention-Deficit Hyperactivity ("ADHD") and depressive disorders.[2] On April 11, 2000, the appellees filed both a petition to adopt Jamison and a petition to terminate the parental rights of Clyde C.[3] By order dated September 19, 2000, the circuit court terminated Clyde C.'s parental rights to Jamison. After a hearing, the appellees' adoption petition was granted by order dated October 13, 2000, and entered February 15, 2001.

Subsequent to the adoption, Jamison was diagnosed with Asperger's

[2]Attached to the appellees' pleading to this Court is a copy of a letter from Debra Stultz, M.D. of United Health Professionals in Huntington, and dated January 15, 1999, which states that "Jamison [C.] has been treated under my services since 11/9/98. He has been diagnosed with Depressive disorder, NOS; and ADHD."

[3]Clyde C. was convicted in Wayne County Circuit Court of Grand Larceny on October 13, 1999. He was subsequently sentenced to the penitentiary for a period of not less than one year nor more than ten years. Thereafter, he was convicted of Escape and sentenced for a period of one year to run consecutively with his Grand Larceny sentence.

Syndrome. From September 9, 1998, until February 2004, DHHR provided medical assistance to Jamison by way of either Federal Medicaid Assistance or the State Children's Health Insurance Program. In February 2004, DHHR notified the appellees that Jamison was no longer eligible for medical assistance due to an increase in the appellees' household income.

In January 2005, the appellees filed a motion with the circuit court to amend the final order of adoption to provide that Jamison continue to be eligible for a medical card issued by DHHR. After a hearing on the matter, the circuit court granted the motion and ruled that the adoption order would be amended to provide that DHHR shall enter into an adoption assistance agreement with the appellees for medical assistance to be provided to Jamison. The circuit court's order was based on the following conclusions of law:

> 2. Jamison became a ward of the state when placed in temporary custody of WVDHHR upon an adjudication of abuse and neglect and upon a finding that it would be contrary to Jamison's best interest to return him to his father's custody; the DHHR properly placed the child with a responsible relative; West Virginia Code, §49-6-3;
> 3. Jamison had a significant relationship with his maternal grandparents; there existed emotional ties between the child and [Charles and Twila M.]; the DHHR recognized [Charles and Twila M.] as prospective permanent adoptive parents; Adoption and Safe Families Act of 1997 (Pub. L. 105-89);
> 4. Jamison's physical, mental, medical, and emotional disabilities qualify him as a special needs child as defined in Section 473(c) of the Adoption Assistance and Child Welfare Act of 1980, (Pub. L. 96-272); See 42 U.S.C. § 673(c);
> 5. The DHHR had an affirmative duty to fully explain all available assistance programs to potential adoptive parents; the prospective adoptive parents cannot waive adoption assistance without full knowledge and information to assist them in making an informed decision to proceed by private adoption as opposed to an assisted adoption; 42 C.F.R. 1356.40(f); Ferdinand v. Dept. for Children and Families, State of Rhode Island, 768 F.Supp. 401 (1991);

6. Jamison was a special needs child while in the temporary custody of the WVDHHR even though his special needs were not evident when he was two (2) years old; Jamison would have been eligible for Title IV-E adoption assistance when placed with [Charles and Twila M.] even though the Department never discussed this with [Charles and Twila M.]; the subsequent determination as a special needs child constitutes changing circumstances relevant to the period readjustment provisions of 42 U.S.C. §673(a)(3) and (4), as discussed in Ferdinand, 768 F.Supp. 401, supra;

7. The State Department of Health and Human Resources must actively seek ways to promote the adoption assistance programs; 42 C.F.R. 1356.40(f);

8. It is the child's needs, and not the adoptive parent's needs, which determines eligibility for adoption assistance of a special needs child; Ferdinand, 768 F.Supp. 401, supra;

9. The failure of the WVDHHR to fully advise [Charles and Twila M.] of available adoption assistance or the risks of jeopardizing Jamison's eligibility by proceeding with a private adoption, and the fact that the Department continued to provide medical assistance throughout the process, constitutes extenuating circumstances that existed at the time of placement with [Charles and Twila M.], and before adoption, which requires the matter to be re-opened consistent with the findings in Ferdinand vs. Rhode Island, Id.

DHHR now appeals the circuit court's order.

II.

STANDARD OF REVIEW

The question before us concerns the proper construction of the relevant law and its application to the facts. Therefore, we review the circuit court's order de novo. See Syllabus Point 1, Public Citizen, Inc. v. First Nat. Bank, 198 W.Va. 329, 480 S.E.2d 538 (1996) (holding in part that "[q]uestions of law are subject to a de novo review").

III.

DISCUSSION

The Federal Adoption Assistance and Child Welfare Act of 1980, 42 U.S.C. §§ 670 - 670b (2000 & 2003 Supp.), an amendment to Title IV-E of the Social Security Act, provides for the adoption of children with special needs. According to a policy statement issued by the United States Department of Health and Human Services ("DHHS"),

> The [Act's] legislative history indicates that Congress was concerned primarily with moving children in State foster care systems into permanent adoptive homes when appropriate. The title IV-E adoption assistance program, therefore, was developed to provide permanency for children with special needs in public foster care by assisting States in providing ongoing financial and medical assistance on their behalf to the families who adopt them.

Policy Interpretation Question, Log No. ACYF-CB-PA-01-01, U.S. Department of Health and Human Services, Children's Bureau, Issued January 23, 2001 (footnote omitted). Pursuant to the federal act, each state is to develop an approved plan to administer adoption assistance. 42 U.S.C. § 673.

The applicable plan in West Virginia for administering the federal act is found in W.Va. Code § 49-2-17 (2000),[4] which provides in relevant part:

> From funds appropriated to the department of health and human resources, the secretary shall establish a system of assistance for facilitating the adoption or legal guardianship of children. An adoption subsidy shall be available for children who are legally free for adoption and who are dependents of the department or a child welfare agency licensed to place children for adoption. A legal guardianship subsidy shall not require the surrender or termination of parental rights. For either subsidy, the children must be in special circumstances either because they:
>
> (a) Have established emotional ties with prospective adoptive parents or prospective legal guardians while in their care; or
>
> (b) Are not likely to be adopted or become a ward of a legal guardian by reason of one or more of the following conditions:
>
> (1) They have a physical or mental disability;
>
> (2) They are emotionally disturbed;
>
> (3) They are older children;
>
> (4) They are part of a sibling group;
>
> (5) They are a member of a racial or ethnic minority; or
>
> (6) They have any combination of these conditions.
>
> The department shall provide assistance in the form of subsidies or other services to parents who are found and approved for adoption or legal guardianship of a child certified as eligible for subsidy by the department, but before the final decree of adoption or order of legal guardianship is entered, there must be a written agreement between the family entering into the subsidized adoption or legal guardianship and the department. Adoption or legal guardianship subsidies in individual cases may commence with the

[4]This Court has indicated that the goal of W.Va. Code § 49-2-17, > is to encourage foster parents not to treat the children placed in their care as an income producing commodity, but rather to love their foster children as their own. The Legislature wants foster parents to know that if they become attached to a child in their care, the bureaucrats will not come and take the child away. Presumptively, if a child is in a loving and caring foster home, the child will be harmed by being removed from that home and placed in a strange, unknown home. The state, therefore, has implemented a policy encouraging foster parents to adopt their foster children.

State ex rel. Treadway v. McCoy, 189 W.Va. 210, 213, 429 S.E.2d 492, 495 (1993).

> adoption or legal guardianship placement, and will vary with the needs of the child as well as the availability of other resources to meet the child's needs.

As set forth above, the circuit court found that Jamison's adoption met the requirements of the federal adoption assistance act and W.Va. Code § 49-2-17, so that DHHR is obligated to provide assistance to the appellees in the form of medical assistance for Jamison.

DHHR now challenges the circuit court's order on several grounds. First, according to DHHR, because Jamison was not in the State's custody at the time of his adoption, he is not entitled to assistance. DHHR explains that at no point after legal and physical custody of Jamison was granted to the appellees was DHHR involved in any legal action in regards to Jamison. Essentially, it is DHHR's position that the purpose of the federal adoption assistance act is to facilitate the adoption of foster children, and Jamison was never a foster child.

We find that DHHR's argument has no merit. W.Va. Code § 49-2-17 provides that assistance is available for facilitating either the adoption or legal guardianship of children. At the time the appellees were granted full legal custody, control and care of Jamison, on September 18, 1998, DHHR had temporary legal custody of him.[5] Therefore, per the provisions of the statute, Jamison was at one point a "dependent" of DHHR.

[5]A guardian is defined as "[o]ne who has the legal authority and duty to care for another's person or property, esp. because of the other's infancy[.]" Black's Law Dictionary 566 (Abridged 7th ed. 2000).

Further, we believe that prior to the circuit court's granting of full care, custody, and control of Jamison to the appellees, DHHR knew or should have known that Jamison was a potential special needs child. By this time, Jamison, who was approaching two and one-half years of age, had been adjudicated a neglected, abused, and abandoned child. Also, he likely witnessed a great deal of domestic turmoil. In addition, he had suffered the death of his mother. Finally, within two months of September 18, 1998, Jamison began mental health treatment, and shortly thereafter was diagnosed with a depressive disorder and ADHD, qualifying him as a special needs child under W.Va. Code § 49-2-17.

Second, DHHR asserts that because Jamison was adopted privately, it had no duty to inform the appellees of the availability of assistance. We do not believe that the fact that Jamison's adoption was private is of legal significance under these specific facts. This Court has held that, "[t]he manner in which a state administers a federal assistance program must be consistent with federal law." Syllabus Point 1, Harrison v. Ginsberg, 169 W.Va. 162, 286 S.E.2d 276 (1982). Because W.Va. Code § 49-2-17, is this State's codification of the federal adoption assistance act, we look to federal law to determine how best to apply our statute.

According to 45 C.F.R. § 1356.40(f) (2005), "[t]he State agency must actively seek ways to promote the adoption assistance program." This duty is further explained in a DHHS policy statement as follows:

> The State title IV-B/IV-E agency is required to actively seek ways to promote the adoption assistance program. This means that it is incumbent upon the State agency to notify prospective adoptive parents about the availability of adoption assistance for the adoption of a child with special needs. There is no prescribed way in which promotion of the program must be accomplished. One example would be to alert potential adoptive parents during a recruitment campaign for adoptive homes (websites, newspapers, flyers, etc). Another example would be to alert every prospective adoptive parent who inquires to the State agency about adoption.

Policy Interpretation Question, Log No. ACYF-CB-PA-01-01, U.S. Department of Health and Human Services, Children's Bureau, Issued January 23, 2001 (footnote omitted). This policy statement further indicates,

> However, in circumstances where the State agency does not have responsibility for placement and care, or is otherwise unaware of the adoption of a potentially special needs child, it is incumbent upon the adoptive family to request adoption assistance on behalf of the child. It is not the responsibility of the State or local agency to seek out and inform individuals who are unknown to the agency about the possibility of title IV-E adoption assistance for special needs children who also are unknown to the agency. This policy is consistent with the intent and purpose of the statute, and that is to promote the adoption of special needs children who are in the public foster care system.

Id. Based on this DHHS policy, we now hold that under the Federal Adoption Assistance and Child Welfare Act of 1980, 42 U.S.C. §§ 670 - 679b (2000 & 2003 Supp.), and W.Va. Code § 49-2-17 (2000), the West Virginia Department of Health and Human Resources has an affirmative duty to notify prospective adoptive parents and prospective legal guardians of the availability of assistance for the care of a potentially special needs child where the Department has responsibility for placement and care of the child or is otherwise aware of the child.

When we apply this law to the instant facts, we find that DHHR had a duty to the appellees both at the time the appellees became responsible for the care, custody, and control of Jamison and at the time of Jamison's adoption to notify them of available assistance. The facts show that DHHR had temporary legal custody of Jamison for ten days. Also, DHHR was aware or should have been aware that Jamison was a potentially special needs child due to his circumstances. Further, DHHR was aware that the appellees were granted care, custody and control of Jamison. Finally, DHHR continued to provide financial assistance to the appellees for Jamison's care from the time DHHR was granted temporary custody of Jamison until several years after his adoption by the appellees. While we agree with DHHR that it is not responsible for seeking out and informing individuals who are unknown to it about the possibility of assistance to those who adopt or who become legal guardians of a special needs child, in the instant case the appellees and Jamison were clearly known to DHHR.

In its final argument to this Court, DHHR contends that the appellees are not eligible for assistance because the federal adoption assistance act and W.Va. Code § 49-2-17 require that before assistance can be rendered, an adoption assistance agreement must be signed and in effect at the time of or prior to the final decree of adoption. We do not believe that the absence of such an agreement renders Jamison ineligible for assistance under the facts of this case.

According to Policy Interpretation Question, Log No. ACF-PIQ-92-02, U.S. Department of Health and Human Services, Children's Bureau, Issued June 25, 1992,[6] the State agency's failure to notify adoptive parents of the availability of assistance may be considered an "extenuating circumstance" which justifies a fair hearing and a subsequent

[6]According to the applicable portion of Policy Interpretation Question, Log No. ACF-PIQ-92-02, > QUESTION 3:

>
> Would grounds for a fair hearing exist if the State agency fails to notify or advise adoptive parents of the availability of adoption assistance for a child with special needs?
>
> RESPONSE:
> Yes. The very purpose of the title IV-E adoption assistance program is to encourage the adoption of hard-to-place children. State notification to potential adoptive parents about its existence is an intrinsic part of the program and the incentive for adoption that was intended by Congress. Thus, notifying potential adoptive parents is the State agency's responsibility in its administration of the title IV-E adoption assistance program. Accordingly, the State agency's failure to notify the parents may be considered an "extenuating circumstance" which justifies a fair hearing.

grant of medical assistance.[7] Therefore, we find that DHHR's failure to inform the appellees of the availability of assistance, both at the time they were granted care, custody, and control of Jamison and at the time they adopted Jamison, constitutes extenuating circumstances under the federal policy statement above, and that these extenuating circumstances permitted the appellees to reopen this matter and to receive medical assistance.

III.

CONCLUSION

In sum, we find that Jamison is eligible for medical assistance under W.Va. Code § 49-2-17. The facts show that Jamison was a dependent of DHHR prior to the time the appellees were granted full legal care, custody, and control of Jamison and prior to the time the appellees adopted him. Also, Jamison meets the definition of a special needs child by virtue of his mental and/or emotional disabilities. In addition, DHHR had a duty to inform the appellees about the availability of assistance under W.Va. Code § 49-2-17 because DHHR had legal custody of Jamison for a period of ten days and thereafter continued to be aware of his and the appellees' circumstances. Finally, the failure of DHHR to inform the appellees of availability of medical assistance for Jamison constituted

[7]We note that this policy statement was withdrawn by the Department of Health and Human Services on January 23, 2001. However, it was in effect at all times relevant to the issue in this case, specifically when the appellees were granted care, custody, and control of Jamison and when they petitioned to adopt Jamison.

extenuating circumstances for the court below to subsequently revisit the issue and to require medical assistance to Jamison. For these reasons, we conclude that the circuit court committed no legal error in ordering DHHR to enter into an adoption assistance agreement for medical assistance with the appellees. Therefore, the circuit court's December 5, 2005, order is affirmed.

Affirmed.

Per Curiam:

Peggy S.[1] and Misty B. (hereinafter "Peggy" and "Misty"), as mothers of infant children, Jason S. and Jasmine B. (hereinafter "Jason" and "Jasmine"), appeal from an order entered July 20, 2005, by the Circuit Court of Harrison County. By that order, the circuit court affirmed the May 16, 2005, order of the Family Court of Harrison County. In its order, the family court found that there was no credible evidence that the father, Joseph B. (hereinafter "Joseph"), sexually abused the children, and further found no justification to order supervised visitation. On appeal to this Court, Peggy and Misty argue that the family court abused its discretion and applied an incorrect legal standard in arriving at its decisions, and that the circuit court was incorrect in affirming the family court's errors. Peggy and Misty request that Joseph be allowed only supervised visitation. Based upon the parties' written filings,[2] the record designated for our consideration, and the pertinent authorities, we find that Joseph should have only supervised visitation. Accordingly, we reverse the underlying decisions of the circuit court that affirmed the rulings of the family court and

FACTUAL AND PROCEDURAL HISTORY

This case involves allegations of sexual abuse by Joseph, who is the father and non-custodial parent of Jason and Jasmine. Jason was born January 24, 1997, to Peggy and Joseph, and Jasmine was born May 20, 1999, to Misty and Joseph. The two children live in separate households. In separate suits, the cases were first instituted to establish paternity and set child support. Joseph was deemed to be the father of both children and was awarded visitation rights and ordered to pay child support.

In May and June of 2004, both mothers moved for modification of visitation after the children disclosed sexual abuse. Because of the similarity of the allegations and because both cases involved Joseph as the alleged abuser, the cases were consolidated for purposes of court hearings on the alleged sexual abuse. The family court suspended Joseph's contact rights with the children and approved only supervised visitation to be monitored by the Youth Advocate Program pending the outcome of the hearings. Gale Carroll was appointed as the guardian ad litem for both children.

Evidentiary hearings were held on November 16, 2004, and on February 17, 2005, and witnesses testified regarding the allegations of sexual abuse. The testimony of the relevant witnesses is summarized as follows:

A. Testimony of Relevant Witnesses

1. Kerry Jones. Kerry Jones is a social worker and the director of Children's Services for West Virginia University Pediatrics. Peggy took Jason to be seen by Mr. Jones on May 7, 2004, after Jason told his mother that his father, Joseph, put his penis in Jason's mouth and rectum. Jason stated that Joseph instructed him not to tell anyone or he would not be allowed to see his mother anymore. Kerry Jones' report contained information supplied by Peggy that Joseph had been sexually abused as a teenager and that he had been convicted of burning a house.[3]

Jason's physical examination was normal, but he reported to Mr. Jones that Joseph was mean and had squeezed his wrist. Jason named his body parts and indicated that his father had hurt his "butt." Mr. Jones then drew a picture of Joseph without a penis, and Jason finished the drawing by including a line where a penis would be located. Jason then indicated the penis and stated that his father put it in his "butt." Jason continued that this action happened a lot. Further, Jason said that he had seen his father do this to Jasmine in her "butt" and in her "front."

[3]Though not directly relevant to the instant case, the record reveals that the father, Joseph, is a convicted arsonist who had a penchant for setting things on fire from a young age. He has also been categorized as nonpolygraphable because he passed a polygraph in an arson case in which he later confessed and was convicted.

Kerry Jones testified that he noticed that Jason's language skills were atypically low, but that he was able to understand Jason. He further stated that Jason did not seem rehearsed and that if he was coached, it was either an extraordinary amount of coaching or the coaching was extraordinary. Mr. Jones did not make conclusions as to whether the abuse occurred, but stated that he does believe that Jason is credible. Mr. Jones based this conclusion on his many years experience with this type of situation, as well as the way Jason spoke to him, the way he told his story, and the details he added. Jasmine would not talk to Mr. Jones; however, based on Jason's testimony, a report was forwarded to the West Virginia Department of Health and Human Resources (hereinafter "DHHR") regarding both children.

2. Georgia Daniel. Ms. Daniel is a certified nurse practitioner and a registered nurse who had an established relationship with Jason. Peggy called Ms. Daniel and advised that she feared Joseph was sexually abusing Jason; thus, an appointment was scheduled for April 2, 2004. The physical examination was normal, but Jason told Ms. Daniel that "daddy put his pee-bug in his mouth." Further, Jason stated that his father put his "pee-bug" in his rectum and that it hurt. Ms. Daniel's examination and interview of Jason took place with the mother present; however, Ms. Daniel stated that there was no prompting from Peggy. Ms. Daniel indicated that she had limited experience with sexual abuse cases, but that she contacted the police and a psychologist. Jason was referred to Amy Wilson Strange, a psychologist, who found that Jason disclosed inappropriate sexual actions by his father. Ms. Strange found Jason to be a credible reporter.

3. Tammy Hamner. Tammy Hamner is a psychologist who was contacted to provide therapy to both Jason and Jasmine. Ms. Hamner testified that, while she did not form an opinion as to whether the alleged abuse took place, she does believe the children have sexual knowledge that is inappropriate, especially given their ages. She further explained that her role as therapist was to provide counseling to the children, and did not require her to determine the veracity of the statements. While meeting with Ms. Hamner, Jason reported a "ding-dong" in his "mouth and butt." Further, Jasmine indicated touches to her vaginal area and buttocks, as well as an indication of a tongue being below her belly button in the same vicinity. The first time this was reported, Ms. Hamner felt that it might possibly be a situation of Jasmine enacting being wiped by her father, but the second report of the same action, along with Jasmine's mimicking of the tongue movements was inappropriate.

Ms. Hamner indicated that the children's functional level is delayed approximately two years, and that their speech is difficult to discern. Because of the language difficulties, Ms. Hamner felt that the children might not be credible in the case where their delayed speech may cause someone to have to interpret what they were saying. However, Ms Hamner testified that the children possessed age-inappropriate sexual knowledge that led her to believe something improper must have happened. Ms. Hamner also responded to the fact that Joseph, the father, had experienced both sexual abuse and physical abuse in his life. She commented that such an experience makes it statistically more likely that Joseph will also be an abuser. Ms. Hamner also expressed that she had instructed Joseph on activities that he should refrain from, such as bathing or wiping the children. She stated that these recommendations were to protect Joseph from any further allegations, but he failed to follow her suggestions. To the family court, Ms. Hamner recommended supervised visitation until the children are older and more articulate.

4. Gale E. Carroll, guardian ad litem. The guardian ad litem for the children filed a report recommending that only supervised visitation be allowed between Joseph and his children. The guardian ad litem investigated and found that the children were credible. This determination was based on Jason's words and actions and on Jasmine's sexual acting as she was too young to communicate effectively otherwise. Reliance on the reports and testimony of all of the witnesses reinforced the guardian ad litem's conclusion.

B. Underlying Findings

After hearing the testimony, the family court noted that the children were difficult to understand verbally and, for that reason, were difficult to find credible. Moreover, the court's order recognized that it was apparent that both children have a strong desire to please their mothers, and that any interviews of the children in the vicinity of their mothers were possibly tainted. The family court also noted that all adult parties involved were lacking in certain intellectual and analytical functioning abilities. Significantly, because of the animosity between Joseph and the mothers of the children, the family court found it likely that a significant misunderstanding or intentional deception might play a part in the sexual abuse allegations. The family court concluded that the children's emotional and physical well-being were not endangered and that immediate restoration of unsupervised visitation was appropriate.

> > each of the subject children has been sexually abused at least due to age-inappropriate exposure to sexual information. However, the Court also finds that . . . [the mothers] failed to establish, by credible evidence, clear and convincing evidence, a preponderance of evidence, or any other applicable standard that . . . [Joseph] in any way is responsible for this abuse or that he in any way has abused their child[ren].

(Emphasis in original). The family court went on to conclude that

> > [e]ven if one is to acknowledge that the allegations may have merit - as the Court must - if the likelihood of significant misunderstanding and/or intentional deception is at least just as great, as it clearly is herein, the petition for modification seeking elimination or in the alternative supervision of . . . [Joseph's] visitation must fail.

(Footnote omitted). The family court ordered Schedule A visitation to commence after the summer break ended.

All parties appealed the family court's ruling to the circuit court. The circuit court stated that

> [w]hile this Court would not have restored . . . [Joseph] to unsupervised Schedule A Visitation, given the nature of the allegations and the opposing recommendations, this Court is required to give "substantial deference" to the Family Court Judge Crislip's factual findings. Even though this Court would be inclined to make different, contrary inferences and findings, this Court cannot substitute its own findings merely because it disagrees with Judge Crislip's findings.

Accordingly, the circuit court refused the petitions for appeal and affirmed the family court's order. Subsequently, the mothers of the subject children appealed to this Court asking for a reversal of the underlying decisions and requesting a finding by this Court that Joseph is entitled to only supervised visitation.

II.

STANDARD OF REVIEW

The standard of review with which we approach this matter has been explained as follows:

> "In reviewing a final order entered by a circuit judge upon a review of, or upon a refusal to review, a final order of a family court judge, we review the findings of fact made by the family court judge under the clearly erroneous standard, and the application of law to the facts under an abuse of discretion standard. We review questions of law de novo." Syllabus, Carr v. Hancock, 216 W. Va. 474, 607 S.E.2d 803 (2004).

Syl. pt 1, Staton v. Staton, 218 W. Va. 201, 624 S.E.2d 548 (2005). Mindful of these standards, we proceed to consider the parties' arguments.

III.

DISCUSSION

On appeal to this Court, the appellant mothers assign error to the circuit court's affirmation of the family court's decisions. Specifically, Peggy and Misty contend that the family court was clearly erroneous in its interpretation of the facts and that it applied the incorrect standard of law when it determined that the father had not sexually abused the children. Thus, the appellants maintain that it was not in the best interests of the children to allow the father unsupervised visitation. The children's guardian ad litem agreed with the appellant mothers' positions and recommended only supervised visitation be allowed between Joseph and his children. Conversely, Joseph submitted a letter claiming that the sexual abuse allegations were false and that the mothers contrived the story to get back at him. Joseph avers that he is entitled to unsupervised visitation with his children.

To determine the appropriateness of supervised or unsupervised visitation, the crux of our analysis must necessarily focus on the sexual abuse allegations. West Virginia jurisprudence has explained as follows:

> Prior to ordering supervised visitation . . . if there is an allegation involving whether one of the parents sexually abused the child involved, a family law . . . [judge] or circuit court must make a finding with respect to whether that parent sexually abused the child. A finding that sexual abuse has occurred must be supported by credible evidence. The family law . . . [judge] or circuit court may condition such supervised visitation upon the offending parent seeking treatment. Prior to ordering supervised visitation, the family law . . . [judge] or circuit court > should weigh the risk of harm of such visitation or the deprivation of any visitation to the parent who allegedly committed the sexual abuse against the risk of harm of such visitation to the child.

Syl. pt. 2, in part, Mary D. v. Watt, 190 W. Va. 341, 438 S.E.2d 521 (1992). Thus, in the present case, there must be credible evidence that sexual abuse occurred prior to an order of supervised visitation.

As has been previously explained, "because termination of parental rights is not involved, but only supervised visitation, we believe that credible evidence of such sexual abuse allegations is all that is necessary for a family law . . . [judge] or circuit court to order supervised visitation." Id., 190 W. Va. at 348, 438 S.E.2d at 528. In reaching this result, the Court in Mary D. v. Watt specifically rejected more stringent standards such as clear and convincing and a preponderance of the evidence when the case is a civil matter before a family law judge or circuit court. Cf. Sharon B.W. v. George B.W., 203 W. Va. 300, 507 S.E.2d 401 (1998) (per curiam) (holding that a preponderance of the evidence standard, as opposed to credible evidence, applies when a family court or circuit court is determining whether a third party sexually abused a child, such as in the case of a mother's boyfriend).

In its order, the family court found that > each of the subject children has been sexually abused at least due to age-inappropriate exposure to sexual information. However, the Court also finds that . . . [the mothers] failed to establish, by credible evidence, clear and convincing evidence, > a preponderance of evidence, or any other applicable standard that . . . [Joseph] in any way is responsible for this abuse or that he in any way has abused their child[ren].

(Emphasis in original). The family court appears to have articulated a standard of evidence that encompasses all possible standards of proof. Because the present case deals with a non-custodial parent, to the extent that the family court applied any standard other than credible evidence, it abused its discretion. Application of the appropriate standard of credible evidence results in a reversal of the family court's decision.

The family court found that the children were sexually abused; however, the court was not convinced that the evidence was credible that the father was the abuser. In this regard, the family court overlooked and disregarded the only evidence in the record, which identified the father as the abuser. Interestingly, the family court found the evidence credible that the children were abused, but not that they could properly identify the abuser. The family court based its determination that the children were not credible on perceived communication difficulties caused by the language impediments of the children. We disagree with this ruling by the family court.

Significantly, all of the evidence in the record, including that from the social worker, the medical doctors, the psychologist, and the two guardians ad litem, was consistent. The children reported that their father was the abuser, and this testimony never wavered. Moreover, all persons involved, even if not involved for the specific purpose of finding sexual abuse, agreed that the children were credible reporters as long as they could be properly understood. While Ms. Hamner testified that the children were not credible in the case where their language difficulties may be misinterpreted, such is not the case here. In examinations where the children were difficult to understand, their verbal recitation was reinforced by their own actions in pointing to their body parts and in their drawings of stick figures. Moreover, both children referred to the abuser as their father, or "Joseph" or "Joey." Thus, there is no evidence that the children's identity of the perpetrator is not credible. While a communication gap could be significant, it is not in a case such as this where the examiners stated that they understood the children and where the children's words were corroborated by acting, drawing, and pointing to their own body parts in describing what occurred. None of the reporters questioned the content of what the children were telling them, and in light of the fact that the identity of the abuser remained consistent throughout the children's stories, the family court was clearly wrong in finding there was no credible evidence that the father was the abuser.

In the family court order, after finding the children were abused, but not accepting their identification of the abuser, the family court went on to explain

> [e]ven if one is to acknowledge that the allegations may have merit - as the Court must - if the likelihood of significant misunderstanding and/or intentional deception is at least just as great, as it clearly is herein, the petition for modification seeking elimination or in the alternative supervision of . . . [Joseph's] visitation must fail.

The family court seems to say that if it is possible that the allegations have merit, but also possible that there has been a misunderstanding, that Joseph's rights prevail and supervised visitation will not be ordered. We disagree with the family court's interpretation of the current posture of West Virginia law and find that the misconstruction constitutes an abuse of discretion.

The facts of this case are similar to the case of Meadows v. Meadows, 202 W. Va. 327, 504 S.E.2d 154 (1998) (per curiam), wherein this Court reversed and remanded the case for implementation of supervised visitation. This Court held that the underlying court, in Meadows, improperly disregarded testimony of the child and of the professionals. While the lower court was fearful that animosity between the parents led to the creation of untrue stories, this Court felt that the evidence reported by the child and the experts could not be ignored. The underlying courts in the present case disregarded unrefuted testimony that Jason and Jasmine reported being abused and exhibited behavior consistent with such experiences. Additionally, the underlying courts disregarded the expert recommendations that the children should be subjected only to supervised visitation with Joseph.

Significantly, our case law is replete with the admonition that the best interests of the child must be protected. The Legislature succinctly stated:

> The Legislature finds and declares that it is the public policy of this state to assure that the best interest of children is the court's primary concern in allocating custodial and > decision-making responsibilities between parents who do not live together. In furtherance of this policy, the Legislature declares that a child's best interest will be served by assuring that minor children have frequent and continuing contact with parents who have shown the ability to act in the best interest of their children, to educate parents on their rights and responsibilities and the effect their separation may have on children, to encourage mediation of disputes, and to encourage parents to share in the rights and responsibilities of rearing their children after the parents have separated or divorced.

W. Va. Code § 48-9-101(b) (2001) (Repl. Vol. 2004). In furtherance of this principle, this Court has previously instructed that "[i]n visitation as well as custody matters, we have traditionally held paramount the best interests of the child." Syl. pt. 5, Carter v. Carter, 196 W. Va. 239, 470 S.E.2d 193 (1996). In Keith Allen A. v. Jennifer J.A., 201 W. Va. 736, 500 S.E.2d 552 (1997) (per curiam), we reiterated:

> In the difficult balance which must be fashioned between the rights of the parent and the welfare of the child, we have consistently emphasized that the paramount and controlling factor must be the child's welfare. "[A]ll parental rights in child custody matters," we have stressed, "are subordinate to the interests of the innocent child." David M. [v. Margaret M.], [182 W. Va. 57, 60,] 385 S.E.2d [912] at 916 [(1989)].

Id., 201 W. Va. at 744, 500 S.E.2d at 560 (citing In re Carlita B., 185 W. Va. 613, 629, 408 S.E.2d 365, 381 (1991)). More pointedly,

> [b]ecause of the extraordinary nature of supervised visitation, such visitation should be ordered when necessary to protect the best interests of the children. In determining the best interests of the children when there are allegations of sexual or child abuse, the circuit court should weigh the risk of harm of supervised visitation or the deprivation of any visitation to the parent who allegedly committed the abuse if the allegations are false against the risk of harm of unsupervised visitation to the child if the allegations are true.

Syl. pt. 3, Carter v. Carter, 196 W. Va. 239, 470 S.E.2d 193 (1996).

Applying the correct legal principles, it is clear that the family court failed to follow established law that the best interests of the children are paramount. If the allegations of sexual abuse are true, the risk of harm of allowing unsupervised visitation is much greater than any harm caused by limiting the father's visitation rights.[4] This point is compounded by the fact that the father may not always be limited to supervised visitation.[5]

---

[4]Our concern for protecting the best interests of the children is enhanced by various references throughout the record concerning Joseph. Significantly, and in addition to the arson predilection, he has serious mental problems. He suffers from major depression and has committed himself for evaluation on more than one occasion. He has also threatened bodily harm on himself, his children, and their mothers, and wrote a letter to the family court judge early in the paternity case wherein he stated that "because of my illness of my nerves, I'am [sic] afraid of hurting my son and his mother. The best thing is for me is [sic] to stay away." The record is clear that Joseph also suffers from severe anger control issues. The first guardian ad litem, who was involved prior to any sexual abuse allegations, recommended supervised visitation based on Joseph's failure to manage his anger. Thus, there were concerns with Joseph's ability to safely watch the children prior to any allegations of sexual abuse.

[5]As this Court has recognized in the past,

> [i]f the protection of the children provided by supervised visitation is no longer necessary, either because the allegations that necessitated the supervision are determined to be without "credible evidence " (Mary D. v. Watt, 190 W. Va. 341, 348, 438 S.E.2d 521, 528 (1992)) or because the noncustodial parent had demonstrated a clear ability to control the propensities which necessitated the supervision, the circuit court should gradually diminish the degree of supervision required with the

IV.

CONCLUSION

Accordingly, this Court concludes that the family court erred in finding that there was no credible evidence that the father sexually abused the children, and further erred when placing the visitation rights of the father above the best interests of the children. For the foregoing reasons, we reverse the July 20, 2005, order of the Circuit Court of Harrison County that affirmed the May 16, 2005, order of the Family Court of Harrison County. We find that the protection of the children, Jason and Jasmine, is paramount and that the father, Joseph, is entitled only to supervised visitation at this time and therefore issue the mandate of this Court contemporaneously herewith. The case is further remanded for entry of an order setting forth the appropriate parameters of supervised visitation.

ultimate goal of providing unsupervised visitation. The best interests of the children should determine the pace of any visitation modification to assure that the children's emotional and physical well being is not harmed.

JUSTICE DAVIS delivered the Opinion of the Court.

1. "'Moot questions or abstract propositions, the decision of which would avail nothing in the determination of controverted rights of persons or of property are not properly cognizable by a court.' Syllabus Point 1, State ex rel. Lilly v. Carter, 63 W. Va. 684, 60 S.E. 873 (1908)." Syllabus point 1, State ex rel. Durkin v. Neely, 166 W. Va. 553, 276 S.E.2d 311 (1981).

2. "'A case is not rendered moot even though a party to the litigation has had a change in status such that he no longer has a legally cognizable interest in the litigation or the issues have lost their adversarial vitality, if such issues are capable of repetition and yet will evade review.' Syllabus point 1, State ex rel. M.C.H. v. Kinder, 173 W. Va. 387, 317 S.E.2d 150 (1984)." Syllabus point 2, State ex rel. Davis v. Vieweg, ___ W. Va. ___, ___ S.E.2d ___ (No. 26845 January 28, 2000).

3. "Three factors to be considered in deciding whether to address technically moot issues are as follows: first, the court will determine whether sufficient collateral consequences will result from determination of the questions presented so as to justify relief; second, while technically moot in the immediate context, questions of great public interest may nevertheless be addressed for the future guidance of the bar and of the public; and third, issues which may be repeatedly presented to the trial court, yet escape review at the appellate level because of their fleeting and determinate nature, may appropriately be decided." Syllabus point 1, Israel by Israel v. West Virginia Secondary Schools Activities Commission, 182 W. Va. 454, 388 S.E.2d 480 (1989).

4. "A writ of prohibition will not issue to prevent a simple abuse of discretion by a trial court. It will only issue where the trial court has no jurisdiction or having such jurisdiction exceeds its legitimate powers. W. Va. Code, 53-1-1." Syllabus point 2, State ex rel. Peacher v. Sencindiver, 160 W. Va. 314, 233 S.E.2d 425 (1977).

5. "In determining whether to entertain and issue the writ of prohibition for cases not involving an absence of jurisdiction but only where it is claimed that the lower tribunal exceeded its legitimate powers, this Court will examine five factors: (1) whether the party seeking the writ has no other adequate means, such as direct appeal, to obtain the desired relief; (2) whether the petitioner will be damaged or prejudiced in a way that is not correctable on appeal; (3) whether the lower tribunal's order is clearly erroneous as a matter of law; (4) whether the lower tribunal's order is an oft repeated error or manifests persistent disregard for either procedural or substantive law; and (5) whether the lower tribunal's order raises new and important problems or issues of law of first impression. These factors are general guidelines that serve as a useful starting point for determining whether a discretionary writ of prohibition should issue. Although all five factors need not be satisfied, it is clear that the third factor, the existence of clear error as a matter of law, should be given substantial weight." Syllabus point 4, State ex rel. Hoover v. Berger, 199 W. Va. 12, 483 S.E.2d 12 (1996).

6. "'In the law concerning custody of minor children, no rule is more firmly established than that the right of a natural parent to the custody [of] his or her infant child is paramount to that of any other person; it is a fundamental personal liberty protected and guaranteed by the Due Process Clauses of the West Virginia and United States Constitutions.' Syllabus Point 1, In Re Willis, 157 W. Va. 225, 207 S.E.2d 129 (1973)." Syllabus point 1, In Interest of Betty J.W., 179 W. Va. 605, 371 S.E.2d 326 (1988).

"'West Virginia Code, Chapter 49, Article 6, Section 2, as amended, and the Due Process Clauses of the West Virginia and United States Constitutions prohibit a court or other arm of the State from terminating the parental rights of a natural parent having legal custody of his [or her] child, without notice and the opportunity for a meaningful hearing.' Syl. pt. 2, In re Willis, 157 W. Va. 225, 207 S.E.2d 129 (1973)." Syllabus point 1, West Virginia Department of Welfare ex rel. Eyster v. Keesee, 171 W. Va. 1, 297 S.E.2d 200 (1982).

8. "The specific procedural protections accorded to a due process liberty or property interest generally require[] consideration of three distinct factors: first, the private interest that will be affected by state action; second, the risk of an erroneous deprivation of the protected interest through the procedures used, and the probable value, if any[,] of additional or substitute procedural safeguards; and third, the government's interest, including the function involved and the fiscal and administrative burdens that the additional or substitute procedural requirements would entail." Syllabus point 5, Major v. DeFrench, 169 W. Va. 241, 286 S.E.2d 688 (1982).

9. "Applicable standards for procedural due process, outside the criminal area, may depend upon the particular circumstances of a given case. However, there are certain fundamental principles in regard to procedural due process embodied in Article III, Section 10 of the West Virginia Constitution, which are; First, the more valuable the right sought to be deprived, the more safeguards will be interposed. Second, due process must generally be given before the deprivation occurs unless a compelling public policy dictates otherwise. Third, a temporary deprivation of rights may not require as large a measure of procedural due process protection as a permanent deprivation." Syllabus point 2, *North v. 10. Whether an incarcerated parent may attend a dispositional hearing addressing the possible termination of his or her parental rights is a matter committed to the sound discretion of the circuit court.

11. In exercising its discretion to decide whether to permit an incarcerated parent to attend a dispositional hearing addressing the possible termination of his or her parental rights, regardless of the location of the institution wherein the parent is confined, the circuit court should balance the following factors: (1) the delay resulting from parental attendance; (2) the need for an early determination of the matter; (3) the elapsed time during which the proceeding has been pending before the circuit court; (4) the best interests of the child(ren) in reference to the parent's physical attendance at the termination hearing; (5) the reasonable availability of the parent's testimony through a means other than his or her attendance at the hearing; (6) the interests of the incarcerated parent in presenting his or her testimony in person rather than by alternate means; (7) the affect of the parent's presence and personal participation in the proceedings upon the probability of his or her ultimate success on the merits; (8) the cost and inconvenience of transporting a parent from his or her place of incarceration to the courtroom; (9) any potential danger or security risk which may accompany the incarcerated parent's transportation to or presence at the proceedings; (10) the inconvenience or detriment to parties or witnesses; and (11) any other relevant factors.

Davis, Justice:

In this original proceeding in prohibition, petitioner, Jeanette H.,[1] a parent who was incarcerated by the State of West Virginia, sought to prohibit the Honorable David M. Pancake, Judge of the Circuit Court of Cabell County, from refusing to order her transportation to a dispositional hearing where her parental rights to her five minor children might be terminated. During the pendency of the proceedings in this Court, however, Jeanette H. was granted parole. Consequently, the issue raised is technically moot and the writ, therefore, is dismissed. Nevertheless, because the important question raised in the instant petition satisfies the exception to the mootness doctrine, we address the issue on its merits. In this regard, we conclude that the decision of whether to transport an incarcerated parent to a dispositional hearing is within the circuit court's discretion, and we set forth the factors to be considered by that court in exercising its discretion.

FACTUAL AND PROCEDURAL HISTORY

The following facts are set forth in the Petitioner's brief, and are not disputed by the respondents. Throughout the proceedings that lead to the filing of the instant petition, Jeanette H., the petitioner, was in the custody of the West Virginia Department of Corrections. Following Jeanette H.'s arrest, for violating conditions imposed upon an earlier parole, the West Virginia Department of Health and Human Resources [hereinafter "DHHR"] filed a petition to gain immediate custody of Jeanette H.'s five minor children. In response to this petition, Judge Pancake found probable cause of abuse and neglect and granted custody of the children to the DHHR. On August 31, 1999, Jeanette H. filed a motion requesting a post-adjudicatory improvement period. Judge Pancake granted the motion on September 8, 1999. The improvement period was to commence upon Jeanette H.'s arrival at a drug rehabilitation treatment center.[2] Thereafter, on October 18, 1999,[3] the DHHR initiated proceedings to terminate Jeanette H.'s parental rights.[4] A termination hearing was then docketed for January 12, 2000.

After receiving notice of the termination proceedings, Jeanette H. presented Judge Pancake with a proposed order directing her transportation from the McDowell County Jail so that she might attend the proceedings. Judge Pancake declined to enter the order and responded by letter to Jeanette H.'s counsel stating "I know of no constitutional directive for your client to be present, and it is not our custom to transport persons under these circumstances." Jeanette H. then filed a motion for a writ of prohibition in this Court seeking to prohibit the circuit court from refusing to enter her proposed order. We granted a rule to show cause returnable on February 22, 2000. Subsequent thereto, on April 10, 2000, Jeanette H. filed a motion to dismiss stating that she had been released on parol and, as a consequence of her release, the issue raised in her petition for writ of prohibition had been rendered moot.

[2]At the time her petition for writ of prohibition was filed, Jeanette H. was engaged in a six-month residential drug-treatment program.

[3]Jeanette H.'s brief does not indicate the duration of her improvement period.

[4]The DHHR also sought termination of the parental rights of the minor children's fathers.

II.

MOOTNESS

Due to Jeanette H.'s release from custody, her incarceration is no longer an impediment to her attendance at the hearing to take up the issue of her parental rights. For this reason, the issue herein raised is technically moot. Generally, moot questions are not proper for consideration by this Court. "'Moot questions or abstract propositions, the decision of which would avail nothing in the determination of controverted rights of persons or of property are not properly cognizable by a court.' Syllabus Point 1, State ex rel. Lilly v. Carter, 63 W. Va. 684, 60 S.E. 873 (1908)." Syl. pt. 1, State ex rel. Durkin v. Neely, 166 W. Va. 553, 276 S.E.2d 311 (1981). As with most general rules, however, there is an exception to this rule:

> "A case is not rendered moot even though a party to the litigation has had a change in status such that he no longer has a legally cognizable interest in the litigation or the issues have lost their adversarial vitality, if such issues are capable of repetition and yet will evade review." Syllabus point 1, State ex rel. M.C.H. v. Kinder, 173 W. Va. 387, 317 S.E.2d 150 (1984).

Syl. pt. 2, State ex rel. Davis v. Vieweg, ___ W. Va. ___, ___ S.E.2d ___ (No. 26845 January 28, 2000). Elaborating on this exception, we have explained:

> Three factors to be considered in deciding whether to address technically moot issues are as follows: first, the court will determine whether sufficient collateral consequences will result from determination of the questions presented so as to justify relief; second, while technically moot in the immediate context, questions of great public interest may nevertheless be addressed for the future guidance of the bar and of the public; and third, issues which may be repeatedly presented to the trial court, yet escape review at the appellate level because of their fleeting and determinate nature, may appropriately be decided.

Syl. pt. 1, Israel by Israel v. West Virginia Secondary Sch. Activities Comm'n, 182 W. Va. 454, 388 S.E.2d 480 (1989). Applying these criteria to the circumstances presently before us, we conclude that the issue raised is proper for our consideration. Therefore, after reviewing the appropriate standard for our consideration of Jeanette H.'s petition, we will address the issue on its merits.

III.

STANDARD FOR WRIT OF PROHIBITION

We have frequently expressed the limits to our exercise of our original jurisdiction in prohibition by explaining that "[a] writ of prohibition will not issue to prevent a simple abuse of discretion by a trial court. It will only issue where the trial court has no jurisdiction or having such jurisdiction exceeds its legitimate powers. W. Va. Code, 53-1-1." Syl. pt. 2, State ex rel. Peacher v. Sencindiver, 160 W. Va. 314, 233 S.E.2d 425 (1977).

Jeanette H. fails to explicitly state why prohibition is appropriate in this instance. Having observed that her arguments in support of her petition raise no jurisdictional issues, however, we conclude that she claims the lower court exceeded its legitimate powers. We have previously defined the factors to be considered by this Court in determining whether prohibition should issue where it is asserted that a court has exceeded its legitimate powers:

> In determining whether to entertain and issue the writ of prohibition for cases not involving an absence of jurisdiction but only where it is claimed that the lower tribunal exceeded its legitimate powers, this Court will examine five factors: (1) whether the party seeking the writ has no other adequate means, such as direct appeal, to obtain the desired > relief; (2) whether the petitioner will be damaged or prejudiced in a way that is not correctable on appeal; (3) whether the lower tribunal's order is clearly erroneous as a matter of law; (4) whether the lower tribunal's order is an oft repeated error or manifests persistent disregard for either procedural or substantive law; and (5) whether the lower tribunal's order raises new and important problems or issues of law of first impression. These factors are general guidelines that serve as a useful starting point for determining whether a discretionary writ of prohibition should issue. Although all five factors need not be satisfied, it is clear that the third factor, the existence of clear error as a matter of law, should be given substantial weight.

Syl. pt. 4, State ex rel. Hoover v. Berger, 199 W. Va. 12, 483 S.E.2d 12 (1996). Finally, we have repeatedly declared that "'[m]andamus, prohibition and injunction against judges are drastic and extraordinary remedies. . . . As extraordinary remedies, they are reserved for really extraordinary causes.'" State ex rel. Lawson v. Wilkes, 202 W. Va. 34, 38, 501 S.E.2d 470, 474 (1998) (quoting State ex rel. Suriano v. Gaughan, 198 W. Va. 339, 345, 480 S.E.2d 548, 554 (1996)). See also State ex rel. United States Fidelity & Guar. Co. v. Canady, 194 W. Va. 431, 436, 460 S.E.2d 677, 682 (1995); State ex rel. Doe v. Troisi, 194 W. Va. 28, 31, 459 S.E.2d 139, 142 (1995). Because Jeanette H. has raised a new and important issue of law of first impression in this jurisdiction, we find it may properly be considered in the context of a writ of prohibition.

IV.

DISCUSSION

Jeanette H. contends that the circuit court erred by declining to enter her proposed order authorizing her transportation to the Cabell County Courthouse to attend a dispositional hearing addressing the possible termination of her parental rights.[5] She argues that a parent is entitled to certain due process protections flowing from the fundamental interests associated with the parent/child relationship. The specific issue raised by Jeanette H., whether an incarcerated parent has a due process right to be present at a hearing on the termination of his or her parental rights, is a question of first impression for this Court.[6]

[5]We note that the circuit court's ruling on Jeanette H.'s request for transportation was rendered in a letter rather than a formal order. While the remedy of prohibition is typically invoked to prohibit the enforcement of an order, we find that under the particular circumstances of this unique case, the issue raised may nevertheless be addressed.

[6]We are troubled by the fact that, although this is an issue of first impression, neither the West Virginia Department of Health and Human Resources nor the guardian ad litem for Jeanette H.'s five children saw fit to file a response on the merits. We recognize that the guardian ad litem for these children has a reputation for diligently and competently discharging her guardianship duties. However, due to her failure to respond in this instance, we feel compelled to reiterate our prior declarations of the duty owed to minors by their guardians ad litem when a child abuse and neglect case is brought to this Court. The importance of appellate representation by guardians ad litem was summarized in State v. Michael M., 202 W. Va. 350, 355 n.11, 504 S.E.2d 177, 182 n.11 (1998), wherein we observed:

> In Syllabus Point 5 of James M. v. Maynard, 185 W. Va. 648, 408 S.E.2d 400 (1991), we held that "[t]he guardian ad litem's role in abuse and neglect proceedings does not actually cease until such time as the child is placed in a permanent home." In In re Christina L., 194 W. Va. 446, 454, n. 7, 460 S.E.2d 692, 700, n. 7 (1995), we admonished guardians ad litem that "it is their responsibility to represent their clients in every stage of the abuse and/or neglect proceedings. This duty includes appearing before this Court to represent the child during oral arguments." The guardian ad litem is also responsible for filing an appellate brief on behalf of his or her child ward. . . . We again underscore that guardians ad litem have a duty to fully represent the interests of their child wards at all stages of the abuse and/or neglect proceedings, both in the circuit court and on appeal.

(Emphasis added). In addition to filing briefs to represent their client's interests to this Court, the appearance of guardians ad litem during oral argument provides an important resource from which this Court may obtain valuable information. In In re Katie S., 198 W. Va. 79, 91 n.16, 479 S.E.2d 589, 601 n.16 (1996), we commended a guardian ad litem for his appearance at oral argument and further

Although the specific issue herein raised is novel in this jurisdiction, it is, nevertheless, well established that a parent has a constitutionally protected liberty interest in retaining custody of his or her child and is, therefore, entitled to certain due process protections when the State seeks to terminate the parent/child

described the guardian's duty of appellate representation:

> We note with approval that the guardian ad litem for the children appeared before this Court for oral argument and was able to answer several questions concerning the interests of the children. The record indicates that the guardian ad litem has been diligent in protecting his clients' interests below. We continue to emphasize that guardians ad litem have a duty to represent fully . . . the child's appellate rights, if an appeal is necessary. In Matter of Scottie D., 185 W. Va. 191, 198, 406 S.E.2d 214, 221 (1991), we stated:
>
> > It is well established that "[a]fter judgment adverse to his ward, the guardian ad litem has the right to appeal and the duty to do so if it reasonably appears to be to the advantage of the minor[.]" Robinson v. Gatch, 85 Ohio App. 484, 487, 87 N.E.2d 904, 906 (1949). This is based upon the principle that a guardian ad litem has a duty to represent the child(ren) to whom he or she has been appointed, as effectively as if the guardian ad litem were in a normal lawyer-client relationship.
> Part of the duty of appellate representation is the filing of appellate briefs, even when not invited to do so. . . .

(Emphasis added). Although the instant proceeding is not before this Court on an appeal, and the ruling sought to be prohibited is not necessarily a judgment adverse to children herein involved, it nevertheless warrants participation by the guardian ad litem. The outcome of this action certainly affects the children's interests. Furthermore, our decision on this novel issue would have been aided by a response framed from the perspective of the children's interests. Therefore, we remind all guardians ad litem that their duty to represent their clients extends to all stages of abuse and neglect proceedings. See Michael M., 202 W. Va. at 355 n.11, 504 S.E.2d at 182 n.11; In re Christina L., 194 W. Va. 446, 454 n.7, 460 S.E.2d 692, 700 n.7 (1995).

relationship:

> "In the law concerning custody of minor children, no rule is more firmly established than that the right of a natural parent to the custody [of] his or her infant child is paramount to that of any other person; it is a fundamental personal liberty protected and guaranteed by the Due Process Clauses of the West Virginia and United States Constitutions." Syllabus Point 1, In Re Willis, 157 W. Va. 225, 207 S.E.2d 129 (1973).

Syl. pt. 1, In Interest of Betty J.W., 179 W. Va. 605, 371 S.E.2d 326 (1988). The Supreme Court of the United States has similarly observed:

> The fundamental liberty interest of natural parents in the care, custody, and management of their child does not evaporate simply because they have not been model parents or have lost temporary custody of their child to the State. Even when blood relationships are strained, parents retain a vital interest in preventing the irretrievable destruction of their family life. If anything, persons faced with forced dissolution of their parental rights have a more critical need for procedural protections than do those resisting state intervention into ongoing family affairs. When the State moves to destroy weakened familial bonds, it must provide the parents with fundamentally fair procedures.

Santosky v. Kramer, 455 U.S. 745, 753-54, 102 S. Ct. 1388, 1394-95, 71 L. Ed. 2d 599, 606 (1982).

Some general due process protections relating to a parent's participation in proceedings involving the welfare of his or her child(ren) have been established by the West Virginia Legislature, which has directed that "[i]n any proceeding pursuant to the provisions of this article, the party or parties having custodial or other parental rights or responsibilities to the child shall be afforded a meaningful opportunity to be heard, including the opportunity to testify and to present and cross- examine witnesses." W. Va. Code § 49-6-2(c) (emphasis added). See also W. Va. Code § 49-6-5(a) (1998) (Repl. Vol. 1999) ("The court shall forthwith proceed to disposition giving both the petitioner and respondents an opportunity to be heard." (emphasis added)). In addition, this Court has previously held:

> "West Virginia Code, Chapter 49, Article 6, Section 2, as amended, and the Due Process Clauses of the West Virginia and United States Constitutions prohibit a court or other arm of the State from terminating the parental rights of a natural parent having legal custody of his [or her] child, without notice and the opportunity for a meaningful hearing." Syl. pt. 2, In re Willis, 157 W. Va. 225, 207 S.E.2d 129 (1973).

Syl. pt. 1, West Virginia Dep't of Welfare ex rel. Eyster v. Keesee, 171 W. Va. 1, 297 S.E.2d 200 (1982) (emphasis added).[7] While the foregoing authority clearly establishes that parents are entitled to a meaningful hearing, i.e., the right to testify and to present and cross-examine witnesses, before their parental rights may be terminated, it does not resolve the specific question before us, as we have not heretofore addressed the question of whether an incarcerated parent's right to a meaningful hearing requires the parent's physical presence.[8]

We believe that an incarcerated parent's right to a meaningful hearing is not accompanied

[7]Though not an issue in the present case, we note that this Court has also recognized a parent's due process right to the assistance of counsel in proceedings which may result in the termination of parental rights. Syl. pt. 7, In re Lindsey C., 196 W. Va. 395, 473 S.E.2d 110 (1995).

[8]For a discussion of an incarcerated parent's right to be physically present at termination hearings, see Philip M. Genty, Procedural Due Process Rights of Incarcerated Parents in Termination of Parental Rights Proceedings: A Fifty State Analysis, 30 J. Fam. L. 757, 774 (1991-92).

by an automatic or absolute right to be physically present at termination proceedings. See Syl. pt. 4, In re Interest of L.V., 240 Neb. 404, 482 N.W.2d 250 (1992) ("Parental physical presence is unnecessary for a hearing to terminate parental rights, provided that the parent has been afforded procedural due process for the hearing to terminate parental rights."); In re Baby K., 143 N.H. 201, ___, 722 A.2d 470, 472 (1998) ("[D]ue process does not absolutely require an incarcerated parent's physical presence at a parental rights termination hearing, provided the parent is otherwise afforded procedural due process at the hearing." (citation omitted)). While there is no absolute right to be physically present at a hearing, there is the remaining question of what process is due. As we observed above, the right of a natural parent to the custody of his or her infant child implicates a fundamental liberty interest. We have previously explained that in determining the specific procedures necessary to protect a liberty interest, we should consider three general factors:

> The specific procedural protections accorded to a due process liberty or property interest generally require[] consideration of three distinct factors: first, the private interest that will be affected by state action; second, the risk of an erroneous deprivation of the protected interest through the procedures used, and the probable value, if any[,] of additional or substitute procedural safeguards; and third, the government's interest, including the function involved and the fiscal and administrative burdens that the additional or substitute procedural requirements would entail.

Syl. pt. 5, Major v. DeFrench, 169 W. Va. 241, 286 S.E.2d 688 (1982). Accord Matthews v. Eldridge, 424 U.S. 319, 334-35, 96 S. Ct. 893, 903, 47 L. Ed. 2d 18, 33 (1976). We have also recognized that there are certain fundamental principles to be applied when conducting a due process analysis, and due process requirements may need to be tailored to the specific circumstances of the case under consideration:

> Applicable standards for procedural due process, outside the criminal area, may depend upon the particular circumstances of a given case. However, there are certain fundamental principles in regard to procedural due process embodied in Article III, Section 10 of the West Virginia Constitution, which are; First, the more valuable the right sought to be deprived, the more safeguards will be interposed. Second, due process must generally be given before the deprivation occurs unless a compelling public policy dictates otherwise. Third, a temporary deprivation of rights may not require as large a measure of procedural due process protection as a permanent deprivation.

Syl. pt. 2, North v. West Virginia Bd. of Regents, 160 W. Va. 248, 233 S.E.2d 411 (1977).

Applying Major and North to the circumstances with which we are presented in this case, we are instructed that the determination of the particular due process protections to which a parent is entitled in connection with a dispositional hearing on the termination of his or her parental rights necessitates the balancing of various important factors. First, in considering the private interests that will be affected by termination proceedings, utmost priority must be given to the best interests of the child(ren) involved. In addition, regard should be had for the parent's substantial interest in retaining legal custody of his or her child(ren). See, e.g., Syl. pt. 3, In re Katie S., 198 W. Va. 79, 479 S.E.2d 589 (1996) ("Although parents have substantial rights that must be protected, the primary goal in cases involving abuse and neglect, as in all family law matters, must be the health and welfare of the children.").[9] Next, the risk of erroneously terminating the parent's rights due to his or her absence from the dispositional hearing, and the effectiveness of alternate methods for obtaining the parent's participation, should be weighed. Third, the State's various interests, which include, but are not necessarily limited to, the State's significant parens patriae interest in protecting the welfare of the children involved,[10] the State's compelling interest in protecting its citizens from the risk that a convicted criminal might escape (especially when the parent has been convicted of a violent crime), and the fiscal and administrative burdens to the State that are associated with allowing an incarcerated parent to attend a dispositional hearing, should be contemplated. Finally, in analyzing these factors, due regard should be given to the fundamental principles set forth in Syllabus point 2 of North v. West Virginia Board of Regents, 160 W. Va. 248, 233 S.E.2d 411.

While these considerations present a rather complex analytical framework, we note that other courts have wrestled with this issue and formulated a more manageable list of specific criteria as an aid in performing the appropriate analysis. One such court, the Supreme Court of Nebraska, has held:

> In deciding whether to allow a parent's attendance at a hearing to terminate parental rights, notwithstanding the parent's incarceration or other confinement, a court may consider the delay resulting from prospective parental attendance, the need for disposition of the proceeding within the immediate future, the elapsed time during which the proceeding has been pending before the juvenile court, the expense to the State if the State will be required to provide transportation for the parent, the inconvenience or detriment to parties or witnesses, the potential danger or security risk which may occur as a result of the parent's release from custody or confinement to attend the hearing, the reasonable availability > of the parent's testimony through a means other than parental attendance at the hearing, and the best interests of the parent's child or children in reference to the parent's prospective physical attendance at the termination hearing.

[10]See Jeffrey R.L., 190 W. Va. at 32-33, 435 S.E.2d at 170-71 (recognizing "that the State, in its role of parens patriae, 'is the ultimate protector of the rights of minors[,]' and 'has a substantial interest in providing for their health, safety, and welfare, and may properly step in and do so when necessary'" (citing In Interest of Betty J.W., 179 W. Va. 605, 608, 371 S.E.2d 326, 329 (1988)).

Syl. pt. 6, In re Interest of L.V., 240 Neb. 404, 482 N.W.2d 250. Applying these criteria, the court in Nebraska concluded that a lower court had not abused its discretion in disallowing an incarcerated father's physical presence at termination proceedings where the father was provided notice of the hearing and the specific accusations against him, was represented by counsel throughout the proceedings, was provided with transcripts of an initial hearing, participated in a second hearing by phone, was given the opportunity to recall any previously called witnesses for cross examination and had the opportunity to present his own evidence. The court cautioned, however, that "the procedure utilized by the county court surpassed the requirements of procedural due process applicable to [this] case; hence, the procedure used . . . should not be construed as the standard to determine procedural due process for one who has a constitutional right to be heard in a proceeding." In re Interest of L.V., 240 Neb. at ___, 482 N.W.2d at 259.

In reaching its holdings, the Nebraska Court relied on a decision by the Supreme Court of North Dakota, in which that court had similarly stated:

> From our review of cases from the various jurisdictions and the principles of law involved, we are compelled to conclude that a convict does not have a constitutional right to personally appear in a civil suit where he has been permitted to appear through counsel and by deposition, if appropriate. Any right to appear personally would have to rest upon convincing reasons and would ultimately be left to the sound discretion of the trial court.

> In making its determination the trial court may take into account the costs and inconvenience of transporting a prisoner from his place of incarceration to the courtroom, any potential danger or security risk which the presence of a particular inmate would pose to the court, the substantiality of the matter at issue, the need for an early determination of the matter, the possibility of delaying trial until the prisoner is released, the probability of success on the merits, the integrity of the correctional system, and the interests of the inmate in presenting his testimony in person rather than by deposition.

In Interest of F.H., 283 N.W.2d 202, 209 (N.D. 1979) (citations omitted). In this case, the court found that a father's due process rights had not been violated as the father was "represented by able counsel . . . . [and] was given the opportunity and did appear by deposition." Id.

While these two cases from Nebraska and North Dakota involved parents who were incarcerated outside of the state wherein their parental rights were being adjudicated, as opposed to the instant case where Jeanette H. was an in-state prisoner, the courts did not limit their discussions or holdings to out-of-state prisoners.[11] Because due process is a flexible concept, and factors such as those outlined

State Dep't of Pensions & Sec.*, 489 So. 2d 588, 591 (Ala. Civ. App. 1986) (explaining that "[w]here there is representation by counsel and an opportunity to present testimony through deposition, then due process does not require that an incarcerated parent be allowed to attend the termination hearing"); In re Heller, 669 A.2d 25, 32 (Del. 1995) (concurring with the proposition that "'[i]f a parent has been afforded procedural due process for a hearing to terminate parental rights, allowing a parent who is incarcerated or otherwise confined in custody of a government to attend the termination hearing is within the discretion of the trial court'" (quoting In re Interest of L.V., 240 Neb. 404, 482 N.W.2d 250), and finding no due process violation where mother, who knowingly, intelligently and voluntarily chose to discharge appointed counsel and proceed pro se, participated in proceedings by telephone); In re Randy Scott B., 511 A.2d 450 (Me. 1986) (finding no due process violation where parent was represented at all stages of the proceedings, counsel had the right to cross examine all opposing witnesses, parent testified by deposition However, some courts have seemingly limited their analysis to situations where the incarcerated parent is confined in another state. See In re Juvenile Appeal, 187 Conn. 431, 446 A.2d 808 (1982) (providing tenuous guidance as to whether decision applied only to out-of-state prisoners); In Interest of Baby Doe, 130 Idaho 47, 936 P.2d 690 (1997) (same); *State ex rel. Moreover, other jurisdictions have adopted similar rules in cases involving prisoners confined within the state. See People in Interest of C.G., 885 P.2d 355, 357 (Colo. Ct. Finally, we note that the question of whether an incarcerated parent may appear at a dispositional hearing is within the discretion of the circuit court. See Syl. pt. 3, in part, Craigo v. Marshall, 175 W. Va. 72, 331 S.E.2d 510 (1985) ("Whether a prisoner may appear at trial is a matter committed to the sound discretion of the trial court."). See also In re Heller, 669 A.2d 25, 32 (Del. 1995) ("'If a parent has been afforded procedural due process for a hearing to terminate parental rights, allowing a parent who is incarcerated or otherwise confined in custody of a government to attend the termination hearing is within the discretion of the trial court.'" (citation omitted)); Syl. pt. 5, In re Interest of L.V., 240 Neb. 404, 482 N.W.2d 250 ("If a parent has been afforded procedural due process for a hearing to terminate parental rights, allowing a parent who is incarcerated or otherwise confined in custody of a government to attend the termination hearing is within the discretion of the trial court, whose decision on appeal will be upheld in the absence of an abuse of discretion."); In Interest of F.H., 283 N.W.2d 202, 209 (N.D. 1979) ("Any right to appear personally would have to rest upon convincing reasons and would ultimately be left to the sound discretion of the trial court."); Najar v.

Oman, 624 S.W.2d 385 (holding trial court did not abuse its discretion in denying a bench warrant that would have allowed in-state incarcerated parent to be present at termination proceedings).

After thoughtfully considering the above-discussed authority, we first hold that whether an incarcerated parent may attend a dispositional hearing addressing the possible termination of his or her parental rights is a matter committed to the sound discretion of the circuit court. Next, we hold that in exercising its discretion to decide whether to permit an incarcerated parent to attend a dispositional hearing addressing the possible termination of his or her parental rights, regardless of the location of the institution wherein the parent is confined, the circuit court should balance the following factors: (1) the delay resulting from parental attendance; (2) the need for an early determination of the matter; (3) the elapsed time during which the proceeding has been pending before the circuit court; (4) the best interests of the child(ren) in reference to the parent's physical attendance at the termination hearing; (5) the reasonable availability of the parent's testimony through a means other than his or her attendance at the hearing; (6) the interests of the incarcerated parent in presenting his or her testimony in person rather than by alternate means; (7) the affect of the parent's presence and personal participation in the proceedings upon the probability of his or her ultimate success on the merits; (8) the cost and inconvenience of transporting a parent from his or her place of incarceration to the courtroom; (9) any potential danger or security risk which may accompany the incarcerated parent's transportation to or presence at the proceedings; (10) the inconvenience or detriment to parties or witnesses; and (11) any other relevant factors.

In the case at bar, Jeanette H. has filed a motion to dismiss stating that she has been released on parole. Consequently, a writ of prohibition to prevent the enforcement of Judge Pancake's ruling is no longer necessary, and the writ of prohibition is dismissed.

V.

CONCLUSION

For the reasons explained in the body of this opinion, the writ of prohibition is dismissed.

Writ Dismissed.

JUSTICE McHUGH delivered the Opinion of the Court.

SYLLABUS BY THE COURT

1. "'Termination of parental rights, the most drastic remedy under the statutory provision covering the disposition of neglected children, W. Va. Code, 49-6-5 [1977] may be employed without the use of intervening less restrictive alternatives when it is found that there is no reasonable likelihood under W. Va. Code, 49-6-5(b) [1977] that conditions of neglect or abuse can be substantially corrected.' Syllabus Point 2, In re R.J.M., 164 W. Va. 496, 266 S.E.2d 114 (1980)." Syllabus point 4, In re Jonathan P., 182 W. Va. 302, 387 S.E.2d 537 (1989).

2. "W. Va. Code, 49-1-3(a) (1984), in part, defines an abused child to include one whose parent knowingly allows another person to commit the abuse. Under this standard, termination of parental rights is usually upheld only where the parent takes no action in the face of knowledge of the abuse or actually aids or protects the abusing parent." Syl. pt. 3, In re Betty J.W., 179 W. Va. 605, 371 S.E.2d 326 (1988).

3. Parental rights may be terminated where there is clear and convincing evidence that the infant child has suffered extensive physical abuse while in the custody of his or her parents, and there is no reasonable likelihood that the conditions of abuse can be substantially corrected because the perpetrator of the abuse has not been identified and the parents, even in the face of knowledge of the abuse, have taken no action to identify the abuser.

4. "In a proceeding to terminate parental rights pursuant to W. Va. Code, 49-6-1 to 49-6-10, as amended, a guardian ad litem, appointed pursuant to W. Va. Code, 49-6-2(a), as amended, must exercise reasonable diligence in carrying out the responsibility of protecting the rights of the children. This duty includes exercising the appellate rights of the children, if, in the reasonable judgment of the guardian ad litem, an appeal is necessary." Syl. pt. 3, In re Scottie D., 185 W. Va. 191, 406 S.E.2d 214 (1991).

5. Each child in an abuse and neglect case is entitled to effective representation of counsel. To further that goal, W. Va. Code, 49-6-2(a) [1992] mandates that a child has a right to be represented by counsel in every stage of abuse and neglect proceedings. Furthermore, Rule XIII of the West Virginia Rules for Trial Courts of Record provides that a guardian ad litem shall make a full and independent investigation of the facts involved in the proceeding, and shall make his or her recommendations known to the court. Rules 1.1 and 1.3 of the West Virginia Rules of Professional Conduct, respectively, require an attorney to provide competent representation to a client, and to act with reasonable diligence and promptness in representing a client. The Guidelines for Guardians Ad Litem in Abuse and Neglect cases, which are adopted in this opinion and attached as Appendix A, are in harmony with the applicable provisions of the West Virginia Code, the West Virginia Rules for Trial Courts of Record, and the West Virginia Rules of Professional Conduct, and provide attorneys who serve as guardians ad litem with direction as to their duties in representing the best interests of the children for whom they are appointed.

McHugh, Justice:

Jane Moran, who was appointed as guardian ad litem to represent Jeffrey R.L. in this appeal,See footnote 1 seeks review of an order of the Circuit Court of Mineral County which transferred physical custody of Jeffrey R.L. to his mother, Gail L., and directed the West Virginia Department of Health and Human Resources (hereinafter "DHHR") to monitor the situation with home visits. The guardian ad litem asserts that: (1) the circuit court erred in failing to terminate the parental rights of Jeffrey R.L.'s parents; (2) the circuit court abused its discretion in returning Jeffrey R.L. to his mother's custody without substantial evidence to support the ruling; and (3) Jeffrey R.L.'s best interests were not adequately represented before the circuit court. The Facilities Review Panel, commonly known as the Juvenile Justice Committee, has filed an amicus curiae brief urging this Court to adopt guidelines for attorneys who represent children in abuse and neglect cases to follow in order to ensure effective representation of their clients in those proceedings.

I

At the outset, we point out that it is necessary to set forth the facts before us in detail because of the nature of this proceeding and the decision we make. Gail L. gave birth to Jeffrey R.L. on May 23, 1991. Jeffrey's birth was a normal vaginal delivery; however, Jeffrey suffers from hemangioma, an overgrowth of blood vessels on the back of his neck. He has been receiving treatment from Bilal Itani, M.D. for his hemangioma and recurring vomiting since his birth. X-rays of Jeffrey were taken for his medical problems on May 24, 1991 and July 26, 1991. These x-rays revealed no trauma or fractures.See footnote 2

Gail L. arranged for Jeffrey R.L. to be examined again by Dr. Itani on August 30, 1991, because he was not moving his right arm in the same way he was moving his left arm. The x-rays taken by Dr. Itani revealed fractures to his skull, clavicle, ribs, arms and legs. Upon reviewing these x-rays, Dr. Itani arranged to have Jeffrey R.L. transferred to West Virginia University Hospital for further evaluation and treatment.

Although Gail L. and her grandparents had asserted that the injuries were the result of a genetic bone disease, the staff at West Virginia University Hospital confirmed that Jeffrey R.L. had sustained fifteen fractures to his skull, clavicle, ribs, arms and legs, which were at various stages of healing, and that these fractures were not disease-related. The physicians instead diagnosed that Jeffrey was suffering from battered child syndrome.

Upon receiving the diagnosis from West Virginia University Hospital, Grant Hospital, where Dr. Itani was employed, filed a report of child abuse with the Child Protective Services of the DHHR. On September 5, 1991, the DHHR worker assigned to the case, Barbara Mosier, and State Trooper Scott Goodnight went to Gail L.'s home to investigate the report of child abuse. Ms. Mosier found that Gail L., her husband Jeffrey L.,See footnote 3her grandmother and her grandfather were all caretakers of Jeffrey R.L. Gail L., who denied knowing the cause of Jeffrey's injuries, suggested that perhaps he sustained these injuries while rolling around in his crib. Upon examining the crib, however, Ms. Mosier observed that the inside of the crib was well-padded.

By order dated September 9, 1991, the DHHR was granted emergency custody of Jeffrey R.L. The DHHR then filed a petition in the circuit court seeking to have the parental rights to Jeffrey R.L. terminated, and requesting that it be granted guardianship of him. A preliminary hearing on the petition was held before the circuit court on September 19, 1991. The DHHR presented two witnesses at the hearing, Ms. Mosier and William Thomas Corder, M.D., Jeffrey R.L.'s attending pediatric physician upon discharge from West Virginia University Hospital. The guardian ad litem before the trial court presented no testimony.

Dr. Corder testified that Jeffrey R.L. was examined by a pediatric neurologist, a genetics expert, an orthopedist and an ophthalmologist. Dr. Corder testified that all of the experts consulted, with the exception of the ophthalmologist who only ruled out osteogenesis imperfecta,See footnote 4 concluded that Jeffrey R.L. was suffering from battered child syndrome.See footnote 5 Dr. Corder testified that it would be impossible for Jeffrey R.L. to have sustained all of his fractures from rolling around in his crib, that great force would be necessary to cause fractures of the ribs, and that the other fractures he sustained were "consistent with a twisting, torsion, shaking of limbs[.]"See footnote 6 Dr. Corder also testified that when he first saw Jeffrey R.L. he thought the child was blind because most three-month-old children enjoy looking at faces and Jeffrey R.L. did not look at his face.See footnote 7 After a few days of interacting with the nurses, however, Dr. Corder testified that Jeffrey R.L. "started regarding faces[.]"

Ms. Mosier testified at the hearing that she became involved in the case following a referral from Grant Memorial Hospital. Ms. Mosier testified that she spoke with the physicians at West Virginia University Hospital who told her that they believed Jeffrey R.L. suffered from battered child syndrome. Ms. Mosier testified that she then spoke to both of the parents who stated that the child could have a bone disease that caused the fractures, that he could have hurt himself rolling around in his crib, or that he could have sustained the fractures during his delivery.See footnote 8 Ms. Mosier examined the child's crib and found it to be well-padded on the inside. Ms. Mosier then found out through the hospital that Jeffrey R.L. did not have a genetic bone disease, and that he had a normal delivery.

At the conclusion of the preliminary hearing, the court found probable cause to believe Jeffrey R.L. was an abused or neglected child, and concluded that temporary custody should be awarded to the DHHR. The court ordered controlled visitation and directed that the parents undergo psychological evaluations.

Both parents were evaluated by Gregory Trainor, M.A., in October of 1991. With respect to Jeffrey R.L.'s father, Mr. Trainor reported that Jeffrey L. acknowledged that he experienced black-outs, but denied any recent violent behavior.See footnote 9 Mr. Trainor found that his "dissociative experiences are particularly disturbing and may represent some brief psychotic episodes." Mr. Trainor recommended that Jeffrey L. undergo a psychiatric evaluation to determine whether he needed medication.

With respect to Jeffrey R.L.'s mother, Mr. Trainor believed that she had "at least some serious inattention difficulties" and that she was quite dependent on others.See footnote 10 Mr. Trainor suggested that her denial of problems indicates that she would not be "a very good candidate for counseling."See footnote 11 Mr. Trainer opined that it was "difficult to comprehend that this situation could have continued as long as it did in ones own home without some realization that there was some serious difficulty." Mr. Trainor further opined that "[t]he implication here is that [Gail L.] may be quite wrapped up in her own world and not . . . able to focus resources on the care of this child." Mr. Trainor believed that it was very important to identify who caused Jeffrey R.L.'s injuries, and that Gail L.'s "apparent lack of serious motivation to uncover this does not augur well with this goal."

An adjudication hearing was held on November 20, 1991, in response to the DHHR petition to have Jeffrey R.L. found to be an abused child. Both parents admitted at the hearing that some trauma to their child had occurred, but neither one of them admitted to harming the child or identified the abuser. The court found that Jeffrey R.L. was an abused child, granted the parents an improvement period and ordered custody to remain with DHHR during the improvement period. DHHR was also ordered to develop a treatment plan for the parents to complete during the improvement period.

A hearing was held in January of 1992, at which time Mr. Trainor testified that he did not believe Gail L. was active in her child's abuse and that Gail L.'s grandfather had stated that Jeffrey L. confessed to abusing the child.See footnote 12 Mr. Trainor also stated that he would not be opposed to visitation between Gail L. and Jeffrey R.L. in her grandparents' home. The circuit court then entered an order continuing visitation twice a week, and ordered that if a treatment plan was not signed by the parties by February 10, 1992, then the parties would have to appear before the court for another hearing.

The parties appeared before the circuit court again on March 20, 1992 and March 25, 1992, to consider Gail L.'s challenge to the amended treatment plan and to consider further progress in this matter. At the hearing, the DHHR pointed out that Gail L. continued to refuse to sign the treatment plan because she asserted that it failed to address future visitations with the child nor did it provide for ultimately returning the child to his home.

At the hearing held on March 25, 1992, the court heard testimony from several witnesses. Vickie House, a family services specialist with Telamon Corporation, and Bobbie Harman, a case manager at Burlington Children's Placing Agency, testified at the hearing that Gail L.'s parenting skills had improved, and that they did not believe she would cause Jeffrey R.L. any harm. Ms. Harman, however, testified that she believed they still needed to identify who caused Jeffrey R.L.'s injuries.

Ms. Mosier also testified at the March 25, 1992 hearing. Ms. Mosier stated that she believed it was the position of DHHR that unsupervised visitation between Jeffrey and his mother would not occur until the abuser was identified. Ms. Mosier testified that the initial treatment plan had to be modified because Gail L. and her husband, Jeffrey L., were getting a divorce and that it would effect the course of treatment. Ms. Mosier testified that Jeffrey L. had admitted that he has blackouts, and has attempted to hurt himself. Ms. Mosier stated that he acknowledged he needed treatment. Ms. Mosier testified that she had no "hard core evidence" that Jeffrey L. caused his son's injuries. However, Ms. Mosier clarified in her testimony that the statement made by Gail L.'s grandfather that Jeffrey L. confessed to Ms. Mosier that he had battered his son was not true. Ms. Mosier also testified that she had not had any problems in working with Jeffrey L. Ms. Mosier acknowledged that neither Gail L. nor Jeffrey L. had yet completed all of the Telamon program nor had they completed all of the required counseling.

Jerry Borror, assistant supervisor for the DHHR, testified at the March 25, 1992 hearing that if the DHHR does not know who the perpetrator of the abuse is then they believe the child would be at risk to be placed back into the home. Unless the DHHR is satisfied that the perpetrator is identified, Mr. Borror testified that they would move to have the parental rights terminated. Mr. Borror testified that despite what Ms. House and Ms. Harman stated, he believed Gail L.'s parental rights should be terminated. Mr. Borror stated that he had no evidence that either Gail L. or Jeffrey L. caused Jeffrey R.L.'s injuries.

At the conclusion of the hearing on March 25, 1992, the circuit court found that neither of the case plans developed by the DHHR were adequate and required the DHHR to present an amended treatment plan. The court further ordered that after Gail L.'s next counseling session with Mr. Trainor, she would be allowed an unsupervised weekend visitation with her son at her grandparents' house. The court stated that if the first unsupervised visitation was favorable, then another unsupervised weekend would be allowed at Gail L.'s home without her grandparents.

In April of 1992, Jeffrey R.L. was hospitalized so that he could undergo surgery for his hemangioma, and therefore the unsupervised weekend visitation could not occur. The records from Jeffrey R.L.'s hospital stay indicate that he experienced stress because of a conflict between Gail L. and his foster mother over his feeding and care. In a letter dated April 7, 1992, the prosecuting attorney advised the circuit court that a social worker from the hospital contacted Beverly Hill, Jeffrey R.L.'s foster care worker, to inform her that Jeffrey does not eat well for Gail L. and that he became dehydrated during his hospital stay. The physicians at the hospital, therefore, directed the foster mother to be present while Gail L. was visiting her son.

By letter dated April 13, 1992, Mr. Trainor advised the circuit court that, based on the incidents that occurred during Jeffrey R.L.'s hospital stay, he did not believe that the previously planned weekend visit with Gail L. and her grandparents was appropriate at that time. Mr. Trainor explained that [t]here have been interactions observed, between Gail and her grandparents, that suggest that Gail's care of the baby in their presence is a rather tension producing affair. The anxiety seems to be telegraphed to the baby, resulting in a decrease in his desire to take his formula. The weekend visitations . . . should not occur at the present time, pending stabilization in his condition.

Another hearing concerning visitation was held on August 11, 1992. Trooper Goodnight, Gail L. and Beverly Hill, Jeffrey R.L.'s foster care worker, testified. Trooper Goodnight testified that he interviewed Harry Braithwaite, who made a statement regarding an incident he observed between Gail L. and Jeffrey L. while they were with Jeffrey R.L. in front of the "fire hall" in July of 1991. Mr. Braithwaite told Trooper Goodnight that when Jeffrey L. told Gail L. that the baby's diaper needed changing, Gail L. responded that she "ain't cleaning the damned kid." Trooper Goodnight also testified that he interviewed Charles Lee Riggleman, Jr., regarding his visit with Gail L. and Jeffrey L. at their trailer in August of 1991. Mr. Riggleman told the trooper that he went with Jeffrey L. to get the baby from Gail L.'s grandmother's house. When they went into the house to get Jeffrey R.L., Mr. Riggleman told Trooper Goodnight that Gail L.'s grandmother picked up Jeffrey R.L. by the right arm above the elbow and that Jeffrey "screamed" when she did this. Mr. Riggleman also told Trooper Goodnight that he saw Gail L. squeeze her son's chest in front of the fire hall when his diaper needed to be changed again a few minutes after it had been changed before, and that the baby cried as though he were in pain. Trooper Goodnight also testified that when he interviewed Jeffrey L., he believed that he was telling the truth. He further testified that when he interviewed Gail L., he had the impression that "something just wasn't right."

Gail L. was questioned at the hearing about an argument she had with her grandfather. Gail L. testified that she and her grandfather were arguing over the remote control to the television and that he hit her in the nose. Gail L. went to the Burlington Fire Department where the rescue team is located to have someone look at her nose because she thought it was broken. Gail L. admitted that she told the EMT, Karen Davy, that she could not call the police because her grandfather told her if she called them, he would have her placed in jail.

Ms. Hill, the foster care worker, testified that in observing Gail L. with her son, she seemed "a little nervous" and "uncomfortable" in handing him but that it was understandable in light of the fact that several people were watching her. She testified that both parents had been fulfilling the requirements of the case plan. At the conclusion of the hearing, the circuit court concluded that there was not sufficient evidence to terminate the parental rights of Gail L. and Jeffrey L., and directed them to schedule an appointment with Thomas Stein, Ed. D., for an evaluation.See footnote 13

In a progress summary dated August 11, 1992, Mr. Trainor reported that he had made no progress with Gail L. in determining who abused Jeffrey R.L. Mr. Trainor reported that, although Gail L. had made progress on her treatment plan and was attempting to gain more independence from her grandparents, his work with her "has been made difficult by the fact that no one has acknowledged involvement in [Jeffrey R.L.'s] abuse and that that problem has never been directly analyzed and dealt with."

In a letter dated September 28, 1992, Vickie House of the Telamon Corporation stated that although Gail L. and Jeffrey L. had adequately completed their parenting classes, she could not recommend that Jeffrey R.L. be returned to the home until the person who inflicted the abuse is identified.

By letter dated October 29, 1992, the Juvenile Justice Committee was contacted by Dr. Itani, who requested assistance in protecting Jeffrey R.L., and advised them of the proposed unrestricted visitation allowed by the circuit court's order in January, 1992. Dr. Itani wrote that he felt "the child's welfare has not been addressed adequately thus far." Dr. Itani believed that there was strong mother-child bonding between Jeffrey R.L. and his foster mother, and that he called her "mommy."

In response to a request by Gail L., a status hearing was held on December 9, 1992. The circuit court denied the motion of the guardian ad litem for a stay of the proceedings until he could determine from the investigating officer, Dr. Itani and the foster mother their respective positions in this case. The circuit court then ordered that physical custody of Jeffrey R.L. be returned to his mother. The guardian ad litem did not request a stay of execution nor did he initiate an appeal with this Court. The matter has been appealed to this Court by a newly appointed guardian ad litem, Jane Moran, on behalf of Jeffrey R.L.

II

The first issue we shall address is whether the circuit court erred in failing to terminate the parental rights of Jeffrey R.L.'s parents, and whether the circuit court abused its discretion by returning custody of Jeffrey R.L. to his mother without sufficient evidence to support the ruling. The guardian ad litem asserts that the conditions giving rise to the abusive behavior cannot be substantially corrected when the perpetrator of the abuse has not been identified, and that the best interests of the child preclude returning his custody to either parent. Gail L. contends that: (1) there is insufficient evidence in the record to support termination of her parental rights; (2) there is no evidence that she was the abuser; and (3) she has fulfilled all of the requirements placed upon her by the circuit court and the DHHR. The DHHR contends that Jeffrey R.L. should not have been returned to his mother's custody until the perpetrator of the abuse had been identified and a determination of Gail L.'s ability to provide a safe environment for her son has been made.

In the Court's analysis of child abuse and neglect cases, we must take into consideration the rights and interests of all of the parties in reaching an ultimate resolution of the issues before us. Although the rights of the natural parents to the custody of their child and the interests of the State as parens patriae merit significant consideration by this Court, the best interests of the child are paramount. Thus, as an initial matter, we emphasize that the health, safety, and welfare of Jeffrey R.L. must be our primary concern in analyzing the facts and issues before us.

We shall begin our discussion by reviewing the rights of the natural parents to the custody of their children. Relying on the Supreme Court of the United States' decision in Stanley v. Illinois, 405 U.S. 645, 92 S. Ct. 1208, 31 L. Ed. 2d 551 (1972), we acknowledged the constitutional right of the natural parents to the custody of their children in syllabus point 1 of In re Willis, 157 W. Va. 225, 207 S.E.2d 129 (1973):

> In the law concerning custody of minor children, no rule is more firmly established than that the right of a natural parent to the custody of his or her infant child is paramount to that of any other person; it is a fundamental personal liberty protected and guaranteed by the Due Process Clauses of the West Virginia and United States Constitutions.

While this Court has repeatedly recognized the constitutionally-protected right of the natural parent to the custody of his or her minor children, we have also emphasized that such right is not absolute. In re Carlita B., 185 W. Va. 613, 408 S.E.2d 365 (1991); In re Scottie D., 185 W. Va. 191, 406 S.E.2d 214 (1991); Nancy Viola R. v. Randolph W., 177 W. Va. 710, 356 S.E.2d 464 (1987); In re Darla B., 175 W. Va. 137, 331 S.E.2d 868 (1985); In re Willis, supra. We explained the limits of the natural parent's right to custody of his or her minor children in In re Willis: "[T]his Court, early in the history of this State, recognized that the right of the natural parent to the custody of his child is not absolute; it is limited and qualified by the fitness of the parent to honor the trust of the guardianship and custody of the child. 157 W. Va. at 237-38, 207 S.E.2d at 137 (emphasis added).

This Court has also identified the interests of the State where the issue of guardianship and custody of minor children is raised. We have recognized that the State, in its role of parens patriae, "is the ultimate protector of the rights of minors[,]" and "has a substantial interest in providing for their health, safety, and welfare, and may properly step in and do so when necessary." In re Betty J.W., 179 W. Va. 605, 608, 371 S.E.2d 326, 329 (1988). While the State's parens patriae interests may favor preservation of the natural family bonds rather than severance of those bonds, "[t]he countervailing State interest in curtailing child abuse is also great." Id. We have, therefore, observed that "[i]n cases of suspected abuse or neglect, the State has a clear interest in protecting the child and may, if necessary, separate abusive or neglectful parents from their children." Id. Thus, a parent's right to custody of his or her children may be called into question by the State when there is evidence establishing that those children have been subject to abuse and neglect.

W. Va. Code, 49-1-3(a)(1) [1992] defines an "[a]bused child" as "a child whose health or welfare is harmed or threatened by: (1) A parent, guardian or custodian who knowingly or intentionally inflicts, attempts to inflict, or knowingly allows another person to inflict, physical injury, or mental or emotional injury, upon the child or another child in the home[.]" This Court has recognized, in syllabus point 3 of In re Betty J.W., supra, that a parent who "takes no action in the face of knowledge of the abuse" to the child can have his or her parental rights terminated:

W. Va. Code, 49-1-3(a) (1984), in part, defines an abused child to include one whose parent knowingly allows another person to commit the abuse. Under this standard, termination of parental rights is usually upheld only where the parent takes no action in the face of knowledge of the abuse or actually aids or protects the abusing parent.

A parent's rights to custody of his or her child may also be terminated where there is no reasonable likelihood that the conditions of abuse and neglect can be substantially corrected:

'Termination of parental rights, the most drastic remedy under the statutory provision covering the disposition of neglected children, W. Va. Code, 49-6-5 [1977] may be employed without the use of intervening less restrictive alternatives when it is found that there is no reasonable likelihood under W. Va. Code, 49-6-5(b) [1977] that conditions of neglect or abuse can be substantially corrected.' Syllabus Point 2, In re R.J.M., 164 W. Va. 496, 266 S.E.2d 114 (1980).

Syllabus point 4, In re Jonathan P., 182 W. Va. 302, 387 S.E.2d 537 (1989). Such termination of parental rights is even more appropriate in cases where the welfare of a child less than three years of age is seriously threatened and there is no reasonably likelihood that the conditions of abuse can be substantially corrected, as we recognized in syllabus point 1 of In re Darla B., 175 W. Va. 137, 331 S.E.2d 868 (1985):

'As a general rule the least restrictive alternative regarding parental rights to custody of a child under W. Va. Code, 49-6-5 [1977] will be employed; however, courts are not required to exhaust every speculative possibility of parental improvement before terminating parental rights where it appears that the welfare of the child will be seriously threatened, and this is particularly applicable to children under the age of three years who are more susceptible to illness, need consistent close interaction with fully committed adults, and are likely to have their emotional and physical development retarded by numerous placements.' Syl. pt. 1, In re R.J.M., 164 W. Va. 496, 266 S.E.2d 114 (1980).

Finally, the evidence upon which parental rights may be terminated must be clear and convincing. W. Va. Code, 49-6-2(c) [1992]; Nancy Viola R. v. Randolph W., 177 W. Va. at 715-16, 356 S.E.2d at 469-70 (citing cases).

Relying upon the well-established principles stated above, we shall now review the facts before us in the present case. To begin with, during the first three months of his life, Jeffrey R.L. was in the care of his mother, father and maternal grandparents. At the helpless age of approximately three months, Jeffrey R.L. was brought to the hospital when his maternal grandparents showed Gail L. that he was not moving his right arm in the same manner he was moving his left.See footnote 14 X-rays revealed that Jeffrey R.L. suffered fifteen fractures to his skull, clavicle, ribs, arms and legs.See footnote 15 It is undisputed that Jeffrey R.L. suffered these extensive injuries as a result of physical abuse, and the physicians diagnosed him as suffering from battered child syndrome.

Yet, his mother, Gail L., gave several possible explanations for the injuries to Jeffrey R.L. She stated that he could have suffered these injuries while he was rolling around in his crib. However, the crib was found by the social worker to be well-padded. Gail L. also stated that his injuries could be the result of a genetic bone disease from which her grandfather suffered.See footnote 16 Yet, after several tests were performed at West Virginia University Hospital, there was no indication that Jeffrey R.L. suffered from any bone disease. Furthermore, Gail L. offered the explanation that Jeffrey R.L. suffered his injuries during birth, despite the fact that the evidence in the record reveals Gail L. experienced a normal vaginal delivery. None of the evidence in the record supports any of Gail L.'s explanations of Jeffrey R.L.'s injuries.See footnote 17

Although Gail L. admitted to the circuit court at the hearing held on November 20, 1991, that some trauma had occurred to Jeffrey R.L., absent from the record is any evidence which would indicate that Gail L. made any attempts to identify her child's abuser. In fact, as previously noted in this opinion, Mr. Trainor, in his psychological report dated October 3, 1991, found that Gail L. showed "no emotionality about the loss of her child or apparent concern over [his] injuries except for some resentment over the way they had been treated by the physicians and by the Department of Human Services." He also observed that Gail had an "apparent lack of serious motivation to uncover" Jeffrey R.L.'s abuser. Although her grandfather had alleged that Jeffrey R.L.'s father had confessed to him and to a social worker that he had abused Jeffrey R.L., that allegation appears to be without foundation.See footnote 18

Even in the face of knowledge of her son's abuse, there is no indication in the record that Gail L. made any attempts to identify her son's abuser. At the time Jeffrey R.L. suffered these extreme injuries, he was under his mother's care and the care of those individuals with whom she entrusted him. Gail L. is aware of those individuals who cared for her child during the first three months of his life when he was subject to physical abuse; yet, she has never attempted to identify his abuser. Nearly two and one-half years have passed since Jeffrey R.L. suffered his injuries. By failing to even attempt to identify his abuser during this two and one-half-year period, Gail L. has not shown that she is fully committed to the welfare of her child.See footnote 19

Establishing the identity of the person or persons who inflicted these injuries on Jeffrey R.L. is crucial to his health, safety and welfare. Ms. Mosier, Mr. Trainor, Ms. Harman, Mr. Borror and Ms. House have all stated that Jeffrey R.L. should not be returned to either parent until the perpetrator of his abuse has been identified. Yet, despite the fact that the perpetrator has not been identified, the circuit court returned custody of Jeffrey R.L. to his mother. We find that the circuit court clearly erred in returning Jeffrey R.L. to his mother before the perpetrator who inflicted such extensive physical abuse on this helpless infant has been identified.

There is no reasonable likelihood that the conditions of abuse can be substantially corrected because the perpetrator of Jeffrey R.L.'s physical abuse has not been identified. Jeffrey R.L., due to his young age and physical condition, needs consistent close interaction with fully committed adults. Jeffrey R.L.'s health, safety and welfare would be seriously threatened if he were to be placed back into the environment where he suffered extensive physical injuries when his abuser has not been identified. Therefore, because it appears that Jeffrey R.L.'s abuser will never be identified, this Court will not place him back into the environment where he suffered his abuse.

We find that: (1) continuation in Jeffrey R.L.'s home is not in his best interests because his abuser has not been identified; (2) reunification between Jeffrey R.L. and his parents is not in his best interests because his parents have not identified his abuser; and (3) the state department made reasonable efforts to reunify the family, drafted a treatment plan Gail L. refused to sign, arranged for Gail L. and Jeffrey L. to complete a parental training program, and monitored the case. See W. Va. Code, 49-6-5 [1992]. Rather than prolong these proceedings, we believe there is clear and convincing evidence before us to warrant terminating parental rights. Thus, this Court believes that in order to safeguard Jeffrey R.L.'s well being, Gail L.'s parental rights to Jeffrey R.L. should be terminated.

In summary, we hold that parental rights may be terminated where there is clear and convincing evidence that the infant child has suffered extensive physical abuse while in the custody of his or her parents, and there is no reasonable likelihood that the conditions of abuse can be substantially corrected because the perpetrator of the abuse has not been identified and the parents, even in the face of knowledge of the abuse, have taken no action to identify the abuser. Accordingly, the parental rights of Gail L. and Jeffrey L. to their son, Jeffrey R.L., are hereby terminated.See footnote 20 The guardian ad litem shall continue to represent Jeffrey R.L. until he is adopted or placed into a permanent home. If the guardian ad litem is unable to continue representing Jeffrey R.L., another guardian ad litem will be appointed.

By the very nature of the painful issues involved, abuse and neglect cases are troublesome to this Court. Despite our efforts to give the highest priority to child abuse and neglect cases, we have yet to find viable solutions to all of the problems which arise in these cases. As a result, we continue to explore stronger approaches to facilitate the fair and expeditious handling of child abuse and neglect cases.

The Juvenile Justice Committee has brought to this Court's attention the problems which commonly arise with the representation of children by guardians ad litem in abuse and neglect proceedings. Quite often children do not get adequate representation because the guardians ad litem have not been given proper direction as to their role in representing the child in abuse and neglect proceedings. Thus, to further our goal of protecting the interests of children who suffer from abuse and neglect, the Juvenile Justice Committee has proposed that this Court adopt guidelines for guardians ad litem to follow in order to provide children in abuse and neglect proceedings with adequate representation.

In suggesting the guidelines, the Juvenile Justice Committee represents that it has relied upon our state Code, Rules of Professional Conduct, Rules of Civil Procedure for Trial Courts of Record and case law. The Juvenile Justice Committee has also consulted other sources such as: (1) the Department Advisory Committee of the Fourth Department Law Guardian Program in New York, Guidelines for Law Guardians/Abuse and Neglect Proceedings; (2) the National Association of Counsel for Children, Guidelines for Guardians Ad Litem in Abuse and Neglect Cases; and (3) the New York State Bar Association's study, Jane Knitzer & Merrill Sobie, Law Guardians in New York State: A Study of the Legal Representation of Children (1984).

As a brief background, we believe that two studies which were performed, one in North Carolina See footnote 21 and the other in New York,See footnote 22 to evaluate programs that provide children with attorneys in protection proceedings, illustrate why there is concern about the performance of guardians ad litem in child abuse and neglect cases. Robert F. Kelly & Sarah H. Ramsey, Monitoring Attorney Performance and Evaluating Program Outcomes: A Case Study of Attorneys For Abused and Neglected Children, 40 Rutgers L. Rev. 1217, 1231 (1988). First, the North Carolina study found, among other things, that experienced attorneys who knew how to represent their child clients and worked hard, spoke with their clients, and involved themselves in the negotiating and fact-finding, had a beneficial influence in the outcome of the case. However, the North Carolina study found that these experienced, hard-working attorneys were in the minority.See footnote 23 Kelly & Ramsey, 40 Rutgers L. Rev. at 1239. Among the findings of the New York study were that law guardians are uncertain about what is expected of them and that they "feel that they need assistance in their work, in particular, regular briefings on case law and legislation, and access to independent social work and mental health professionals." Kelly & Ramsey, supra at 1246. The results of both studies lead to the conclusion that there should be "greater accountability in the performance of individual attorneys, . . . systematic and continuing evaluations of program outcomes, and . . . enhanced efforts geared toward implementing and testing new approaches to representing children in protection proceedings." Kelly & Ramsey, supra at 1250 (footnote omitted).

More recently, the Colorado Bar Association Family Law Section and Juvenile Law Forum established a Joint Guardian Ad Litem Standards Committee for the purpose of developing proposed standards for guardians ad litem because of increasing dissatisfaction with the inadequate representation of children and the lack of direction given to the guardians ad litem.See footnote 24 Marie Walton & Donna Schmalberger, Standards of Practice for Guardians ad Litem, 12 ABA Juv. & Ch. Wel'f L. Rptr. pp. 13-16 (March 1993). The goals and requirements of the standards adopted by Colorado's Joint Guardian Ad Litem Committee substantially reflect those of the guidelines proposed in other jurisdictions. Those goals and requirements are succinctly stated under the "Guardian ad Litem Mission Statement" included at the beginning of the standards, where the Committee summarized the role of the guardian ad litem and outlined the categories under which the standards are set forth:See footnote 25

The guardian ad litem [GAL] plays an important role in legal outcomes affecting children . . . . The GAL should take an active role in presenting evidence regarding the child's well-being. Therefore, it is appropriate to describe generally the rights and responsibilities of the attorney who assumes this office. The GAL does not necessarily represent a child's desires but should formulate an independent position regarding relevant issues. To safeguard a child's well being, a GAL must render recommendations.

1. Attorney of Record: The GAL assumes a pivotal professional role in litigation. As an attorney of record in the case, the GAL is entitled to be treated professionally with respect and courtesy.
2. Litigation: The GAL shall have the right to and should actively participate and be included in all aspects of litigation including, but not limited to, discovery, motions practice, settlement negotiations, court appearances, jury selection, presentation of evidence and appeals.
3. Education: GAL practice is unique and complex and, as such, requires special education, training and experience with regard to the needs of children.
4. Investigation: The GAL shall conduct a thorough and independent investigation. The GAL shall meet with the child. Relevant evidence should be developed and presented to the court. The GAL may conduct interview[s] with other relevant persons and review exhibits as the GAL deems appropriate. Other parties should fully cooperate with the GAL as the investigation is conducted.
5. Recommendations: The GAL should render informed and independent recommendations which serve the child's best interests. The child's wishes should be considered by the GAL, but need not be adopted by the GAL unless doing so serves the child's best interests.
6. Compensation: The GAL shall be entitled to reasonable compensation for services rendered. The court, in recognition of the important role of the GAL, shall encourage timely payment of the fees and costs to the GAL.

All of the guidelines we have reviewed attempt to provide guardians ad litem with comprehensive standards, like those in Colorado, so that there is little question as to the attorney's responsibilities in representing children. To begin with, the guidelines issued by the Departmental Advisory Committee of the Fourth Department Law Guardian Program set forth the role of the guardian, and set forth the guardian's responsibilities prior to the guardian's initial appearance, prior to and during the fact-finding hearing, at the predispositional and dispositional hearing, and after disposition. Next, the guidelines suggested by the National Association of Counsel for Children provide standards for an independent investigation by the guardian ad litem, preparation for hearings, and "helpful hints" to assist guardians ad litem. The standards developed as part of the New York study, Knitzer & Sobie, supra, set forth guidelines to be followed by the guardian ad litem prior to and during the fact-finding hearing, prior to and during the dispositional hearing, and after disposition.

While the standards recommended in the case before us by the Juvenile Justice Committee conform with the standards discussed above, it is also important to ascertain whether these rules are in accord with applicable rules of practice and case law in West Virginia. In West Virginia, the role of guardian ad litem is generally stated in Rule XIII of the West Virginia Trial Court Rules for Trial Courts of Record, which provides, in pertinent part:

In any proceeding in which a guardian ad litem is appointed, such guardian ad litem shall be selected independently of any nomination by the parties or counsel.

Any guardian ad litem shall make a full and independent investigation of the facts involved in the proceeding; and either by his testimony made of record, or by full and complete answer therein, make known to the court his [or her] recommendations, concerning the action sought in the proceedings unless otherwise ordered or instructed by the court.

Although this Court has not previously adopted guidelines for guardians ad litem, we have addressed a child's right to independent counsel in child abuse and neglect cases in State v. Scritchfield, 167 W. Va. 683, 280 S.E.2d 315 (1981),See footnote 26 and the role of guardians ad litem in child abuse and neglect cases in In re Scottie D., 185 W. Va. 191, 406 S.E.2d 214 (1991). We recognized in In re Scottie D., that the guardian ad litem is responsible for securing the infant's rights, and that "[s]ecuring the infant's rights includes taking an assertive role and, if in the judgment of the guardian ad litem, a case so warrants, prosecuting an appeal." 185 W. Va. at 198, 406 S.E.2d at 221. We summarized the guardian ad litem's role in child abuse and neglect cases in syllabus point 3 of In re Scottie D.:

In a proceeding to terminate parental rights pursuant to W. Va. Code, 49-6-1 to 49-6-10, as amended, a guardian ad litem, appointed pursuant to W. Va. Code, 49-6-2(a), as amended, must exercise reasonable diligence in carrying out the responsibility of protecting the rights of the children. This duty includes exercising the appellate rights of the children, if, in the reasonable judgment of the guardian ad litem, an appeal is necessary.

We further elaborated in syllabus point 5 of James M. v. Maynard, 185 W. Va. 648, 408 S.E.2d 400 (1991), that "[t]he guardian ad litem's role in abuse and neglect proceedings does not actually cease until such time as the child is placed in a permanent home."

Finally, the proposed guidelines encompass some of the basic principles found under our Rules of Professional Conduct. Specifically, Rule 1.1 requires an attorney to "provide competent representation to a client" which "requires the legal knowledge, skill, thoroughness and preparation reasonably necessary for the representation." Furthermore, Rule 1.3 requires a lawyer to "act with reasonable diligence and promptness in representing a client." We believe the guidelines proposed for guardians ad litem essentially reflect these basic rules of practice by which each attorney is bound.

In summary, each child in an abuse and neglect case is entitled to effective representation of counsel. To further that goal, W. Va. Code, 49-6-2(a) [1992] mandates that a child has a right to be represented by counsel in every stage of abuse and neglect proceedings. Furthermore, Rule XIII of the West Virginia Rules for Trial Courts of Record provides that a guardian ad litem shall make a full and independent investigation of the facts involved in the proceeding, and shall make his or her recommendations known to the court. Rules 1.1 and 1.3 of the West Virginia Rules of Professional Conduct, respectively, require an attorney to provide competent representation to a client, and to act with reasonable diligence and promptness in representing a client. The Guidelines for Guardians Ad Litem in Abuse and Neglect cases, which are adopted in this opinion and attached as Appendix A, are in harmony with the applicable provisions of the West Virginia Code, the West Virginia Rules for Trial Courts of Record, and the West Virginia Rules of Professional Conduct, and provide attorneys who serve as guardians ad litem with direction as to their duties in representing the best interests of the children for whom they are appointed. Therefore, this Court adopts these guidelines, effective within sixty days of the date of this opinion, to further ensure the adequate representation of children in abuse and neglect cases by court-appointed guardians ad litem.See footnote 27 By adopting the proposed guidelines in this case, we are providing guardians ad litem with fairly comprehensive standards which they can follow so that they may conduct an independent investigation of the case and present the child's position to the court. The guardians ad litem may use their discretion in acting under the guidelines because the applicability of each of the guidelines is dependent upon the facts of each case.

In addition to the guidelines adopted herein, we believe attorneys who act as guardians ad litem should participate in special continuing legal education relating to the representation. The attorneys in this State are required under Chapter VII, section 5.2 of the Constitution, By-Laws and Rules and Regulations of the West Virginia State Bar to satisfy the following requirements:

¶ 5.2. After the above two year phase-in period, each active member of the state bar shall complete a minimum of twenty-four hours of continuing legal education, as approved by these rules or accredited by the Commission, every two fiscal years. At least three of such twenty-four hours shall be taken in courses on legal ethics or office management. On or before July 31, 1990, and every other July 31 thereafter, each attorney must file a report of completion of such activities. The commission recommends that such report be completed on Form C --- Certification of Completion of Approved MCLE Activity.

Furthermore, W. Va. Code, 49-6-2(a) [1992] provides that attorneys who represent children in abuse and neglect proceedings should complete a minimum of three hours of continuing legal education on representation of children in child abuse and neglect cases per year. Those three hours are merely included in the 24 hours of continuing legal education already required by the West Virginia State Bar. W. Va. Code, 49-6-2(a) [1992] further provides that "where no attorney who has completed this training is available for such appointment, the court shall appoint a competent attorney with demonstrated knowledge of child welfare law to represent the child."

We believe that, because the practice of guardians ad litem is rather unique, and at times complex, guardians ad litem need specialized education and training to fulfill their responsibilities. While this Court, rather than the legislature, controls the practice of law in this State,See footnote 28 we find that the three hour per year requirement of specialized continuing legal education under W. Va. Code, 49-6-2 [1992] is in accord with what this Court intends to be the practice for guardians ad litem. Therefore, we find that a minimum of three hours of continuing legal education per year, relating to representation of children, for guardians ad litem to complete is necessary to ensure the effective representation of children.

IV

Thus, for the reasons stated herein, we reverse the order of the Circuit Court of Mineral County returning custody of Jeffrey R.L. to his mother, Gail L., and terminate the parental rights of Gail L. and Jeffrey L. Furthermore, we adopt the Guidelines for Guardians Ad Litem in Abuse and Neglect Cases, set forth in Appendix A, within sixty days of the date of this opinion.

Reversed.

APPENDIX A

GUIDELINES FOR GUARDIANS AD LITEM IN ABUSE AND NEGLECT CASES

Initial Stages of Representation

1. Notify promptly the child and any caretaker of the child of the appointment of counsel and the means by which counsel can be contacted.
2. Contact the caseworker and review the caseworker's file and all relevant information.
3. Contact and interview persons such as older children, caseworkers, and caretakers who may have information with respect to the child and obtain names and addresses of hospital personnel, physicians, teachers, law enforcement, and other persons who may have pertinent information regarding the child and interview them.

4. Absent extraordinary circumstances and the child is three or under:

a. If the child is in the care of someone other than the respondent(s), conduct interviews with the child's caretakers concerning the type of services the child is now receiving and the type of services the child needs and visit the child in the caretaker's home, making observations of the child or

b. If the child is in the care of the respondent(s), request from the respondent(s)' attorney interviews with the respondent(s) concerning the child's care and the type of services the child needs and visit the child in his/her home, making observations of the child. If refused, ask for assistance of the court.

5. Absent extraordinary circumstances and the client is over three:

a. If the child is in the care of someone other than respondent(s), conduct interviews with the child's caretakers concerning the type of services the child is now receiving and the type of services the child needs.

b. If the child is in the care of someone other than the respondent(s), conduct interviews with the child in a manner and environment appropriate to the child's age and maturity to obtain facts concerning the alleged abuse or neglect and to determine the child's wishes and needs regarding temporary visitation and/or placement.

c. If the child is in the care of the respondent(s), request from the respondent(s)' attorney interviews with the child out of the presence of the respondent(s) in a manner and environment appropriate to the child's age and maturity. It is essential that the guardian ad litem understand that the interview is for the purpose of gathering information not influencing information. If refused, ask the assistance of the court.

6. Provide to the child, his or her parents, and any caretaker notice of the petition and all subsequent motions.

7. Maintain contact with the child throughout the case and assure that s/he is receiving counseling, tutoring, or any other services needed to provide as much stability and continuity as possible under the circumstances.

Preparation for and Representation at Adjudicatory and Dispositional Hearing

8. Pursue the discovery of evidence, formal and informal.

9. File timely and appropriate written motions such as motions for status conference, prompt hearing, evidentiary purpose, psychological examination, home study, and development and neurological study.

10. Evaluate any available improvement periods and actively assist in the formulation of an improvement period, where appropriate, and service plans.

11. Monitor the status of the child and progress of the parent(s) in satisfying the conditions of the improvement period by requiring monthly updates or status reports from agencies involved with the family.

12. Participate in any discussions regarding the proposed testimony of the child and, if it is determined that the child's testimony is necessary, strongly advocate for the testimony to be taken in a legally acceptable and emotionally neutral setting.

13. Maintain adequate records of documents filed in the case and of conversations with the client and potential witnesses.

14. Ensure that the child is not exposed to excessive interviews with the potential dangers inherent therein. Before multiple physical or psychological examinations are conducted, the requesting party must present to the judge evidence of a compelling need or reason considering: (1) the nature of the examination requested and the intrusiveness; (2) the victim's age; (3) the resulting physical and/or emotional effects of the examination on the victim; (4) the probative value of the examination to the issue before the court; (5) the remoteness in time of the examination; and (6) the evidence already available for the defendant's use.

15. Ensure that a child who is court ordered to be interviewed by a psychologist or psychiatrist is interviewed in the presence of the guardian ad litem attorney unless the court, after consulting the child's guardian ad litem, believes that the interview is best conducted without the guardian ad litem.

16. Subpoena witnesses for hearings or otherwise prepare testimony or cross-examination of witnesses and ensure that relevant material is introduced.

17. Review any predispositional report prepared for the court prior to the dispositional hearing and be prepared to submit another if the report is not consistent with all other appropriate evidence.

18. Apprise the court of the child's wishes.

19. Explain to the child, in terms the child can understand, the disposition.

20. Advocate a gradual transition period, in a manner intended to foster emotional adjustment whenever a child is to be removed from the custody of anyone with whom s/he has formed an important attachment.

21. Ensure that the court considers whether continued association with siblings in other placements is in the child's best interests and an appropriate order is entitled to preserve the rights of siblings to continued contact.

22. Ensure that the dispositional order contains provisions that direct the child protective agency to provide periodic reviews and reports.

Post-Dispositional Representation

23. Inform the child of his/her right to appeal.

24. Exercise the appellate rights of the child, if under the reasonable judgment of the guardian ad litem, an appeal is necessary.

25. File a motion for modification of the dispositional order if a change of circumstances occurs for the child which warrants a modification or represent the child if said motion for modification is filed by any other party.

26. Continue to represent the child until such time as the child is adopted, placed in a permanent home, or the case is dismissed after an improvement period.

Footnote: 1 We follow our traditional practice in cases involving sensitive facts and use initials to identify the parties rather than their full names. See In re Scottie D., 185 W. Va. 191, 406 S.E.2d 214 (1991).

Footnote: 2 The x-ray report dated May 24, 1991, found a "[n]ormal newborn chest." The x-ray report dated July 26, 1991, stated that "[t]he organs, soft tissues, and bones appear normal as visualized. There is no evidence of fecal retention or bowel dilatation."

Footnote: 3 Jeffrey L. has represented to this Court that "he desires to remain mute" on the issue of whether the circuit court erred in returning Jeffrey R.L. to his mother, and requests that this Court decide this issue based upon the best interests of the child and the evidence presented to the circuit court.

Footnote: 4 The ophthalmologist was consulted because a symptom of osteogenesis imperfecta, a congenital bone disease causing the bones to fracture easily, is a thin cornea. Jeffrey R.L.'s cornea, however, showed normal thickness.

Footnote: 5 Dr. Corder testified that he placed a "ninety-six hour hold" on Jeffrey R.L. until the courts could decide where to place the child because he felt that "it would not be appropriate to send him . . . back into the environment where he had sustained the injuries."

Footnote: 6 Dr. Corder further testified that he went over Jeffrey R.L.'s x-rays with the radiologist, and that they were able to determine that the fractures were at different stages of healing. While there was a question raised as to when the various fractures were inflicted, the record shows that x-rays taken of Jeffrey R.L. on May 24, 1991, and July 26, 1991, revealed no fractures. Thus, it appears that these fractures were sustained between July 26, 1991, and the date Jeffrey R.L. was examined by Dr. Itani on August 30, 1991.

Footnote: 7 Dr. Corder gave the following response when asked whether there were any other indications that Jeffrey's development was not normal up until this point:

A. Several people had noted something that concerned me from a developmental aspect. When a child, well when you examine a child of three months of age, they like to look at a face. In fact if I were examining a child, if this microphone was a child and a three month old I wouldn't hold up a toy. They wouldn't regard that at all. What they like is to look at a face. And the way you look at the extraocular movements would be to actually get down and have a child close to your face. They just love to look at faces. When I walked into the room the first time he didn't regard me at all, no regard at all, and at first I thought the child was blind so I checked him for light reflexes. It was like literally walking up to someone who is staring a hole through you and that concerned me. Several other people had also found that too. Over the next couple of days and, you know, I noticed when the nurses were feeding him and so forth he started regarding faces, following them and so forth. You know, he had much more normal appearance in interaction.

Footnote: 8 In reports submitted by Gregory Trainor, M.A., another explanation given by his parents for Jeffrey R.L.'s injuries was that he had rolled off his father's chest while he was sleeping with him and that his father may have rolled over onto him.

Footnote: 9 Mr. Trainor also reported that Jeffrey L. told him he usually takes his anger out on himself and that Jeffrey L. described an incident where Gail L. was physically abusive to him:

[Jeffrey L.] reported that he tends to take his anger out on himself, particularly hitting his head on things. He reported the last time he did this was three months ago after an argument with his wife where he struck his head against the wall with enough force to put a hole in it. He reported an incident again with his wife where she had kicked him in the groin and scratched him and he responded by holding her by the wrists so as to obtain her attention to try to talk this disagreement out. She had complained that he was hurting her when doing this. He acknowledged that his 'wife has a temper on her.'

Footnote: 10 Mr. Trainor also observed that Gail L. showed "no emotionality about the loss of her child or apparent concern over [his] injuries except for some resentment over the way they felt they had been treated by the physicians and by the Department of Human Services."

Footnote: 11 Gail L. also related to Mr. Trainor some "physical struggles" she had with her husband. Mr. Trainor reported that:

[Jeffrey L.] will grab her by the wrists rather forcefully and keep her from going off to herself. She reported his grabbing her hard enough to leave bruises. She also said he will sit on her to restrain her. These actions were reported to keep her from walking away. She reports that these interactions occur as a result of her being upset with him. She felt that his feelings get hurt rather easily. She reported that he has never struck her but does engage in some self injurious behavior himself.

Gail L. also gave similar testimony regarding these incidents with her husband at the hearing held on March 25, 1992.

Footnote: 12 Jeffrey L. has denied that he abused his son. Furthermore, in a letter dated October 28, 1992, R. L. Catlett, a polygraph examiner, stated that after testing the grandfather concerning Jeffrey L.'s alleged confession, Mr. Catlett believed the grandfather's allegations were not true. Mr. Catlett also stated that, after testing Gail L. and Jeffrey L., he did not believe that either one of them had caused the child's injuries. We further note, however, that polygraph test results are not admissible in evidence in a criminal trial in this State. Syl. pt. 2, State v. Frazier, 162 W. Va. 602, 252 S.E.2d 39 (1979).

Footnote: 13 Thomas E. Stein, Ed.D., performed a psychological examination of Jeffrey R.L.'s parents and maternal grandparents. He found that Gail L's grandparents had "good knowledge" about appropriate child behavior management strategies. Although he diagnosed Gail L. as suffering from "[r]eactive depression" and "[r]elationship problems," he stated that her prognosis was good. With respect to Jeffrey L., Dr. Stein found that he too suffered from "[r]elationship problems" and found that his prognosis was "[f]air with appropriate intervention."

Footnote: 14 There is nothing in the record which indicates that Gail L. was aware of Jeffrey R.L.'s injuries before her grandparents showed her that he was not moving his right arm. The Court questions how a mother could be oblivious to her son's extreme injuries.

Footnote: 15 As we stated above, Dr. Corder testified that great force would be necessary to fracture Jeffrey R.L.'s ribs, and that the other fractures he sustained were consistent with a "twisting, torsion, shaking of limbs[.]"

Footnote: 16 Dr. Corder testified that the grandfather's medical records made no mention that he suffered from osteogenesis imperfecta.

Footnote: 17 As we have previously noted, polygraph test results are inadmissible in a criminal trial. Curiously, however, Gail L. attached as an exhibit to her brief the report of the polygraph examiner, Mr. Catlett, dated March 4, 1993. In that report, Mr. Catlett stated that "[d]uring the interview, [Gail L.], mother of the infant stated 'she felt the baby was injured at the hospital.'" Gail L.'s statement to the polygraph examiner in March of 1993 suggests that Gail L. continues to offer explanations for Jeffrey R.L.'s fifteen fractures that are inconsistent with the documented medical evidence.

Footnote: 18 As previously noted, n. 12 supra, the reader of the polygraph concluded that the grandfather's statement regarding the alleged confession was not true, and Ms. Mosier testified that Jeffrey L. never stated that he physically abused Jeffrey R.L. Even more troubling to this Court is the fact that Gail L. testified at the March 25, 1992, hearing that she heard Jeffrey L. confess to her grandfather that he abused Jeffrey R.L.; yet, the report of the polygraph examiner, Mr. Catlett, dated March 4, 1993, attached as an exhibit to Gail L.'s brief, states that Gail L. "stated she never actually heard her husband say he injured their infant son."

Footnote: 19 We note that Gail L., who completed her parenting classes, contends she was cooperative with the DHHR. However, she refused to sign the treatment plan.

Footnote: 20 The guardian ad litem before this Court asserts that Jeffrey R.L.'s interests were not adequately represented before the circuit court. She points out that the attorney representing the child did not call any witnesses, did not place any exhibits into evidence, and did not confer with the treating physician or with the foster parents until this petition was filed with this Court. She also asserts that at the hearing in December of 1992, the attorney represented to the circuit court that he had yet to decide whether the child should be placed back with his family. However, because we are terminating parental rights in this case and adopting standards for guardians ad litem to adhere to in the future, we need not further address this issue.

Footnote: 23 Several useful lessons were learned from the North Carolina study:

That attorneys had little effect overall is understandable if circumstances surrounding the guardian's role are considered. First, there was much confusion about the role of the guardian ad litem . . . . This confusion not only prevented the guardian ad litem from having a clear goal, but it was also a source of confusion to the judge who may have resented, criticized, or ignored a guardian ad litem who was taking on responsibilities that the judge felt were inappropriate . . . . The attorney survey showed that 53% felt that judges expected them to assume an adversarial role in representing their client's position, while 41% felt that judges did not have this expectation, at best an ambivalent situation . . . . The condition of ambivalence with respect to the expectations of the attorney was not aided by the fact that guardians typically had received no specialized training relevant to abuse and neglect cases, either during law school or thereafter.

Another, and perhaps more critical, factor in limiting attorney effectiveness was that both guardians and judges seemed to assume that the guardian should play only a minor role. Court records from our sample indicated that attorneys spent a median of only five hours per case. Since this figure includes all court time, the time left for investigation, negotiation, or consultation is negligible. Not surprisingly, guardians indicated that they concurred with the department of social services recommendations in 88% of their cases. Additionally, attorneys usually did not follow their cases after the dispositional hearing to see if treatment plans were being carried out. Attorneys, it appears, were a presence rather than an influence in the court's handling of the cases. Kelly & Ramsey, 21 J. Fam. L. at 451-52 (footnote omitted).

Footnote: 24 The Colorado Committee's standards are for representation of children generally, and are not limited to child abuse and neglect cases. Furthermore, in some states, such as Minnesota, the guidelines are established for lay people who represent children in a variety of proceedings. See Minnesota Judges Association, Guidelines for Guardians Ad Litem (June 1986). W. Va. Code, 49-6-2(a) [1992] provides children the right to be represented by an attorney, but makes no provision for children to be represented by lay persons.

Footnote: 25 In order to be concise, we are not listing each of the standards provided under the categories. The categories effectively summarize and reflect the purpose of the standards listed under them.

Footnote: 26 See W. Va. Code, 49-6-2(a) [1992].

Footnote: 27 The compensation and expenses for those attorneys who are appointed to represent children in abuse and neglect cases pursuant to W. Va. Code, 49-6-2(a) [1992] fall under the provisions of article 21, chapter 29 of the West Virginia Code. W. Va. Code, 29-21-2(2) [1990] provides, in relevant part, that "Eligible proceedings" include "child abuse and neglect proceedings which may result in a termination of parental rights[.]" An "Eligible client" is defined under W. Va. Code, 29-21-2(1) [1990] as "[a]ny person who meets the requirements established by this article to receive publicly funded legal representation in an eligible proceeding as defined herein[.]"

Thus, abuse and neglect proceedings where parental rights may be terminated are eligible proceedings under the provisions of article 21, chapter 29 of the Code. Moreover, a child in an abuse and neglect proceeding is an eligible client under W. Va. Code, 29-21-2(1) [1990]. Attorneys, therefore, who are appointed to represent children in abuse and neglect proceedings will submit claims for fees and expense reimbursements to the appointing court in accordance with the provisions of article 21, chapter 29 of the West Virginia Code. See W. Va. Code, 29-21-13a [1990].

SYLLABUS BY THE COURT

1. "Although conclusions of law reached by a circuit court are subject to de novo review, when an action, such as an abuse and neglect case, is tried upon the facts without a jury, the circuit court shall make a determination based upon the evidence and shall make findings of fact and conclusions of law as to whether such child is abused or neglected. These findings shall not be set aside by a reviewing court unless clearly erroneous. A finding is clearly erroneous when, although there is evidence to support the finding, the reviewing court on the entire evidence is left with the definite and firm conviction that a mistake has been committed. However, a reviewing court may not overturn a finding simply because it would have decided the case differently, and it must affirm a finding if the circuit court's account of the evidence is plausible in light of the record viewed in its entirety. " Syllabus Point 1, In the Interest of: Tiffany Marie S., 196 W.Va. 223, 470 S.E.2d 177 (1996).

2. "Where it appears from the record that the process established by the Rules of Procedure for Child Abuse and Neglect Proceedings and related statutes for the disposition of cases involving children adjudicated to be abused or neglected has been substantially disregarded or frustrated, the resulting order of disposition will be vacated and the case remanded for compliance with that process and entry of an appropriate dispositional order." Syllabus Point 5, In re Edward B., 210 W.Va. 621, 558 S.E.2d 620 (2001).

Per curiam:

Morris G.,[1] hereafter "Appellant" or "father," appeals an order of the Circuit Court of Logan County which terminated his parental rights to the minor child, Jessica G., and transferred physical and legal custody of Jessica G. to the West Virginia Department of Health and Human Services, hereafter "DHHR." The Appellant argues that the circuit court failed to properly consider the wishes of his then thirteen-year-old daughter, Jessica G., before terminating his parental rights. In a brief filed with this Court, the guardian ad litem for Jessica G. also assigns as error that the circuit court failed to make "findings of fact as to whether it considered the wishes of Jessica G., age thirteen, regarding the permanent termination of the parental rights of the Appellant as required by West Virginia Code 49-6-5(a)(6) and if so, why such wishes were ignored."

Having fully considered the record, arguments and briefs of the parties, we vacate the circuit court's order terminating the Appellant's parental rights and remand this matter for further proceedings consistent with this Opinion.

[1] We follow our traditional practice in child abuse and neglect matters, as well as other cases involving sensitive facts, and do not use the last names of the parties. See, e.g., In the Matter of: Scottie D., 185 W.Va. 191, 192 n. 1, 406 S.E.2d 214, 215 n. 1 (1991).

I. Factual Background

The Appellant is the biological father of Jessica G. and has a long history of addiction to prescription medications. The record shows that on August 10, 2007, an abuse and neglect proceeding was instituted against the Appellant and Jessica G.'s biological mother, Kelly G., alleging substance abuse and neglect of Jessica G. The circuit court, upon receipt of the petition, granted DHHR temporary custody of Jessica G. In a subsequent hearing, the Appellant was granted a pre-adjudicatory improvement period, which he successfully completed and custody of Jessica G. was returned to the Appellant.

On April 7, 2008, the DHHR received another referral, again alleging substance abuse by the Appellant. An investigation into that referral found the Appellant to be taking his medication as prescribed, but that Kelly G. admitted to extensive substance abuse. However, an abuse and neglect petition was not filed because Kelly G. had moved out of the Appellant's home, the Appellant had full custody of Jessica G. and the Appellant informed DHHR that he was divorcing Kelly G.

On July 2, 2008, DHHR received another referral, this time informing DHHR that the Appellant had overdosed on benzodiapines and opiates, necessitating his hospitalization in intensive care and placement on a ventilator. DHHR filed an abuse and neglect petition and sought immediate custody of Jessica G., which the circuit court granted.

In his Answer to DHHR's abuse and neglect petition, the Appellant admitted to the allegations that his substance abuse had resulted in the neglect of Jessica G., and moved for a post-adjudicatory improvement period. The record shows that over the course of the next several months, the circuit court and DHHR made substantial efforts to provide the Appellant with opportunities to treat his addiction to prescription medications.[2] These efforts ultimately proved unsuccessful, and DHHR moved to terminate the Appellant's and Kelly G.'s[3] parental and custodial rights.

On June 5, 2009, a hearing was held on DHHR's motion, at which time neither the Appellant, nor Kelly G., appeared. The only witness who testified at the hearing was a social worker employed by DHHR. The social worker testified that while the Appellant had successfully completed an inpatient treatment program early in the proceedings, he failed to follow through with his treatment plan which required the Appellant to enroll in a post-discharge addiction treatment program.

The social worker also testified to Jessica G.'s statements regarding termination of the Appellant's parental rights, stating: "I would note that the child is thirteen and does not wish her father's parental rights to be terminated" and that there "is a very strong bond between Jessica and her father" and that if the Appellant's rights were terminated as requested, that she "would want them [Jessica G. and the Appellant] to be able to have some sort of contact, just because there is such a significant bond." Notwithstanding the "significant bond" between Jessica G. and her father, the social worker testified that she did "not think it would be appropriate for [the Appellant] to regain custody of Jessica."

[2] The record reflects that the Appellant had been seriously injured in an accident and began taking pain medications, leading to his addiction. At the time of the institution of the abuse and neglect proceeding underlying this appeal, the Appellant continued to be prescribed pain medication and was under the care of a pain management specialist.

[3] The record indicates that Kelly G. had been largely uncooperative during the post-adjudicatory improvement period granted to her, including signing herself out "against medical advice" from an inpatient treatment program.

Following the social worker's testimony, and argument of counsel for the parties, the circuit court granted DHHR's motion to terminate the Appellant's parental rights.[4] In terminating the Appellant's parental rights, the circuit court made the following findings from the bench:

> . . . [in] Jessica's best interest we all have hoped that Kelly and Morris would deal with their substance abuse issues. Early on it was recognized and recommended that they avail themselves voluntarily of in-patient treatment programs to help them get clean so that we could work keeping them clean so that they could properly parent their teenage daughter.
>
> The [DHHR] did not object to post-adjudicatory improvement period for either parent. However, the parents have failed to respond or follow through with recommended treatment which would have improved their capacity for parenting. They have willfully refused and are presently unwilling to cooperate in the development of a reasonable family case plan to lead to the child's return to their care, custody, and control.
>
> We have had [treatment plans] and formulated preliminary plans to let them rehabilitate themselves but they again have refused and are presently unwilling to cooperate. Their attendance at hearings has been sporadic. They have not followed through with their

[4] The circuit court also terminated Kelly G.'s parental rights. She did not appeal that termination.

> drug screens as they promised that they would do which can only lead to the conclusion that they are continuing to use drugs. There is no doubt that each of them loves their daughter and that their daughter loves them; and that their daughter yearns for them to clean up their act so that they can be a family unit.
> However, the Court finds by clear and convincing evidence in this case that there is no reasonable likelihood that the conditions of Morris and Kelly being addicted to controlled substances can be substantially corrected; and therefore, the Court grants the petition to [t]erminate both the parental and custodial rights of each of the biological parents.

After terminating the Appellant's parental and custodial rights, the circuit court did note the testimony that established the strong bond between Jessica G. and the Appellant, and ordered the Appellant be provided post-termination visitation with Jessica G., under such conditions as deemed appropriate by the DHHR.

II. Standard of Review

We set forth our standard of review in abuse and neglect cases in Syllabus Point 1of In the Interest of: Tiffany Marie S., 196 W.Va. 223, 470 S.E.2d 177 (1996), which states as follows:

> Although conclusions of law reached by a circuit court are subject to de novo review, when an action, such as an abuse and neglect case, is tried upon the facts without a jury, the circuit court shall make a determination based upon the evidence and shall make findings of fact and conclusions of law as to whether such child is abused or neglected. These findings shall > not be set aside by a reviewing court unless clearly erroneous. A finding is clearly erroneous when, although there is evidence to support the finding, the reviewing court on the entire evidence is left with the definite and firm conviction that a mistake has been committed. However, a reviewing court may not overturn a finding simply because it would have decided the case differently, and it must affirm a finding if the circuit court's account of the evidence is plausible in light of the record viewed in its entirety.

III. Discussion

The record before us clearly demonstrates that the Appellant is addicted to prescription medications and that the underlying action was instituted following the Appellant's having overdosed – the overdose resulting in the Appellant's being placed in intensive care and on a ventilator. There is no dispute by the parties that several efforts were undertaken by DHHR and the circuit court, during the pendency of the action below, to provide the Appellant an opportunity to obtain treatment for his addiction.

While the Appellant participated in the treatment plans, it is clear that he did so with varying degrees of effort and ultimately failed to overcome his addiction. This failure resulted in a recommendation by DHHR that the Appellant's parental rights be terminated. The circuit court agreed with DHHR's recommendation and terminated the Appellant's parental rights on the basis that the Appellant's addiction rendered him incapable of providing the necessary parental care and supervision of Jessica G.

On appeal, the Appellant and the guardian ad litem for Jessica G. argue that the circuit court erred in failing to properly consider the wishes of Jessica G. before terminating the Appellant's parental rights. The guardian ad litem further argues that the conditions giving rise to the neglect of Jessica G. – the Appellant's addiction – were resolvable by a means other than termination of the Appellant's parental rights. This point is succinctly stated in the guardian ad litem's brief as follows:

> . . . the [DHHR] was wrong when it believed it had no choice but to ask for termination of the Appellant's parental rights. Under West Virginia Code 49-6-5(a)(5), Jessica G. could have been placed in foster care until she reached the age of eighteen. Such disposition could have allowed [the Appellant] to petition the court at a later date and show he was willing to provide for Jessica G.'s needs.

The guardian ad litem further argues that another alternative disposition that the court could have considered was to "bifurcate the parental rights of the Appellant . . . and terminate his custodial rights only." The guardian ad litem reasons that such a bifurcation would have "allowed [the Appellant] to retain his parental rights to Jessica G. and to honor the wishes of Jessica G." To be clear, the guardian ad litem does not argue that Jessica G. should be returned to the custody of the Appellant as a result of this appeal and specifically takes the position that the Appellant should not have custody until his addiction is in remission.

The record is clear that the circuit court was made aware by the Appellant, DHHR and the guardian ad litem that Jessica G. did not want her father's parental rights terminated and that Jessica G. had a "significant bond" with her father. In granting post-termination visitation to the Appellant, the circuit court acknowledged this bond. However, under W.Va. Code, 49-6-5(a)(6) [2006][5], the circuit court should have considered Jessica G.'s wishes before terminating the Appellant's parental rights:

> Notwithstanding any other provision of this article, the court shall give consideration to the wishes of a child fourteen years of age or older or otherwise of an age of discretion as determined by the court regarding the permanent termination of parental rights. (Emphasis added).

Id.

After reviewing the circuit court's order terminating the Appellant's parental and custodial rights, as well as a review of the transcript of the dispositional hearing, we find

---

[5] W.Va. Code, 49-6-5(a)(6)[2006] states, in relevant part, as follows:

> Upon a finding that there is no reasonable likelihood that the conditions of neglect or abuse can be substantially corrected in the near future and, when necessary for the welfare of the child, terminate the parental, custodial and guardianship rights and responsibilities of the abusing parent and commit the child to the permanent sole custody of the nonabusing parent, if there be one, or, if not, to either the permanent guardianship of the department or a licensed child welfare agency. The court may award sole custody of the child to a non-abusing battered parent. If the court shall so find, then in fixing its dispositional order the court shall consider the following factors: (A) The child's need for continuity of care and caretakers; (B) the amount of time required for the child to be integrated into a stable and permanent home environment; and (C) other factors as the court considers necessary and proper. Notwithstanding any other provision of this article, the court shall give consideration to the wishes of a child fourteen years of age or older or otherwise of an age of discretion as determined by the court regarding the permanent termination of parental rights. (Emphasis added).

that the circuit court failed to adequately explain why Jessica's G., who was thirteen years old at the time of the dispositional hearing (and is now fourteen years old), was not "otherwise of an age of discretion," Id., and why her wishes were not factored into whether termination of the Appellant's parental rights, and the concomitant bond between Jessica G. and her father, might be contrary to Jessica G.'s best interests and emotional well-being. We are particularly concerned with the complete absence of any testimony at the dispositional hearing by a licensed mental health care provider as to the possible psychological consequences to Jessica G. by terminating her father's parental rights.

In Syllabus Point 5, In re: Edward B., 210 W.Va. 621, 558 S.E.2d 620 (2001) we held that:

> Where it appears from the record that the process established by the Rules of Procedure for Child Abuse and Neglect Proceedings and related statutes for the disposition of cases involving children adjudicated to be abused or neglected has been substantially disregarded or frustrated, the resulting order of disposition will be vacated and the case remanded for compliance with that process and entry of an appropriate dispositional order.

In the case before us, the circuit court should have considered Jessica G.'s wishes, pursuant to W.Va. Code, 49-6-5(a)(6), before terminating the Appellant's parental and custodial rights and failed to do so. Accordingly, we vacate the circuit court's order terminating the Appellant's parental rights and remand this matter for further proceedings. On remand, the circuit court shall consider Jessica G.'s wishes and whether placement in a foster home until her eighteenth birthday might best serve the interest of this child. Those findings shall be specifically set forth in the court's dispositional order.[6]

IV. Conclusion

For the reasons set forth herein, the order of the Circuit Court of Logan County is vacated and this matter remanded for further proceedings consistent with this Opinion.

Vacated and Remanded.[7]

[6] In the event that the circuit court again finds that termination of the Appellant's parental rights is in Jessica G.'s best interest, we encourage the circuit court to again specifically address – as it appropriately did at the time of the dispositional hearing and dispositional order presently before us in this Appeal – those matters set forth in Syllabus Point 5 of In re Christina L., 194 W.Va. 446, 460 S.E.2d 692 (1995), where we held that:

> When parental rights are terminated due to neglect or abuse, the circuit court may nevertheless in appropriate cases consider whether continued visitation or other contact with the abusing parent is in the best interest of the child. Among other things, the circuit court should consider whether a close emotional bond has been established between parent and child and the child's wishes, if he or she is of appropriate maturity to make such request. The evidence must indicate that such visitation or continued contact would not be detrimental to the child's well being and would be in the child's best interest.

[7] Nothing in this Opinion should be interpreted to require the transfer of the custody of Jessica G. from the DHHR to the Appellant. This Opinion vacates only the circuit court's June 8, 2009, dispositional order. All prior orders of the circuit court regarding temporary custody of Jessica G. remain in full force and effect.

Syllabus Point 1, Nicholas v. Sammons, 178 W.Va. 631, 363 S.E.2d 516 (1987).

Per Curiam:

This is an appeal of a January 14, 2009, final order from the Circuit Court of Ohio County sentencing the defendant/appellant Jessica Jane M.[1] (hereinafter "Jessica M." or "defendant") to serve not less than 101 years, nor more than 235 years in the state penitentiary upon being convicted of three counts of first degree sexual assault, four counts of sexual abuse by a parent, three counts of incest, and one count of conspiracy. The defendant asserts that the trial court committed reversible error by (1) allowing the State to introduce hearsay statements the alleged victim made to her foster mother; (2) incorrectly applying our rape shield law by prohibiting the defendant from asking the alleged nine-year-old victim: "How many different men did you have sex with?"; (3) denying defense counsel's request to inquire as to the alleged victim's competency to testify at trial; and (4) denying defendant's motion to disqualify the Ohio County Prosecuting Attorney's Office due to previous contact between the defendant and certain members of the prosecutor's office in a separate matter.

After thorough review of the briefs, the legal authority cited and the record presented for consideration, we find that the circuit court committed no reversible error and therefore affirm the judgment of conviction and sentencing order.

[1] The use of the defendant's last name would make her young daughter easily identifiable. We will therefore adhere to our usual practice and refer to the parties by their first names and last initials only. See In re Clifford K., 217 W.Va. 625, 619 S.E.2d 138 (2005).

I.
Facts & Background

The charges against the defendant stem from allegations made by her daughter, R.M. R.M. was born on December 28, 1998, and resided with her mother until February 28, 2006, when she and her two younger siblings were removed from her mother's residence due to allegations of abuse and neglect unrelated to the sexual abuse allegations that form the basis of this appeal.

R.M. and her siblings were placed in the foster home of Sally Keefer in August 2006.[2] A month after the children moved into her house, Sally Keefer observed R.M. "french kissing" her 18 month-old younger brother and engaging in other overt sexual conduct that she considered abnormal behavior for a seven-year old child. During October and November 2006, R.M. told Ms. Keefer that she had been sexually abused by her mother and her mother's boyfriend, Jack Jones[3], prior to being removed from her mother's house. Sally Keefer recorded these disclosures in a journal, contacted a DHHR (Department of Health and Human Resources) worker and requested that R.M. receive therapy to deal with this abuse.

R.M. also reported these sexual abuse allegations to Michelle Hogan, the CPS (Child Protective Services) worker assigned to handle her case. Ms. Hogan made an audio recording of an interview she conducted with R.M. in which R.M. described being sexually abused by her mother and her mother's boyfriend, Jack Jones.[4]

Following these sexual abuse disclosures, R.M. underwent a physical examination and a forensic interview on November 7, 2006. Dr. Joan Phillips performed the physical examination and determined that a portion of R.M.'s hymen "was totally gone, which is abnormal," and further testified that the absence of the hymen "is considered clear evidence of a penetrating trauma."

Maureen Runyon, a social worker who has worked exclusively with sexually abused children for the last eleven years, conducted the forensic interview. While R.M. denied the sexual abuse allegations during this interview, Ms. Runyon concluded that "based on the . . . behavior and statements that she's made . . . I felt like there had been some type of inappropriate sexual activity." In preparation for trial, Ms. Runyon reviewed R.M.'s history of sexual abuse disclosures and found them to be credible because of R.M.'s advanced sexual knowledge and the sensory details she provided. Ms. Runyon stated:

> [S]he also describes, again, what we call sensory details. She can tell you what it feels like. She can't know what it feels like to have a penis inside of her from watching it on TV. At one point she describes the ejaculation as being wet and sticky. Again, that's a sensory detail that tells me she had to have experienced that to be able to describe it in the type of detail that she does.

[4] Ms. Hogan did not provide the exact date upon which this recording was made, but testified "I believe the disclosures may have started in September" of 2006.

R.M. saw a psychologist, Dr. Sara Wyer, approximately twenty times beginning in the fall of 2006 and continuing through 2007. R.M. repeated the same allegations of being sexually abused by her mother and Jack Jones to Dr. Wyer. Dr. Wyer testified that she found R.M.'s disclosures to be credible "primarily based on the fact that she gave very detailed sensory descriptives. What things tasted like, looked like, felt like . . . I felt that she had had direct experience with that."

Based on these sexual abuse allegations, an Ohio County grand jury returned a 14-count indictment against Jessica M. on January 14, 2008. This indictment included one count of felony conspiracy in violation of W.Va. Code § 61-10-31, four counts of felony sexual assault in the first degree in violation of W.Va. Code § 61-8B-3(a)(2), five counts of felony sexual abuse by a parent or custodian in violation of W.Va. Code § 61-8D-5(a), and four counts of felony incest in violation of W.Va. Code § 61-8-12(b).

The defendant's trial began on October 8, 2008, and lasted for three days. R.M. testified at the trial, stating that her mother held her down while Jack Jones raped her. R.M. also testified that her mother put her fingers inside of her vagina, made R.M. touch her breast, performed oral sex on R.M., and made R.M. perform oral sex on her.

The State called a number of witnesses who corroborated R.M.'s testimony including R.M.'s foster mother, Sally Keefer; R.M.'s CPS worker, Michelle Hogan; Dr. Phillips, whose physical findings showed "clear evidence of a penetrating trauma"; Maureen Runyon who conducted the forensic interview, reviewed R.M.'s history of sexual abuse disclosures and testified that she found R.M.'s allegations to be credible; and Dr. Sara Wyer, a psychologist who treated R.M. and found her allegations to be credible.

The State also called Connie Roy, a Licensed Professional Clinical Counselor at a residential treatment facility where R.M. spent five months receiving treatment.[5] Both Ms. Roy and a physician employed at the facility diagnosed R.M. with "post-traumatic stress disorder, chronic, and sexual abuse of child, focus on victim." Ms. Roy testified that the post-traumatic stress disorder was a result of the sexual abuse R.M. suffered. Ms. Roy further testified that R.M.'s behavior and the manner in which she made the sexual abuse disclosures were consistent with that of a child who has been sexually abused.

At the close of the State's case, the defendant moved for a directed verdict of acquittal on all fourteen counts in the indictment. The court dismissed counts five, ten, and fourteen of the indictment[6] and denied the defendant's motion as to the remaining eleven counts.

The defendant's case consisted of three witnesses. Jessica M. testified on her own behalf and denied the allegations her daughter made against her, stating that she never sexually abused her daughter and would not allow anyone else to sexually abuse her daughter. The defendant next called Dr. Michael Crabtree, an expert in psychology who testified that R.M.'s accusations were not credible and that the defendant did not fit the profile of a sex offender. The defendant's final witness was Dr. David Mosman, a pediatrician in Wheeling, West Virginia, who treated R.M. for a sore throat in November 2004. He testified that he only saw R.M. on one occasion and was not aware that R.M. had been sexually abused. On cross-examination, Dr. Mosman testified that he never performed a pelvic examination on R.M. because he was simply treating her for a sore throat.

[5] R.M. was an in-patient at this facility from March through August 2008.

[6] These three counts charge the defendant with forcing R.M. to "penetrate the sexual organ of JESSICA M. with a foreign object for the purpose of gratifying the sexual desire of JESSICA M. . . ." The State failed to present sufficient evidence that this act occurred and conceded that these three counts were properly dismissed.

The jury convicted the defendant on all eleven counts remaining in the indictment. On January 14, 2009, the circuit court sentenced the defendant to serve not less than 101 years, nor more than 235 years in the state penitentiary. The defendant appeals from this sentencing order.

II.
Standard of Review

Because the issues raised in the instant appeal require the application of separate and distinct standards of review, we incorporate such standards into our discussion of the issues to which they pertain.

III.
Discussion

The defendant raises four issues upon which she asserts the trial court committed reversible error: (1) allowing the State to introduce hearsay statements the alleged victim made to her foster mother, thereby violating the defendant's Sixth Amendment right to confrontation pursuant to Crawford v. Washington, 541 U.S. 36, (2004); (2) incorrectly applying our rape shield law by prohibiting the defendant from asking the alleged nine-year-old victim: "How many different men did you have sex with?"; (3) denying defense counsel's request to inquire as to the alleged victim's competency to testify at trial; and (4) denying defendant's motion to disqualify the Ohio County Prosecuting Attorney's Office due to previous contact between the defendant and certain members of the prosecutor's office in a separate matter.

A.(1)
Hearsay Statements

The defendant first argues that the trial judge improperly permitted the State to introduce hearsay statements through the testimony of Sally Keefer, R.M.'s foster mother, about the sexual abuse disclosures R.M. revealed to her.

When reviewing a challenge to a trial court's admission of evidence, we apply the following standard of review: "'(r)ulings on the admissibility of evidence are largely within a trial court's sound discretion and should not be disturbed unless there has been an abuse of discretion.' State v. Louk, 171 W.Va. 639, 643, 301 S.E.2d 596, 599 (1983)." Syllabus Point 2, State v. Peyatt, 173 W.Va. 317, 315 S.E.2d 574 (1983). See also Syllabus Point 1, State v. Pettrey, 209 W.Va. 449, 549 S.E.2d 323 (2001).

In making a determination whether the testimony in question constitutes hearsay[7], we are guided by Syllabus Point 1 of State v. Maynard, 183 W.Va. 1, 393 S.E.2d 221 (1990), which states:

> Generally, out-of-court statements made by someone other than the declarant while testifying are not admissible unless: 1) the statement is not being offered for the truth of the matter asserted, but for some other purpose such as motive, intent, state-of-mind, identification or reasonableness of the party's action; 2) the statement is not hearsay under the rules; or 3) the statement is hearsay but falls within an exception provided for in the rules.

With these standards in mind, we turn to the defendant's argument. During direct examination, the State asked R.M.'s foster mother about a November 22, 2006, journal entry documenting R.M.'s sexual abuse disclosure and she testified as follows:

> She was just going on about her business, getting a bath. I was getting the other two out, drying them off, and she just looked at me, and said, "Sally, can I tell you something?" I said, "Yes." She said, "Jack did touch my privates."

Defense counsel objected to this testimony, arguing that it was impermissible hearsay. The trial judge initially agreed and stated that if it was being offered for the truth of the matter asserted, the objection would be sustained. The State argued that it should be permitted to show the child's advanced sexual knowledge. The trial judge agreed with the State and gave the jury the following instruction:

[7] "Hearsay" is a statement, other than one made by the declarant while testifying at the trial or hearing, offered in evidence to prove the truth of the matter asserted. W.Va.R.Evid. 801(c).

> Ladies and gentlemen, please disregard the witness's last answer. These statements regarding what's in the journal, as I understand it, are not being offered for the truth of the matter asserted within the statements.

Based on this ruling, the State continued asking R.M.'s foster mother questions about the sexual disclosures R.M. made which were recorded in the foster mother's journal. The trial judge gave defense counsel a continuing objection to these questions,[8] gave two more instructions to the jury that this testimony was not to be considered for the truth of the matter asserted and instructed them, "(a)s I understand it, they are being offered to demonstrate sexual knowledge possessed by R.M."

[8] An example of this line of questioning is as follows:

Q. So she had a code word for her private area?

A. Yes. I never told her nothing and you know, if I would've referred to anything with any of the children, it would've been their pee-bug or private area. She used the word "coochie" and penis.

Q. Okay. So "coochie" was not a term that you came up with?

A. No.

Q. So I think you said that she described her mother using her tongue?

A. Yes. And so I asked her, "What did your mother do with her tongue?" And she said that she would move it up and down and she would ask her if it felt good and did she like it. And R.M. said she said yes because she was scared to tell her mother no.

After reviewing the entire record, we conclude that the trial judge did not abuse his discretion by permitting Sally Keefer to testify regarding R.M.'s sexual abuse disclosures. In State v. Edward Charles L., 183 W.Va. 641, 398 S.E.2d 123 (1990), and State v. James B., Sr., 204 W.Va. 48, 511 S.E.2d 459 (1998), we addressed the admissibility of statements a child who had allegedly been sexually abused made to their mother or foster mother. In Edward Charles L., we upheld the admissibility of this kind of statement under West Virginia Rule of Evidence 803(24), the catch-all exception to the hearsay rule, stating that:

> [T]he mother's testimony was properly admitted at trial by the lower court, since the children were present to testify and be cross-examined; the mother added nothing substantive to the children's direct testimony, and primarily related the child's statements not to prove the truth of the matter asserted, but to explain why she took them to the psychologist[.]

Edward Charles L., 183 W.Va. at 657, 398 S.E.2d at 139.

We further determined in Edward Charles L., that "the statements comport to this hearsay exception and the general rules of evidence because they not only meet the relevancy and probativeness requirements but the fact that the children testified at trial and were subject to cross-examination ameliorates the real risks of admitting hearsay." Id. 183 W.Va. at 656, 398 S.E.2d at 138.

Similarly, in James B., Sr., we reviewed testimony by a foster mother who testified about a child being made to perform sexual acts with his biological mother and stepfather, James B., Sr. This Court determined that the foster mother's testimony was not hearsay because it was offered not for the truth of the matter asserted, but to explain why the foster mother contacted the authorities. In James B., Sr., the trial court gave a limiting instruction to the jury and told them to consider the testimony for that limited purpose. As in Edward Charles L., one of the main reasons this Court upheld the trial court's ruling in James B., Sr., was that the child testified at trial, thus ameliorating the real risk of admitting hearsay.

In the present case, R.M. testified at trial. Consistent with Edward Charles L., and James B., Sr., this ameliorates the real risk of admitting the alleged hearsay statements made by R.M.'s foster mother. There was a thorough cross-examination as to the sexual abuse allegations R.M. made against her mother. We therefore find that the trial judge did not abuse his discretion by allowing R.M.'s foster mother to testify as to R.M.'s disclosures of sexual abuse recorded in her journal.

A.(2)
Alleged Crawford Violation

The defendant next argues that her Sixth Amendment right to confrontation was violated when the State was permitted to ask R.M.'s foster mother about her journal entries documenting R.M.'s sexual abuse disclosures. In support of her argument, the defendant relies on Crawford v. Washington, supra.

In Crawford the defendant was convicted of assault. The evidence used to support the conviction included a tape-recorded incriminating statement given to the police by the defendant's wife. The defendant's wife did not testify at the trial. The defendant argued that the statement should not have been admitted because he was not afforded an opportunity to confront his wife regarding the statement. The trial court allowed the statement to be introduced. On appeal, the Washington Court of Appeals reversed on the grounds that the statement was improperly admitted into evidence. However, the Washington Supreme Court reversed after finding the statement was properly admitted.

The United States Supreme Court agreed to hear the case to determine whether introduction of the statement violated the defendant's Sixth Amendment right to confront witnesses against him. The Supreme Court found that the statement should not have been allowed into evidence, stating "[t]estimonial statements of witnesses absent from trial [are admissible] only where the declarant is unavailable, and only where the defendant has had a prior opportunity to cross-examine." Crawford, 541 U.S. at 59, 124 S.Ct. at 1369, 158 L.Ed.2d 177. (Emphasis added).

We interpreted Crawford in State v. Mechling, 219 W.Va. 366, 633 S.E.2d 311 (2006), finding:

> Pursuant to Crawford v. Washington, 541 U.S. 36, 124 S.Ct. 1354, 158 L.Ed.2d 177 (2004), the Confrontation Clause contained within the Sixth Amendment to the United States Constitution and Section 14 of Article III of the West Virginia Constitution bars the admission of a testimonial statement by a witness who does not appear at trial, unless the witness is unavailable to testify and the accused had a prior opportunity to cross-examine the witness.

Syllabus Point 6, State v. Mechling, supra. (Emphasis added).

Mechling further explained that "only 'testimonial statements' cause the declarant to be a 'witness' subject to the constraints of the Confrontation Clause. Non-testimonial statements by an unavailable declarant, on the other hand, are not precluded from use by the Confrontation Clause." 219 W.Va. at 373, 633 S.E.2d at 318.

In the case sub judice, the defendant argues that the trial court erred by failing to determine whether the statements recorded in R.M.'s foster mother's journal were testimonial or non-testimonial.[9] The defendant argues that these statements were testimonial and that her Sixth Amendment right to confront a witness against her was

[9] Crawford did not provide a clear definition of 'testimonial statements', but it did provide examples of the types of statements that can be considered 'testimonial':

> Various formulations of this core class of "testimonial" statements exist: ex parte in-court testimony or its functional equivalent-that is, material such as affidavits, custodial examinations, prior testimony that the defendant was unable to cross-examine, or similar pretrial statements that declarants would reasonably expect to be used prosecutorially[;] extrajudicial statements . . . contained in formalized testimonial materials such as affidavits, depositions, prior testimony, or confessions[;] statements that were made under circumstances which would lead an objective witness reasonably to believe that the statement would be available for use at a later trial. These formulations all share a common nucleus and then define the Clause's coverage at various levels of abstraction around it. Regardless of the precise articulation, some statements qualify under any definition-for example, ex parte testimony at a preliminary hearing.
>
> Statements taken by police officers in the course of interrogations are also testimonial under even a narrow standard.

Crawford, 541 U.S. at 51-52, 124 S.Ct. at 1364 (quotations and citations omitted).

violated. We disagree. Assuming, as urged by the defendant, that the statements recorded in the foster mother's journal are testimonial, the defendant's argument fails because R.M. was the out-of-court declarant and R.M. testified at trial. Crawford and Mechling bar the admission of a testimonial statement by a witness who does not appear at trial, unless the witness is unavailable to testify and the accused had a prior opportunity to cross-examine the witness. The defendant's Sixth Amendment right to confront and cross-examine R.M. was satisfied because she testified and was cross-examined.

The defendant acknowledges that R.M. testified at trial, but argues that the trial judge severely limited her cross-examination of R.M. and would not allow defense counsel to ask her about the sexual abuse disclosures R.M. made to her foster mother. The trial judge limited the defendant's cross-examination of R.M. to "the areas that were brought up on direct examination."[10] During the State's direct examination of R.M., the following exchange took place:

> State: Okay. You talked to Sally, your foster mom, about these things that happened to you; right?
>
> R.M.: Yes.

Since the State inquired about R.M.'s discussions with her foster mother during direct examination, the defendant could have asked about these discussions during [10] The trial judge made this statement in the context of ruling on whether the defendant could ask R.M. "How many different men did you have sex with?" This will be discussed at length in section III. B. infra.

cross-examination. We therefore find that the defendant's cross-examination of R.M. was not substantially limited by the trial judge's ruling confining her to the areas that were brought up on direct examination.

B.

Rape Shield

The defendant's next argument is that the trial court abused its discretion when it sustained the State's objection to the following question defense counsel posed to R.M.: "How many different men did you have sex with?" The trial court determined that this question was prohibited by West Virginia's rape shield law, which encompasses both W.Va. Code § 61-8B-11 [1986][11]and West Virginia Rules of Evidence 404(a)(3)[1994][12].

---

[11] W.Va. Code § 61-8B-11 [1986] states:

> (a) In any prosecution under this article in which the victim's lack of consent is based solely on the incapacity to consent because such victim was below a critical age, evidence of specific instances of the victim's sexual conduct, opinion evidence of the victim's sexual conduct and reputation evidence of the victim's sexual conduct shall not be admissible. In any other prosecution under this article, evidence of specific instances of the victim's prior sexual conduct with the defendant shall be admissible on the issue of consent: Provided, That such evidence heard first out of the presence of the jury is found by the judge to be relevant.
> (b) In any prosecution under this article evidence of specific instances of the victim's sexual conduct with persons other than the defendant, opinion evidence of the victim's sexual conduct and reputation evidence of the victim's sexual conduct shall not be admissible: Provided, That such evidence

In this opinion we will refer to both the statute and the rule, considered in pari materia, as West Virginia's "rape shield law."

Our standard of review when considering a rape shield challenge is twofold. First, an interpretation of the West Virginia Rules of Evidence presents a question of law subject to de novo review. Second, a trial court's ruling on the admissibility of testimony is reviewed for an abuse of discretion, but to the extent the circuit court's ruling turns on > shall be admissible solely for the purpose of impeaching credibility, if the victim first makes his or her previous sexual conduct an issue in the trial by introducing evidence with respect thereto.

> (c) In any prosecution under this article, neither age nor mental capacity of the victim shall preclude the victim from testifying.
>
> (d) At any stage of the proceedings, in any prosecution under this article, the court may permit a child who is eleven years old or less to use anatomically correct dolls, mannequins or drawings to assist such child in testifying.

[12] West Virginia Rules of Evidence 404(a)(3)[1994] states in pertinent part;

> (a) Character evidence generally. - Evidence of a person's character or a trait of character is not admissible for the purpose of proving that he or she acted in conformity therewith on a particular occasion, except: . . .
>
> (3) Character of victim of a sexual offense. - In a case charging criminal sexual misconduct, evidence of the victim's past sexual conduct with the defendant as provided for in W.Va. Code § 61-8B-11; and as to the victim's prior sexual conduct with persons other than the defendant, where the court determines at a hearing out of the presence of the jury that such evidence is specifically related to the act or acts for which the defendant is charged and is necessary to prevent manifest injustice[.]

an interpretation of the West Virginia Rules of Evidence, our review is plenary. State v. Sutphin, 195 W.Va. 551, 560, 466 S.E.2d 402, 411 (1995).

Following the State's objection to the question, "How many different men did you have sex with?", the parties discussed the objection at the bench:

> State: This violated - violates the Rape Shield Statute. There's no - I mean, if he's - there's no reason to ask this question of this child, and to ask it about men - or how many she had sex with. There's no evidence in this case that she has had sexual relations with anyone. Certainly not consensual. Or whether she's been perpetrated by anyone else other than her mother. It's not admissible. If there's no claimed injury for which there has to be identification or a disease or such - I mean, it is what it is, your Honor.
>
> Defense Counsel: Your Honor, this child, according to the records the prosecutor's office provided to me, has named numerous individuals that's had sex with - that raped her.
>
> State: Your Honor, that's misrepresenting the evidence.
>
> Defense Counsel: You just cannot - you just can't bring a child - you just can't bring a child in here and ask a series of questions that the answer is yes, yes, yes, and then say, whoops, I can't probe this. I still contend that this child may be incompetent to testify. She'd look up while I'm asking the questions - she's obviously looking to Ms. Wood (prosecuting attorney).
>
> State: Oh, my. This has nothing to do with competency. It has to do with the truthful answers. She's nine.

> The Court: The objection is going to be sustained. You may inquire as to whatever conduct of a sexual nature she described in her direct testimony.
>
> State: Thank you.
>
> Defense Counsel: I can't go into her grandfather, her uncle, any of those people?
>
> State: Your honor, the scope of direct.
> The Court: You can - the sexual acts that she testified to on direct.

The defendant alleges that the trial court committed error when it "prohibited defense counsel from soliciting testimony and introducing evidence of the falsity of R.M.'s other accusations of sexual assault and abuse against different family members." In Syllabus Point 3 of State v. Quinn, 200 W.Va. 432, 490 S.E.2d 34 (1997), we set forth the procedure a defendant must follow in order to cross-examine an alleged sexual assault victim regarding other statements she has made about being the victim of sexual misconduct:

> A defendant who wishes to cross-examine an alleged victim of a sexual offense about or otherwise introduce evidence about other statements that the alleged victim has made about being the victim of sexual misconduct must initially present evidence regarding the statements to the court out of the presence of the jury and with fair notice to the prosecution, which presentation may in the court's discretion be limited to proffer, affidavit, or other method that properly protects both the rights of the defendant and the alleged > victim and effectuates the purpose of our rape shield law, W.Va. Code § 61-8B-11 [1986] and West Virginia Rules of Evidence 404(a)(3)[1994].

(Emphasis added).

In Quinn, the appellant was convicted of sexual misconduct by a custodian of a five-year-old child. The issue in Quinn was whether our rape shield law applied to bar the victim's alleged false statements of abuse by other perpetrators. The appellant sought to use this evidence to prove that the victim had falsely accused others in the same fashion that she falsely accused him. The appellant argued that the rape shield law did not apply to the victim's statements because they were false, and therefore were not evidence of the child's sexual conduct. Rather, they were evidence of the child's false statement of sexual abuse when there had been none. This Court set forth the following standard in Syllabus Point 2 of Quinn to determine whether such evidence fell outside the scope of our rape shield:

> Requiring strong and substantial proof of the actual falsity of an alleged victim's other statements is necessary to reasonably minimize the possibility that evidence which is within the scope of our rape shield law W.Va. Code § 61-8B-11 [1986] and West Virginia Rules of Evidence 404(a)(3) [1994], is not erroneously considered outside of its scope.

In the case sub judice, the defendant did not request a hearing outside the presence of the jury, as mandated by Syllabus Point 3 of Quinn, to present evidence demonstrating that R.M. had previously made false statements that she had been sexually abused by other perpetrators.[13] The defendant never presented the trial court with any evidence that R.M. made false sexual abuse allegations against other people. Defense counsel failed to inform the trial judge during the discussion at the bench following the State's objection that his proposed line of questioning was intended to explore false accusations R.M. allegedly made. Instead, defense counsel simply stated, "this child, according to the records the prosecutor's office provided to me, has named numerous individuals that's had sex with - that raped her."[14]

[13] Prior to trial, the defendant requested an in camera hearing to determine whether R.M. was "capable of testifying in a truthful, credible, reality based, factual, historically correct, delusionary free and mentally distorted free manor [sic]." As will be discussed at length in Section III. C., this proposed hearing was to determine whether R.M. was "competent and credible to testify at trial."

[14] Our review of the record indicates that there is little evidentiary support for the defendant's contention that R.M. "named numerous individuals that . . . raped her." The defendant asserts that R.M. accused her grandfather, her uncle, a boyfriend of her mother's named David Burch, and another man named William of sexually abusing her. The allegation against her grandfather and uncle did not come from R.M. Rather, when the police interviewed the defendant's boyfriend and co-conspirator, Jack Jones, he stated that R.M. had previously had sexual encounters with her uncle and her grandfather. The defendant fails to cite anywhere in the record where R.M. personally made this claim.

The defendant also discusses an alleged dream R.M. had in which the police officer who interviewed her handcuffed and raped her. Again, this allegation came not from R.M., but from the statement Jack Jones made to the police.

R.M. did discuss David Burch and William (no last name given), men her mother had previously dated. R.M. told her CPS worker that David Burch and William would "whoop my butt." When asked if these men did anything else to her, she replied no, "they would smack my butt though." R.M.'s foster mother asked her if anyone else ever touched her "privates," and she replied "Yes, David Burch did." R.M. does not elaborate on this answer and it is unclear from this exchange whether R.M. meant that Burch had done anything more than spanking her buttocks. R.M. told her psychologist, Sara Wyer, that Burch and William were boyfriends of her mother, but did not report that she had been sexually abused by either of them.

By contrast, R.M. made the allegations against her mother and Jack Jones to her foster mother, her CPS worker, her psychologist, and her counselor at the residential

This assertion, with no citation to the record, no proffer, affidavit or live witness to testify to R.M.'s alleged false prior accusations, falls far short of meeting the "strong and substantial proof of actual falsity" threshold we established in Quinn.

Despite her failure to comply with the Quinn threshold requirements, the defendant argues that the trial judge erred in view of the holding in Barbe v. McBride, 521 F.3d 443 (4th Cir. 2008). Barbe held that, under the Rock-Lucas[15] principle, a state court ruling on the admissibility of evidence under a rape shield law must forgo the treatment facility, as well as testifying to these allegations in court.

We further note that while the defendant was not permitted to cross-examine R.M. about these alleged other individuals who raped her, the defendant explored this issue with numerous witnesses throughout the trial and discussed it during both opening and closing argument. The defendant explored this issue with Sara Wyer, R.M.'s psychologist; Dr. Joan Phillips, who conducted the physical examination; Maureen Runyon, who conducted the forensic interview; and Michelle Hogan, R.M.'s CPS worker. During opening argument, defense counsel stated:

> So there's a whole laundry list of people she's making these allegations on. Only two are being charged with anything, my client and her ex-boyfriend. Pap-Pap - if we're going to believe this child, if this child is not a liar - Pap-Pap is not charged with anything. David Burch isn't charged with anything. Michael, whoever that is, isn't charged with anything.

Defense counsel continued this theme in his closing argument, stating:

> I agree with Mr. Kahle (prosecutor) that this is a shame and this child should be innocent and, you know, she should be intact. I don't know why she's unintact. Maybe she put her own fingers in there. Maybe somebody else put fingers in there. Maybe William, David, all these names that were thrown around in this case had something to do with it.

[15] Rock v. Arkansas, 483 U.S. 44 (1987); Michigan v. Lucas, 500 U.S. 145 (1991).

application of any per se rule in favor of a case-by-case assessment of whether the relevant exclusionary rule "is arbitrary or disproportionate" to the State's legitimate interests. The defendant argues that the trial judge erred by failing to consider the specific facts of R.M.'s alleged other allegations and thereby violated Barbe.

Barbe is distinguishable from the instant case because the defendant herein failed to provide the trial court with an adequate evidentiary presentation alleging that R.M. previously made false accusations of sexual abuse against other perpetrators. Barbe was decided after Quinn, discussed our ruling therein and declined to cast doubt on our mandatory requirement that a defendant seeking to cross-examine an alleged victim about a prior false accusation must first present the court with an adequate evidentiary presentation outside the presence of the jury and with fair notice to the prosecution. In order for a trial court to comply with Barbe and conduct a case-by-case assessment of the facts to determine whether the relevant exclusionary rule is arbitrary or disproportionate to the State's legitimate interests, it must first be presented with an adequate evidentiary presentation.[16]

[16] To summarize, three steps are required in determining whether a defendant may cross-examine an alleged sexual assault victim regarding other alleged false statements she has made about being the victim of sexual misconduct. First, the defendant must comply with Syllabus Point 3 of Quinn and present the court with a meaningful "proffer, affidavit, or other method that properly protects both the rights of the defendant and the alleged victim." If the defendant fails to comply with this requirement, the court can not perform steps two and three of this analysis.

The second step is for the court to determine whether the defendant has met the threshold set forth in Syllabus Point 2 of Quinn and presented "strong and substantial proof of the actual falsity of an alleged victim's other statements." If the defendant has met that threshold, then the false statements will not be excluded pursuant to our rape

Because the defendant in the instant case failed to make an adequate evidentiary presentation, as mandated by Quinn, we find that the trial court did not commit error. In view of the defendant's failure to follow Quinn, permitting defense counsel to ask R.M., "How many men have you had sex with?" would defy the letter and spirit of our rape shield law.

C.
Competency Issue

The defendant next alleges that the trial court "abused its discretion and created plain error when it prohibited defense counsel from questioning R.M. regarding certain facts that would demonstrate her inability to testify as a competent witness."

---

shield law. If the court determines that a defendant has not met this threshold, it must move on to the third step of the analysis.

The third step, consistent with Barbe, is for a court that determines the falsity exception does not apply, to then conduct a case-by-case assessment and perform the balancing test we set forth in Syllabus Point 6 of State v. Guthrie, 205 W.Va. 326, 518 S.E.2d 83 (1999), to determine whether the exclusion of the proffered evidence under our rape shield law violates a defendant's due process right to a fair trial. Syllabus Point 6 of State v. Guthrie, 205 W.Va. 326, 518 S.E.2d 83 (1999), states:

> The test used to determine whether a trial court's exclusion of proffered evidence under our rape shield law violated a defendant's due process right to a fair trial is (1) whether that testimony was relevant; (2) whether the probative value of the evidence outweighed its prejudicial effect; and (3) whether the State's compelling interests in excluding the evidence outweighed the defendant's right to present relevant evidence supportive of his or her defense. Under this test, we will reverse a trial court's ruling only if there has been a clear abuse of discretion.

Our standard of review when examining whether a witness is competent to testify can be found in Syllabus Point 10 of State v. Pettrey, 209 W.Va. 449, 549 S.E.2d 323 (2001):

> "The question of the competency of a witness to testify is left largely to the discretion of the trial court and its judgment will not be disturbed unless shown to have been plainly abused resulting in manifest error." Syllabus Point 8, State v. Wilson, 157 W.Va. 1036, 207 S.E.2d 174 (1974).

Our rape shield law plainly states that, "[i]n any prosecution under this article, neither age nor mental capacity of the victim shall preclude the victim from testifying." W.Va. Code § 61-8B-11(c) [1986].[17]

We are also guided by Wheeler v. United States, 159 U.S. 523, 16 S.Ct. 93 (1895), in which the United States Supreme Court gave direction on how courts should evaluate the competency of a child witness:

> [T]here is no precise age which determines the question of competency. This depends on the capacity and intelligence of the child, his appreciation of the difference between truth and falsehood, as well as his duty to tell the former. The decision of this question rests primarily with the trial judge, who sees the proposed witness, notices his manner, his apparent possession or lack of intelligence, and may resort to any examination which will tend to disclose his capacity and intelligence as well as his understanding of the obligations of an oath. As many of these matters cannot be photographed into the record, the decision of the trial judge will not be disturbed on review unless from that which is preserved it is clear that it was erroneous.

[17] W.Va. Code § 61-8B-11 [1986] is quoted in full in footnote 11.

Consistent with this "clearly erroneous" standard, this Court has consistently held that the decision to allow or to refuse to allow a child's testimony is within the sound discretion of the trial judge and will not be reversed on appeal unless there is a clear showing of abuse of discretion.[18]

Applying these principles to the instant case, we first note that before R.M. testified, the trial judge engaged in a conversation with her to determine if she was competent to testify. This examination revealed that R.M. had the capacity and intelligence to understand that she had the duty to be truthful.

Based on this conversation and a review of R.M.'s testimony, we find the trial court did not commit error by allowing R.M. to testify. R.M. testified about being sexually assaulted in detail, including the following exchange during cross-examination in which she describes her mother holding her down while Jack Jones raped her:

> Q. Now, R., you mentioned earlier somebody held you down; is that correct?
>
> R.M. Yes.
>
> Q. Okay. Who did that?
>
> R.M. My mom.
>
> Q. Okay. And why did she do that?
>
> R.M. (No response).

---

[18] See, State v. Watson, 173 W.Va. 553, 318 S.E.2d 603 (1984); State v. Carter, 168 W.Va. 90, 282 S.E.2d 277 (1981); State v. Ayers, 179 W.Va. 365, 369 S.E.2d 22 (1988); State v. Price, 96 W.Va. 498, 123 S.E. 283 (1924).

Q. Let me ask you another question. What happened when she held you down?

R.M. I was screaming and kicking.

Q. Now, where were you when all this was happening?

R.M. At my mom's place, Hil-dar. . . . It was an apartment thing . . . the place where we lived in Hil-dar had an upstairs and a downstairs.

This exchange illustrates that R.M. was able to describe what happened to her, where it happened and how she responded. The only question she was unable to answer called for her to speculate on her mother's motivation for sexually abusing her ("And why did she do that?"). While there were other questions R.M. was not able to fully answer, a review of the entirety of her testimony reveals that she was competent to testify. On the occasions she had difficulty answering certain questions, this was an issue of credibility for the jury to weigh, not an issue of competency. We are satisfied that the trial judge was in the best position to evaluate R.M.'s competency and we find no abuse of discretion on this issue.

D.
Motion to Disqualify Ohio County Prosecutor's Office

The defendant's final assignment of error is that the trial court erred when it denied her motion to disqualify the Ohio County Prosecutor's Office. The trial court's order denying this motion sets forth the following facts:

> The motion is based upon past dealings between the Prosecuting Attorney's office and Jessica M. The first contact that Jessica M. had with the Prosecuting Attorney's office in the past was in the capacity as a victim of domestic violence. She sought assistance and advice from that office on more than one occasion, and was advised to seek a protection from domestic violence order. On several occasions, Assistant Prosecuting Attorney Gail Kahle personally met with Jessica M. regarding her allegations of domestic violence. Attorney Kahle is one of two Assistant Prosecuting Attorneys assigned to the Jessica M. criminal case.
> Additionally, the Prosecuting Attorney's office has been involved in abuse and neglect proceedings involving Jessica M. as a Respondent, as well as Respondent Jack Jones, who is the alleged perpetrator of domestic violence against Jessica M.

The defendant alleges that these contacts between herself and members of the prosecuting attorney's office created an appearance of impropriety. The defendant further alleges that the prosecuting attorney's office may have acquired evidence through these meetings that it used against her in the present criminal matter.

In Syllabus Point 1 of Nicholas v. Sammons, 178 W.Va. 631, 363 S.E.2d 516 (1987), we stated, > Prosecutorial disqualification can be divided into two major categories. The first is where the prosecutor has had some attorney-client relationship with the parties involved whereby he obtained privileged information that may be adverse to the defendant's interest in regard to the pending criminal charges. A second category is where the prosecutor has some direct personal interest arising from animosity, a financial interest, kinship, or close friendship such that his objectivity and impartiality are called into question.

This Court has also indicated that whether a trial court should disqualify a prosecutor, or his office, from prosecuting a criminal defendant is reviewed under an abuse of discretion standard. State v. Keenan, 213 W.Va. 557, 584 S.E.2d 191 (2003). See also State v. Britton, 157 W.Va. 711, 203 S.E.2d 462 (1974).

The trial court conducted a hearing on this matter and issued a detailed order, addressing each of the defendant's arguments. The trial court concluded that while Prosecutor Kahle met with Jessica M., he never acted as her attorney. Rather, he was acting in his capacity as an assistant prosecutor, assisting the victim of an alleged crime. There was never an agreement stating that Prosecutor Kahle represented the defendant, nor did he ever appear in court on her behalf. One of the reasons the trial court was unwilling to conclude that a prosecutor advising an alleged domestic violence victim created an attorney-client relationship was that:

> To find otherwise would create a chilling effect that would negatively impact the willingness of attorneys working in Prosecuting Attorney's offices to assist the victims of domestic violence.

The trial court next determined that the defendant failed to demonstrate that her previous meetings with Prosecutor Kahle created the appearance of impropriety. The meetings between the defendant and the prosecutor's office resulted in domestic violence charges against Jack Jones. The trial court found that these domestic violence charges were unrelated to the sexual abuse charges Jessica M. faces in the instant case. Finally, the trial court determined that the defendant failed to show that she divulged anything to Prosecutor Kahle during her interactions with him that would be adverse to her interests in the sexual abuse criminal proceedings.

Our review of the record indicates that the trial court did not abuse its discretion by denying the defendant's motion to disqualify the Ohio County Prosecutor's Office. Prosecutor Kahle assisted the defendant, an alleged domestic violence victim, in his capacity as an assistant prosecuting attorney. He later brought criminal charges against her when her daughter accused her of sexually abusing her. The defendant failed to show that the prosecutor's office acquired any information in its earlier meetings that were adverse to her interests in the instant case. In view of these circumstances, this Court cannot find that the trial court abused its discretion by refusing to disqualify the Ohio County Prosecutor's Office.

IV.
Conclusion

Based on the foregoing, the judgment of the Circuit Court of Ohio County is hereby affirmed.

Affirmed.

SYLLABUS BY THE COURT

1. "Although conclusions of law reached by a circuit court are subject to de novo review, when an action, such as an abuse and neglect case, is tried upon the facts without a jury, the circuit court shall make a determination based upon the evidence and shall make findings of fact and conclusions of law as to whether such child is abused or neglected. These findings shall not be set aside by a reviewing court unless clearly erroneous. A finding is clearly erroneous when, although there is evidence to support the finding, the reviewing court on the entire evidence is left with the definite and firm conviction that a mistake has been committed. However, a reviewing court may not overturn a finding simply because it would have decided the case differently, and it must affirm a finding if the circuit court's account of the evidence is plausible in light of the record viewed in its entirety." Per Curiam:

Petitioner, Lucinda M. (hereinafter "Lucinda" or "mother"), appeals the June 13, 2012, order of the Circuit Court of Gilmer County terminating her parental rights to her children Jessica M. and Shawnta M.[1] The mother maintains that the lower court erred because the evidence shows both that she successfully complied with and utilized the services she was provided during the court-authorized improvement period, and made the changes necessary to assure the safety of her children in her care. Respondent, West Virginia Department of Health and Human Resources (hereinafter "DHHR"), is joined by the guardian ad litem[2] in arguing that the facts of this case support the termination of the mother's rights to satisfy the children's need for permanency and stability.

Following a complete examination of the record accompanying the appeal, we reverse the order of the circuit court and return the matter for development of a reunification plan consistent with this opinion.

[2]Three different lawyers have served as guardians ad litem for the children during the course of this case. As explained during oral argument by the guardian representing the interests of the children in this appeal, he was not directly involved with any of the proceedings below and his representations as to what occurred during those proceedings were limited to the contents of the record.

I. Factual and Procedural Background

Lucinda is the biological mother of two girls, Jessica and Shawnta. An abuse and neglect petition was filed on March 19, 2009, by the DHHR against Lucinda and her husband, Jesse M., the biological father of the children. The petition contained the allegation that Jessica and Shawnta, then aged three and two respectively, were abused and/or neglected children due to their exposure to domestic violence and drug use by the father in the home.

An adjudicatory hearing was held on May 29, 2009, at which the mother admitted to being the victim of domestic battery and to not removing the children from a home where the father used illegal substances in their presence. The father on the other hand denied all allegations. The circuit court determined the evidence established that the children were abused and neglected by the parents.

Soon after the adjudicatory hearing, the father voluntarily relinquished his parental rights. The court accepted the relinquishment and terminated the father's parental rights at a June 29, 2009, dispositional hearing. At a separate dispositional hearing, Lucinda was granted a six-month post-adjudicatory improvement period, which was extended by three months. Before the three-month extension expired, DHHR filed a motion to terminate the mother's parental rights, to which the guardian ad litem concurred. Following a hearing in March 2010, the circuit court denied the motion and granted Lucinda a one-year rehabilitation period. The court found that Lucinda was meaningfully engaging in services and should receive the treatment recommended in her psychological evaluation. The mother apparently complied with and benefitted from the services provided as it is uncontested that the mother sought and received unsupervised, overnight supervision with the children in December 2010, and that the visitation was increased at a March 2011 hearing. When the court granted the mother additional visitation, it also ordered DHHR to develop a case plan for unification of the mother with the children. Although the guardian ad litem had concurred with reunification at an April 2011 status hearing, he moved to temporarily suspend visitation on May 6, 2011. According to the June 13, 2012, order terminating the mother's rights, the guardian's motion was "based on the fact the West Virginia DHHR reported sexualized behaviors being exhibited by the Infant Respondents in this matter." It appears from the briefs that the court suspended visitation and directed DHHR to conduct an investigation. DHHR filed an amended motion to terminate the mother's parental rights on May 24, 2011, and the matter was set for dispositional hearing.

The dispositional hearing was held on July 8, 2011. DHHR called three people to testify: a volunteer who worked at the school where the children attended pre-kindergarten classes, a man who had lived in a trailer near where the mother had moved, and the Child Protective Services (hereinafter "CPS") worker assigned to the case. The mother also called three witnesses: two workers who provided services to the mother involving parenting, supervised visitation, and transportation, and the therapist who had been counseling the mother for a year and a half on a regular basis.

The school volunteer testified that she had discovered Jessica sitting on a commode in the school's bathroom closely examining her vagina with the lips of the vagina spread apart. The volunteer said that she did not ask the child what she was doing or why she was doing it either when she observed the child or after the child followed her out of the bathroom The only additional information the volunteer provided was that later the same day Jessica unexpectedly said during nap time that her mother had warned her "to watch these two boys that rides bicycles up to our house . . . that they might touch us."

The neighbor called by DHHR to testify was unable to place the mother at a bonfire gathering where attendees were drinking on May 9, 2011. He further denied telling the CPS worker that he saw her at this event. He said that he really did not know the mother, but his stepfather who lived in the same neighborhood did. The stepfather did not appear as a witness.

Before the CPS worker testified, DHHR moved to have the prior testimony regarding the observations and interview of a Maureen Runyon at some unspecified hearing incorporated into the record. The mother's counsel pointed out that she had objected to the admission of the Runyon report at a previous hearing at which Ms. Runyon was not in attendance. The court stated, "The Court will take judicial notice of the prior testimony, but I – I – if you want Ms. Runyon's testimony in, you'll have to call Ms. Runyon as a witness." It became apparent from the CPS worker's testimony that Ms. Runyon was the DHHR employee who interviewed Jessica about the sexualized behaviors the child was exhibiting, behaviors the CPS worker called masturbation. The CPS worker had no firsthand information regarding what Jessica had said about her conduct, and the worker further said that Jessica "did not tell me she learned sexual behaviors from her mother."

The CPS worker also expressed concern with the mother's choice of people with whom she associated. The mother's husband[3] had been abusive and her chosen boyfriend also was inclined to violence. The CPS worker admitted that the mother had told him she stopped seeing the boyfriend. The CPS worker also was concerned that even though the mother followed the multidisciplinary team's advice to move to a different residence, he faulted the mother for choosing a new home without taking advantage of the assistance available from DHHR. He admitted the assistance from DHHR was not a court ordered requirement for relocation, and went on to testify that when he visited the home once the mother relocated, he completed a report saying it was a safe, proper and adequate home. He explained that he now had reservations with the new home because it was near the residence of at least one relative of the mother's former boyfriend. However, on cross-examination the CPS worker said he had no evidence that the mother relied on anyone in the former boyfriend's family to find the new home, that she actually knew of any relationship between the former boyfriend and her neighbor, or that the boyfriend had been to the new home or knew where the mother had relocated. In response to the court's inquiry of how far away the boyfriend lived, the CPS worker said he lived in another county that would be a thirty-five to forty minute drive from where the mother had moved.

The CPS worker also faulted the location of the new home being situated in the same neighborhood as a man who was a registered sex offender. Jessica had told the CPS worker that she had seen a man standing at the edge of the mother's yard – which was explained to be a field – staring in the direction of the children. A man matching the description the child had given was located by the CPS worker. The worker said he believed the man was or had been a registered sex offender; no proof of this status was produced.

Although repeatedly expressing his concern that the mother was not always truthful with him, the CPS worker said that the mother had been successful in parenting classes and therapy sessions and had complied with everything that DHHR had asked of her. He did admit on cross-examination that he had no evidence that the mother harmed her children in any way.

Two service providers contracted by DHHR to provide services to the mother during the improvement period were called by the mother to testify. They each had worked individually with the family. One worker supervised visitations between the mother and the children and provided parenting classes to the mother. Regarding the visitations, the worker said that the children were excited to see their mother and the mother interacted with them appropriately. She testified that the mother did well with the parenting classes and became adept at applying the learned skills to new or changing scenarios. In addition to supervising visitations and teaching parenting skills, the other worker offered training on adult life skills and safety plans for the home. She testified that the mother always participated in the instruction and cooperated in making improvements as suggested.

The final witness the mother called to testify was the therapist who had treated her for a year and a half. The therapist said that he had both counseled the mother and had the opportunity to watch her interact with Jessica and Shawnta. Asked about his observations of the children with the mother, the therapist said "[t]he children were very caring toward their mother. They were not in the least bit intimidated. They were not afraid. They were . . . were very huggy, feely, touchy. She was constantly making sure that they were taken care of . . . . She was the epitome of – of a domestic figure." The therapist also said that the mother had complied with everything that he had requested of her during the sessions. He observed that the mother has come to the realization "that she doesn't necessarily need a man in her life, she's able to take care of herself . . . . Right now she wants to focus on her children and their well-being and not a relationship nor any type of interaction with a male." When asked if the mother needed further counseling, the therapist said that he was taking a new job elsewhere, but he thought the mother would benefit from a new therapist who could be an objective third party to discuss any stressors in her life. However, the therapist made clear during cross examination that the mother was capable of providing a safe environment for her children by stating, "I'm absolutely certain she can protect her children."

The court inquired of the therapist about whether he was aware of the allegation that the mother had taught Jessica how to masturbate. The therapist said this issue had been discussed during the therapy sessions. The mother expressed deep concern with Jessica's self-gratifying behavior, and the mother questioned why it was occurring and how Jessica had learned of these things. In response to a follow-up question, the therapist said he had not had individual counseling sessions with Jessica.

When asked by the guardian ad litem whether he would be concerned for the safety of the children if a child disclosed that her mother taught her to masturbate, the therapist said he would if he believed the mother had done so. The therapist went on to say that based upon his interaction with the mother he had no doubt she was telling the truth. The court proceeded to ask the therapist if a parent's rights should be terminated if a child's disclosure that the parent taught the child to masturbate were true. The therapist said "[i]f the disclosure is true . . . it is a[n] honest to goodness verifiable fact, then, yes, I would have concerns" which would warrant termination of parental rights.

The dispositional hearing concluded with the court taking the matter under advisement.

On July 29, 2011, the mother filed a motion requesting an evidentiary hearing in order to present new evidence that became available after the dispositional hearing. The evidentiary hearing was held on March 7, 2012.[4] The testimony offered at the hearing came from five people the mother called to testify. One person was a woman who had supervised visitation with the family on July 15, 2011; another was the new therapist the mother began seeing in August 2011; and three were involved in arranging and completing a neuropsychological evaluation of the mother to determine her cognitive abilities.

The worker who had provided supervised visitation services to this family from March 2011 to July 15, 2011, testified that she routinely made reports to the CPS worker after each visitation. Referring to her report of a July 15, 2011, visitation, the worker said that Jessica had come to the worker out of a swimming pool where she had been with the mother and Shawnta. The worker said that Jessica was upset and essentially recanted the alleged initial statement about her mother teaching her about masturbation.

The new therapist who testified had only seen the mother a few times since assuming the case, but she said she had been familiar with the case prior to working directly with the mother and agreed with the former therapist's assessment. She further stated in response to questioning that she never saw anything in the mother's character during the counseling sessions that would indicate the mother was attempting to conceal, deceive, lie or be dishonest about anything. When questioned by the guardian ad litem as to whether it would surprise the therapist to learn that the mother had a history of making poor decisions regarding the care of her children she said, "It would now . . . . [even though] [i]t would not surprise me in the past."

Dr. Marc Warren Haut, a professor and clinical neuropsychologist at West Virginia University, testified about the results of the mother's neuropsychological evaluation. He said that the referral that was received asked for a determination of: (1) the extent of any brain problems the mother may have due to epilepsy and to a brain injury she had as an infant; and (2) whether these problems would have continuing effects on her psychological functioning. The doctor said the referral was made so that appropriate therapy could be provided. Dr. Haut said the conclusion he reached was that the mother had minor deficits due to her history of brain trauma but "her deficits were really pretty mild" and "she was doing very well from a psychological standpoint also." He went on to say that from the perspective of her thinking skills there was "no deficit that would preclude her from raising her children."

At the conclusion of the testimony the court once again took the matter under advisement. On June 13, 2012, an order terminating the mother's parental rights was issued. With apparent reliance on the CPS worker's testimony at the dispositional hearing, the court determined that the mother "is a neglectful parent, as she has failed to provide a fit, apt, and suitable home and establish an appropriate environment for the infant children in this matter." The order reflects the court's findings that: the mother participated in rehabilitative services but failed to benefit from them in ways that would protect the children; Jessica was never called as a witness to recant "to the Court the assertion she made that her mother taught her about masturbation;" that there is no reasonable likelihood that the conditions of abuse and neglect can be substantially corrected in the future; and that termination of parental rights would be in the children's best interests. It is from this order of termination that the mother appeals.

II. Standard of Review

A compound standard of review is applied in appeals resulting from abuse and neglect proceedings. In re Emily, 208 W.Va. 325, 332, 540 S.E.2d 542, 549 (2000). That compound standard is summarized in syllabus point one of In Interest of Tiffany Marie S., 196 W.Va. 223, 470 S.E.2d 177 (1996), in the following manner:

> Although conclusions of law reached by a circuit court are subject to de novo review, when an action, such as an abuse and neglect case, is tried upon the facts without a jury, the circuit court shall make a determination based upon the evidence and shall make findings of fact and conclusions of law as to whether such child is abused or neglected. These findings shall not be set aside by a reviewing court unless clearly erroneous. A finding is clearly erroneous when, although there is evidence to support the finding, the reviewing court on the entire evidence is left with the definite and firm conviction that a mistake has been committed. However, a reviewing court may not overturn a finding simply because it would have decided the case differently, and it must affirm a finding if the circuit court's account of the evidence is plausible in light of the record viewed in its entirety.

It is with these considerations in mind that we consider the matter before us.

III. Discussion

The thrust of the argument made by the mother through her counsel in this appeal is that the evidence relied upon by the circuit court to terminate the mother's parental rights did not rise to the requisite level of proof required to terminate her legal and protected right to parent Jessica and Shawnta. The mother's counsel maintains that the primary reason set forth in the order for terminating the mother's parental rights is that Jessica was not called to testify at the evidentiary hearing to recant a statement that was not introduced as evidence in this case. She asserts that the evidence DHHR presented did not demonstrate or prove that the mother nor anyone else inappropriately touched Jessica and/or Shawnta, or that the mother provided inadequate care for her daughters. She points out that the only witness who provided unfavorable testimony about her efforts and progress was the CPS worker, which failed to rise to the level of clear and convincing proof that is required for termination of parental rights.

DHHR maintains the correctness of the decision to terminate the mother's parental rights. The agency maintains that the evidence showed the mother participated but did not fully avail herself of the services provided during her improvement period and failed to make the changes necessary to assure the safety of the children in her care. The guardian ad litem maintains that deference should be afforded to the circuit court's decision to terminate the mother's parental rights. He argues that the evidence in the appendix record sufficiently demonstrates that the mother could not reasonably correct the conditions leading to the filing of the original petition.

This Court has long recognized a constitutional dimension to a parent's right to the custody of his or her minor children. In syllabus point one of In re: Willis, 157 W. Va. 225, 207 S.E.2d 129 (1973), we stated:

> In the law concerning custody of minor children, no rule is more firmly established than the right of a natural parent to the custody of his or her infant child is paramount to that of any other person; it is a fundamental personal liberty protected and > guaranteed by the Due Process Clauses of the West Virginia and United States Constitutions.

The right is not absolute in that it can be limited or terminated by the State if a parent is proven unfit through proceedings affording the parent due process of law. Syl. Pt. 5, Id. Statutorily, termination is proper only when "there is no reasonable likelihood that the conditions of neglect or abuse can be substantially corrected in the near future and[] when necessary for the welfare of the child . . ." W. Va. Code § 49-6-5(a)(6). The phrase "no reasonable likelihood that conditions of neglect or abuse can be substantially corrected" is later defined in the statute as meaning "based upon the evidence before the court, the abusing adult or adults have demonstrated an inadequate capacity to solve the problems of abuse or neglect on their own or with help." W. Va. Code § 49-6-5(b).

Given the significance of parental rights, a heightened level of evidentiary proof is necessary to warrant termination. "The standard of proof required to support a court order limiting or terminating parental rights to the custody of minor children is clear, cogent and convincing proof." Syl. Pt. 6, In re: Willis.

In terminating the mother's parental rights in the present case the lower court made the following findings and conclusion:

> 1. The Court finds that dismissing the petition is totally inappropriate, in that the circumstances out [of] which this petition arises, still exist and to dismiss the petition would greatly endanger the health, safety and welfare of the children.

2. The Court finds that referring the children, the abusing parent, or other family members to a community agency for needed assistance and dismissing the petition is not appropriate in that the Respondent Mother, has participated but has failed to benefit from services, including counseling or other rehabilitative services which would result in the reasonable steps necessary to cooperate with the Petitioner [DHHR] to attempt to remedy the problems out of which this petition arose. Therefore, the Respondent Mother is unable, in a meaningful way, to properly engage and benefit from counseling or other rehabilitative services that would protect the children from being exposed to the abuse in the future.

3. The Court finds that returning the children to the home under the supervision of the state department is inappropriate, in that the Respondent Mother has failed to benefit from intensive services that specifically address her poor decision making ability and ability to make informed decisions regarding the children. Therefore, even with supervision from the state department, the children would not be adequately protected.

4. The Court finds that to order terms of supervision calculated to assist the children and any abusing parent which prescribe the manner of supervision is inappropriate, in that such disposition does not rehabilitate the parent so as to achieve a goal of return of the children, in that the Respondent Mother has failed to take reasonably necessary steps to protect the children in the future from the acts of abuse that led to the filing of this petition. Further, the Respondent Mother has failed to adequately address her poor decision making skills and ability to protect the children, even after counseling and services to address these issues.

5. The Court finds that the granting of custody of the children to the temporary custody of the state department, a licensed child welfare agency, or suitable person, who may be appointed guardian, is inappropriate, in that there is no reasonable likelihood that the conditions of neglect, out of which this petition arose, will be substantially corrected in the > foreseeable future. Therefore, the temporary placement in the state department is contrary to the best interest of the children and would only further delay the ultimate disposition of termination of parental rights in this matter.

>
> 6. The Court is of the opinion and so finds that there is no reasonable likelihood that the conditions of abuse and neglect can be substantially corrected in the future, in that the Respondent Mother has failed to benefit from intensive services and remedy the actions which led to the filing of this petition. Further, the best interest and welfare of the children requires permanent termination of the parental rights of the Respondent Mother in this case.
>
>
> It is ADJUDGED and ORDERED that based on the above reasons there is no less restrictive alternative than termination of Respondent Mother's parental rights. The Court finds the evidence adduced at the evidentiary hearing on March 7, 2012, provided no evidence that there is a reasonable likelihood that the conditions out of which this abuse and neglect petition arose will be corrected within the reasonably foreseeable future. Respondent Mother in this case has provided no credible evidence that she can and will make properly informed decisions regarding the children's welfare and best interest. The Court has given the Respondent Mother in this case numerous opportunities and the Respondent Mother has failed to meet the requirements to get her children returned to her. The Court finds the termination of Respondent Mother's parental rights is in the best interest of the two children involved in this matter. . . .

Emphasis added. These determinations do not reflect the specific factual basis relied upon by the circuit court, nor does the record in this case supply justification for the determinations.

DHHR aptly summarized the circuit court's findings supporting termination as: (1) the mother participated but did not fully avail herself of the services provided during her improvement period; and (2) the mother failed to make the changes necessary to assure the safety of the children. It appears the only service to which the mother did not "fully avail herself" was taking DHHR up on its offer to help her find a place to live. Testimony established that the mother cooperated with the services which were provided to her, and was compliant and successful throughout the rehabilitation period. The professionals providing services to the mother indicated that she could successfully and safely parent her children. They also witnessed interactions between the children and the mother and found them to be positive and welcome interactions. Only the CPS worker expressed reservations with the mother's judgment and ability to parent or to tell the truth.

If evidence existed to support any of the suspicions the CPS worker voiced during his testimony, DHHR was sorely remiss in producing that evidence and making it part of the record. One of the most glaring examples of unsubstantiated evidence surrounds Jessica's sexualized behaviors. It appears that the circuit court gave improper emphasis to DHHR's unsubstantiated allegation that the mother taught the child how to masturbate. The only quote from the dispositional hearing transcript contained in the order of termination was that of the CPS worker responding to questions of the prosecutor representing DHHR, which reads in pertinent part as follows:

> THE WITNESS: In light of history, what has happened even since January, she consistently appears to gravitate towards people of character that she's been warned to stay away from. Her judgment, in my mind, is in question. I can – I question whether she can adequately protect these kids in the event that –
>
> I look at this child's behavior, and the most recent behaviors with – with –
>
> MR. HOUGH: This child being?
>
> THE WITNESS: Jessica. I'm sorry.
>
> MR. HOUGH: Okay.
>
> THE WITNESS: With – with the masturbation, and . . .

Further, there is the factual finding in the order stating:

> 22. The Infant Respondent, Jessica [], never recanted to the Court the assertion she made that her mother taught her about masturbation. No party ever called her as a witness.

The allegation that Jessica made statements about the mother teaching her self-gratifying behaviors was never corroborated by the testimony of the child or by the DHHR worker – Maureen Runyon – who purportedly conducted a forensic interview with the child and wrote a report. As noted earlier, the transcript of the disposition hearing reflects that Ms. Runyon was not present and also had not attended an earlier hearing. Moreover, the circuit court stated at the dispositional hearing: "[I]f you want Ms. Runyon's testimony in, you'll have to call Ms. Runyon as a witness." Even during oral argument before this Court, no one was able to identify how or when evidence of the child's alleged statements in this regard were actually made a part of the record. There is simply no documentary or testimonial evidence in the record which verifies this allegation. Furthermore, the CPS worker who did testify said he had no firsthand information regarding what Jessica had said about her "sexualized behaviors," and the worker further said that Jessica had not told him that she learned sexual behaviors from her mother. Thus any reference this CPS worker made during his testimony about Jessica's sexual behaviors was hearsay. As to the trial court's concern with the child not being called to recant the "assertion," recantation presupposes that a statement is made in the first place. Again, no assertion or statement of the child is in the record.

The CPS worker also failed to corroborate other allegations he made, and DHHR did not introduce supporting evidence to substantiate the CPS worker's allegations. For example, neither the former boyfriend nor anyone from the former boyfriend's family testified at the dispositional hearing to validate the CPS worker's expressed suspicion that the mother was intending to resume a relationship with the former male companion and thus expose the children once again to a violent male figure. The testimony of the mother's therapist refuted the CPS worker's unsubstantiated concern by representing that the mother had come to the realization that she did not need men in her life in order to succeed. The therapist also said that the mother expressed her desire to be reunited with the children as her top priority, far outweighing her need for male companionship. Also, no documentation was in the record that confirmed the CPS worker's contention that a "registered sex offender" lived in the neighborhood and would be a threat to the children, or that there was anyone else in the neighborhood who posed a direct threat to the children. Rather than complimenting or supporting the mother's efforts to become self-reliant for the sake of her children, the CPS worker criticized the mother when she showed initiative to make changes in her life by faulting her for locating a place to stay without depending on DHHR to do it for her. The CPS worker stated that there was no requirement that DHHR be involved in locating a suitable home. Furthermore, he said that he found the new home to be safe and adequate when he inspected it after the mother had moved.

Based upon our extensive review of the evidence contained in the record before us, we fail to see that neglect and parental unfitness have been established by clear, cogent and convincing evidence. Thus the order terminating the mother's parental rights to Jessica and Shawnta must be reversed on clear error grounds.

The evidence admitted at the dispositional hearing demonstrated that the mother visited and interacted well with her children, kept her therapy appointments, attended and was engaged in the parenting classes and appeared at all court hearings in order to be reunited with her children. Moreover, the continuing bond and affection between the mother and children was consistently observed during supervised visitations. Furthermore, the therapist who worked with the mother for a year and half testified that he believed the mother had gained a better understanding of her self-worth, and the importance of what she needed to do to be reunited with her children. As such, the evidence demonstrates that the conditions of abuse and neglect have been substantially corrected and the family should be reunited. This result is in keeping with this Court's long-standing recognition that,

> " ' " '[a] parent has the natural right to the custody of his or her infant child, and, unless the parent is an unfit person because of misconduct, neglect, immorality, abandonment, or other dereliction of duty, or has waived such right, or by agreement or otherwise has permanently transferred, relinquished or surrendered such custody, the right of the parent to the custody of his or her infant child will be recognized and enforced by the courts.' Syllabus, State ex rel. Kiger v. Hancock, 153 W.Va. 404, 168 S.E.2d [798] (1969)." Syl. pt. 2, Hammack v. Wise, 158 W.Va. 343, 211 S.E.2d 118 (1975).' Syl. Pt. 1, Nancy Viola R. v. Randolph W., 177 W.Va. 710, 356 S.E.2d 464 (1987)."

Syl. Pt. 2, In Interest of Carlita B., 185 W.Va. 613, 408 S.E.2d 365 (1991).

It became clear during oral argument that the mother was not granted visitation pending the appeal, so a period of adjustment is needed for the children to be removed from their foster home placement and reunited with their mother. Therefore, a gradual change in permanent custodians needs to occur. With the goal of providing the least disruptive transitional process for the children's return to their mother, upon remand the circuit court should enter all orders necessary to afford a smooth reunification of the family. The concrete reunification plan over which the circuit court retains oversight should include the provision by DHHR of all necessary and appropriate counseling services for the mother and the children. See In re George Glen B., Jr., 207 W. Va. 346, 532 S.E.2d 64 (2000) (recognizing the circuit court's continued responsibility in overseeing the implementation of reunification plans).

IV. Conclusion

For the foregoing reasons, the June 13, 2012, order of the Circuit Court of Gilmer County terminating the parental rights of Lucinda M. is reversed, and the case is remanded for entry of orders consistent with this opinion.

Reversed and remanded with direction.

Per Curiam:
This case See footnote 1 was originally presented to this Court on March 2, 1994,See footnote 2 at which time the appellants, Jessica M. See footnote 3 and Kenneth E., Jr. See footnote 4, infants under the age of eighteen years, sought reversal of the April 30, 1993, order entered in Marion County Circuit Court, which granted their mother, Maria E., a six-month improvement period and which denied the termination of her parental rights. By order dated March 15, 1994, we held in abeyance our decision whether to terminate Maria's parental rights and, instead, ordered the Department of Health and Human Resources ("DHHR") to conduct a current investigation and home study of the maternal grandparents, intervenors James and Carrie M., with whom the children have resided since January 11, 1993. The order further directed the DHHR to appear before this Court on May 3, 1994, to discuss the results of the investigation and home study.

On May 3, 1994, counsel for the parties and the DHHR appeared before this Court See footnote 5, at which time the DHHR presented the results of the current investigation and home study and its ultimate recommendation as to the disposition of this case. See footnote 6 Upon consideration of the petition, the briefs and arguments of counsel and the results and recommendations of the DHHR's current investigation and home study of James and Carrie M., we conclude that this case should be remanded.

I

Seven-week old Angela E. died, according to the autopsy report, of "blunt force craniocerebral traumatic injuries," the result of a "homicide." The autopsy report further indicated that the infant Angela had also sustained five broken ribs, which were at various stages of healing, a broken clavicle and many bruises. Though Angela's parents, Maria and Kenneth, Sr., offered several explanations for Angela's injuries, none of them comported with the medical evidence.

Maria initially stated that she had placed Angela in her bassinet and had rolled her over the heating ducts at home. Maria believed that the jarring of the bassinet could have caused the extensive head injury. Maria further indicated that she had walked Angela through the hallways, zigzagging while walking and could have hit Angela's head on the door frame or wall.

After Angela's death, however, her parents offered the following explanation: On June 18, 1992, several nights prior to Angela's death, Maria and Kenneth, Sr. were leaving the home of Kenneth, Sr.'s parents, when the baby carrier in which Angela was being carried, broke, jostling Angela around. Though Angela began to cry, Maria found nothing wrong with her. Angela cried and slept a good deal after this baby carrier incident, but her parents were not alarmed because she was a colicky baby who apparently cried a lot. In the early morning hours of June 21, 1992, Maria got up with Angela when she began to cry. Maria fed her and put her back to bed, not noticing any injuries to Angela at that time. Later, when Angela began to cry again, Kenneth, Sr. got up with her. Maria eventually got up to fix Angela another bottle. When she took Angela from Kenneth, Sr., Maria noticed dried blood in the baby's nose, though it is unclear whether Maria noticed the large knot on the left side of Angela's head. See footnote 7 Angela died on June 22, 1992.

James L. Frost, M.D., a forensic pathologist for the Medical Examiner's Office of the State of West Virginia, performed an autopsy on Angela and testified at the hearing to determine Maria's parental rights to Jessica and Kenneth, Jr., on July 6, 1993. According to Dr. Frost, Angela's autopsy revealed that she sustained recent head injuries, including "contusions of the brain in multiple locations, swelling of the brain and hemorrhage along the left optic nerve." See footnote 8 The autopsy further revealed a fracture of the right clavicle, or collar bone, and fractures of the posterior portion of the right seventh and eleventh ribs, as well as an enlargement of the posterior portion of the eight, ninth and tenth ribs. See footnote 9 Due to the callous formation in the fractures of the ribs and clavicle, Dr. Frost believed the fractures to be from ten days to three weeks old. See footnote 10 The injury to Angela's head, however, was recent, occurring one to two days before her death.

The explanations offered to account for Angela's injuries did not comport with the medical evidence. According to medical records, Angela's birth was unremarkable, with no complications. Thus, Dr. Frost had no reason to believe that Angela's injuries occurred during the birthing process. Furthermore, because Angela was only seven weeks old, she could not have inflicted the injuries to her clavicle, ribs and head herself. See footnote 11

As a result of the parents' explanation that Angela's injury may have been caused by the baby carrier incident, the baby carrier was retrieved from Wal-Mart for examination.See footnote 12 Dr. Frost indicated that the injury to Angela's head could not have occurred as described. With the handle of the baby carrier in the position in which it would be carried, it was shaken violently. Though the handle moved one notch, the handle did not slide. Thus, in Dr. Frost's opinion, Angela could not have slid out or otherwise have been harmed. Furthermore, Dr. Frost found no evidence of trauma along the side of the seat where Angela's head would have been. Finally, because the baby carrier is raised, like a wing chair, Angela's head would have been supported by the padded interior if the baby carrier were bumped while Angela was in it.See footnote 13

When Angela was admitted to the hospital, on June 21, 1992, and it became evident that a credible explanation for her injuries was not forthcoming, the DHHR intervened and was granted custody of Jessica and Kenneth, Jr. See footnote 14 Upon subsequent examination of Jessica and Kenneth, Jr.'s See footnote 15 medical records, it was revealed that Kenneth, Jr. had healed anterior rib fractures, though the date of injury could not be determined. Maria testified that she was unaware that Kenneth, Jr. had any broken ribs. Medical records further revealed that Kenneth, Jr. had suffered a broken leg at age five weeks. Maria's initial explanation to Kenneth, Jr.'s physician was that she believed the knot that had developed on Kenneth, Jr.'s leg was the result of an insect bite. Maria later explained that Kenneth, Jr. had a cyst on the bone, causing it to break. Hospital records include a notation from Dr. Koay, suggesting that Kenneth, Jr. was possibly a victim of child abuse.

Jessica, the only child old enough to be interviewed by the DHHR, recounted the abuse she and her brother and sister suffered at the hands of Kenneth, Sr. She told counselors and other interviewers that she believed Kenneth, Sr. had hit Angela in the head with a hammer. She also saw Kenneth, Sr. hitting the younger Kenneth's head against the bed. However, her mother's only response to this was to tell her husband to stop. Jessica further told her counselor that it was Kenneth, Sr. who had broken her brother's leg.

In addition to describing how Kenneth, Sr. abused her siblings, Jessica also described the abuse that he inflicted upon her. If she sucked her fingers, Kenneth, Sr. would pull them back until they hurt. She also related to DHHR workers how he had hit her with a spoon and would hold her nose and put his hand over her mouth so that she could not breathe. Though Maria would sometimes be present when her husband abused her children, according to Jessica, her mother's only reaction would be to tell him to stop.

In its April 30, 1993, order, the trial court refused to terminate the parental rights of Maria, instead, granting her a six-month improvement period. At the end of the improvement period, the trial judge ordered a review hearing during which the court would examine written reports from psychologists and counselors with the aim towards family reunification if appropriate. The DHHR was ordered to retain legal custody of the children, while the maternal grandparents, James and Carrie M., were ordered to retain physical custody. Maria was given liberal visitation with her children on the condition that the visitations be supervised by at least one of the maternal grandparents.

On October 13, 1993, an evidentiary hearing was held wherein expert and lay testimony of the parties' then current situation was offered. See footnote 16 Dr. Jennifer Cummings, a clinical psychologist who counseled both Jessica See footnote 17 and her grandmother, Carrie M. See footnote 18, testified that Jessica is adjusting well in her current living situation and that she has no concerns about Carrie M.'s custodial care of Jessica and Kenneth, Jr. Though Dr. Cummings originally indicated that Maria failed to protect her children by not intervening and stopping the abuse of her children by her husband, Kenneth, Sr., she later testified, at the October 13, 1993 hearing, that the suicide of Kenneth, Sr., on January 23, 1993, altered her view. She stated that when Kenneth, Sr. was alive and involved in parenting, the children were at risk. However, Dr. Cummings believes that the death of Kenneth, Sr. eliminated that risk. Finally, she opined that it would be in the best interests of Jessica and Kenneth, Jr. to be returned to their mother. See footnote 19

Similarly, Dr. Ronald Pearse, a psychologist who has treated Maria since October 1992,See footnote 20 testified at the October 13, 1993 hearing that Maria does not represent a danger to her children and that it would be in the children's best interest to be returned to their mother. Dr. Pearse further testified that, though Maria's husband has been strongly suspected of abusing her children and causing the death of Angela, See footnote 21 Maria has never identified her husband as the abuser nor directly acknowledged his abusive behavior. Nevertheless, Dr. Pearse opined that there is little risk that Maria would fail to protect her children in the future.

Also testifying at the October 13, 1993 hearing was Mrs. Joyce Evans, Jessica's kindergarten teacher at Monongah Elementary School. Mrs. Evans testified that Jessica was one of her best students and appears to be happy and well-adjusted.

II

As indicated in our order of March 15, 1994, the primary issues on appeal concern the trial court's refusal to terminate Maria's parental rights to Jessica and Kenneth, Jr., in light of her failure to protect her children from the abuse inflicted upon them and upon Angela, by her husband, Kenneth, Sr., and her refusal to identify the abuser. We ordered the DHHR to conduct a current investigation and home study of the children's current living arrangements, keeping in mind that the results and recommendations the DHHR makes should protect the best interests of the children. See John D.K. v. Polly A.S., 190 W. Va. 254, 438 S.E.2d 46 (1993).

In syllabus point 5 of In re Willis, 157 W. Va. 225, 207 S.E.2d 129 (1973), this Court stated: "Though constitutionally protected, the right of the natural parent to the custody of minor children is not absolute and it may be limited or terminated by the State, as parens patriae, if the parent is proved unfit to be entrusted with child care." The current investigation and home study of the children's maternal grandparents, James and Carrie M., revealed, according to the DHHR, a caring and loving environment. The DHHR workers found that James and Carrie M. have adequately provided for the children's physical, educational and spiritual needs, with no allegations of abuse or neglect. According to the DHHR, James and Carrie M. have complied with all aspects of the April 30, 1993, order. See footnote 22 It is the DHHR's concern, however, that both Maria and her parents have minimized or distorted Kenneth, Sr.'s abusive behavior towards the children, See footnote 23 thus, suppressing Jessica's recollection of what occurred. This "potential for emotional damage to the children" can only be thwarted, in the DHHR's view, by terminating the parental rights of Maria and by granting permanent custody of the children to the DHHR.

Jessica and Kenneth, Jr. are apparently thriving in their grandparents' care. Indeed, a powerful bond has been formed between them, as well as between the children and their mother, who has been active in their daily lives. While this Court is aware of the immeasurable harm which would undoubtedly occur to Jessica and Kenneth, Jr. See footnote 24 if they were to be abruptly removed from their grandparents' home, we are infinitely more concerned with the past abuse of these children, the death of their sister, Angela, Maria's failure to protect them from abuse and her refusal to identify the abuser.

In In Interest of Darla B., 175 W. Va. 137, 331 S.E.2d 868 (1985), this Court terminated a father's parental rights for his failure to protect his child. The father argued that he should be held blameless for his nonaction in protecting his child, even though he supported his wife's explanation for their 38-day old infant's life-threatening injuries. In Darla B., as in this case, the parents' testimony was inconsistent with all of the medical evidence as to the manner in which the infant's injuries occurred.

As we indicated earlier, it is further troubling to this Court that Maria has failed to acknowledge Kenneth, Sr.'s abusive behavior towards her children and to identify him as the abuser. In our recent decision of In re Jeffrey R. L., __ W. Va. __, 435 S.E.2d 162 (1993), we held in syllabus point 3 that "[p]arental rights may be terminated where there is clear and convincing evidence that the infant child has suffered extensive physical abuse while in the custody of his or her parents, and there is no reasonable likelihood that the conditions of abuse can be substantially corrected because the perpetrator of the abuse has not been identified and the parents, even in the face of knowledge of the abuse, have taken no action to identify the abuser." See footnote 25
Guardian ad litem Susan Riffle acknowledged, before this Court, that Jessica and Kenneth, Jr. have formed important attachments to their mother, Maria, and to their grandparents, James and Carrie M. It is, thus, her concern that these young children may be irreparably harmed if they were to be removed from their present environment. It is the recommendation of the DHHR, however, that it be granted permanent custody of Jessica and Kenneth, Jr., that physical custody of the children be returned to it, that the parental rights of Maria be terminated, that a hearing be set to determine the parental rights of Jessica's biological father, Frank Z., and that the permanent plan for the children be adoption.

The record of this case does not prescribe a simple solution. Considering the current living arrangements, which, for the most part, have been favorable to the children, vis-a-vis the past abuse of the children by Kenneth, Sr. and Maria's failure to acknowledge such abuse, and her potential to enter into another abusive relationship, we are unable to determine the placement that would best serve the interests of Jessica and Kenneth, Jr. We shall, therefore, require the DHHR to update its current investigation and home study of the maternal grandparents, James and Carrie M., within six months from the date of this opinion, for trial court review and decision. In the interim, legal custody of Jessica and Kenneth, Jr. shall remain with the DHHR. The maternal grandparents, James and Carrie M., shall retain physical custody of the children, with liberal visitation of the children given to their mother, Maria, with the stipulation that the visitations shall be supervised by one or both of the maternal grandparents.

Based upon the above, this case will be remanded to the Circuit Court of Marion County for further proceedings in accordance with W. Va. Code, 49-6-1, et seq. Upon receipt of the updated current investigation and home study, the circuit court shall promptly ascertain appropriate custody of Jessica and Kenneth, Jr., based upon current considerations.

Remanded.

parties. See In re Scottie D., 185 W. Va. 191, 406 S.E.2d 214 (1991); David M. v. Margaret M., 182 W. Va. 57, 385 S.E.2d 912 (1989).

Footnote: 5 Senior Assistant Attorney General L. Eugene Dickinson appeared on behalf of the DHHR.

Footnote: 6 Also submitted and considered by this Court were Maria E.'s Objection to Department of Health and Human Services' Home Study and Narrative Opinion Report and James and Carrie M.'s Objection to the Department of Health and Human Services Home Study and Investigative Report, which, among other things, questions the objectivity of the DHHR in this case and challenges the validity of the report in that neither Maria nor James nor Carrie M. were given the opportunity to cross-examine the DHHR workers who prepared the report. We emphasize that the DHHR's current investigation and home study were not dispositive of this Court's ruling. Rather, it was merely one of many factors considered by this Court.

Footnote: 7 While the hospital admissions records indicate that Maria told the nurses that she did not see the knot on Angela's head, Maria told police the next day that she did see the knot.

Footnote: 8 Dr. Frost further testified that a great deal of force would be necessary to cause the skull fractures sustained by Angela: "It would be not as much force as would be needed to do the same thing in an adult, because of an infant's skull being much thinner, but it's not a light tap or a light slap. It's a good, substantial blow."

Footnote: 9 Though the eighth, ninth and tenth ribs were not excised for histological study, Dr. Frost testified that they were also healing fractures.

Footnote: 10 Dr. Frost testified that the cause of the injuries to the clavicle and ribs was > a blunt force applied to that area of the body causing the rib fractures. It could be a blow or it could be -- of the ribs. It could be a blow to the body over those areas, the clavicle and the ribs, or those to the ribs could be to the body being held in the hand and the chest squeezed, or it could be pressure applied with the body on a hard surface, but I think I would favor the chest being held and squeezed.

Footnote: 11 Dr. Frost indicated that a child with injuries such as Angela's would cry a lot due to pain, tend to favor one side over the other and would try to protect the injured area. However, if the child was not taken to the doctor immediately, the pain would subside as healing of the injury progressed and it would be more difficult for the physician to find the injury. According to Maria, Angela saw a physician when she was three weeks and four weeks old.

Footnote: 12 Maria and Kenneth, Sr. returned the baby carrier to Wal- Mart, where it was purchased, believing it was defective.

Footnote: 13 Dr. Frost actually positioned Angela's body in the baby carrier during the autopsy.

Footnote: 14 W. Va. Code 49-6-3(c) [1992] provides, in relevant part:

If a child or children shall, in the presence of a child protective service worker of the division of human services, be in an emergency situation which constitutes an imminent danger to the physical well-being of the child or children, as that phrase is defined in . . . [§ 49-1-3], . . . and if such worker has probable cause to believe that the child or children will suffer additional child abuse or neglect or will be removed from the county before a petition can be filed and temporary custody can be ordered, the worker may, prior to the filing of a petition, take the child or children into his or her custody without a court order: Provided, That after taking custody of such child or children prior to the filing of a petition, the worker shall forthwith appear before a circuit judge or a juvenile referee of the county wherein custody was taken . . . and shall immediately apply for an order ratifying the emergency custody of the child pending the filing of a petition[.]

Footnote: 15 Jessica was born on October 27, 1987 and Kenneth, Jr. on June 16, 1991.

Footnote: 16 The trial judge deferred ruling on further placement of the children until this appeal is decided.

Footnote: 17 Jessica's counseling sessions with Dr. Cummings have ceased. According to Dr. Cummings, Jessica is no longer in need of therapy.

Footnote: 18 Dr. Cummings believed that Kenneth, Jr. was too young to benefit from psychotherapy. Carrie M. accompanied Jessica to her sessions with Dr. Cummings and participated in parent training, or parent education. According to Dr. Cummings, Carrie M. did everything asked of her.

Footnote: 19 Dr. Cummings testified that Maria's failure to adequately explain the cause of the injuries to her children "raises questions" and that she would have inquired into those issues had Maria been her patient. While Dr. Cummings' recommendation that Jessica and Kenneth, Jr. be returned to their mother was based on conversations with Maria's mother, Carrie M., Jessica, and one meeting with Maria herself, Dr. Cummings did not consult with Maria's therapist before making this recommendation.

Footnote: 20 Dr. Pearse first began treating Maria and her husband, Kenneth, Sr., both individually and jointly. Following Kenneth, Sr.'s death, Maria continued individual counseling sessions.

Footnote: 21 According to Marion County Sheriff Ron Watkins, initially, Maria and Kenneth, Sr. were suspects in the investigation of Angela's death. However, following the suicide of Kenneth, Sr., Maria was no longer a focus of any investigation into Angela's death.

Footnote: 22 As we noted earlier, Maria was granted liberal visitation of her children, on the condition that her visits be supervised by at least one of the maternal grandparents. The record indicates that Maria visits her children daily and has fully complied with the conditions of visitation.

Footnote: 23 For instance, in the DHHR's interview with Jessica, she stated that Kenneth, Sr. "didn't know how to play" when he would choke her and when he banged Kenneth, Jr.'s head against the baby bed.

Footnote: 24 The tender age of Kenneth, Jr., who is now two years and eleven months old, is of particular concern to this Court. As we noted in In re Carlita B., 185 W. Va. 613, 408 S.E.2d 365 (1991) (citing White, The First Three Years of Life at v. (1985)), the experiences of the first three years of a child's life form the foundation for all his later development. Id. at 375. It cannot be ignored that Kenneth, Jr. has been in his grandparents' care since he was one and one-half years old.

Footnote: 25 Notably, our decision in In re Jeffrey R.L. was rendered June 14, 1993, after the trial court's April 30, 1993 order, which granted Maria a six-month improvement period.

Attorney for Appellant

Miller, Justice:
This appeal is brought by the respondent below and appellant, Polly A.S., See footnote 1 from a final order entered by the Circuit Court of Grant County. By order entered July 10, 1992, the circuit court awarded custody of the appellant's twenty-one-month-old son, Jonathan C.K., to the child's natural father who was the petitioner below and appellee herein, John D.K. Polly A.S. asserts on appeal that the circuit court erred in reviewing this case because John D.K. did not file exceptions to the family law master's recommended order finding that she should retain custody of Jonathan. She also asserts that the circuit court erred in making material findings of fact that were not supported by the evidence and in finding that she was an unfit parent to have permanent custody of her infant son. See footnote 2

I.

The parties were never married. After Jonathan's birth on October 2, 1990, the mother applied for welfare benefits which resulted in a paternity suit being brought against the father for the payment of child support. John D.K. admitted paternity after blood tests did not exclude him from being Jonathan's biological father. He began paying child support and was awarded visitation in July of 1991. Until that time, it is undisputed that the mother was the primary caretaker. In fact, the father admits that he virtually had no contact with Jonathan until paternity was established.

On August 23, 1991, John D.K. filed a petition in circuit court alleging that it would be in the best interest of Jonathan for the circuit court to transfer custody from the mother to him. No reasons were given in the petition as to why John D.K. believed such a custody change would be to Jonathan's benefit. Instead, the main focus of the petition was in regard to the father's alternate request that the circuit court modify his visitation rights. He complained that visitations were difficult because the mother would harass him when he went to see Jonathan. To rectify the situation, John D.K. asked the court to allow him specific and exclusive visitation with Jonathan in the home of his parents. See footnote 3

The matter was heard before a family law master on November 14, 1991. At the hearing, Polly A.S. agreed that John D.K. could have visitation at the paternal grandparents' home from 1:00 p.m. to 5:00 p.m. on Sundays. As to the custody question, very little evidence was offered on the issue. John D.K. made a general statement that he desired custody. The father's lawyer See footnote 4 informed the family law master that John D.K. did not dispute that Polly A.S. was the primary caretaker, but, instead, he was alleging that she neglected Jonathan. The family law master asked the mother if she had taken care of Jonathan since his birth, i.e., provided him clothes, food, and medical care. She stated that she had and that Jonathan was in good health. The father was never asked, nor did he present any evidence, as to why he believed Jonathan was being neglected.

The family law master sent a recommended order to the circuit court and gave the parties until December 30, 1991, to file exceptions. The recommended order set forth, inter alia, the agreed upon visitation and denied the father's request for custody -- finding the mother was a fit and proper person to have the permanent care, custody, and control of the child.

On February 25, 1992, the circuit court entered an order setting the matter for a pretrial hearing on March 9, 1992. At the hearing, counsel for the mother stated that he was unaware of the reasons why the case was before the circuit court because he did not have any record of exceptions being filed to the family law master's recommended order. He objected to the circuit court setting the matter for hearing without any exceptions being taken.

The circuit court noted the objection, but, nevertheless, set the case for a hearing on April 24, 1992.See footnote 5

A hearing was held on April 24, 1992, in which the circuit court heard evidence that Polly A.S. was neglecting Jonathan. John D.K., his wife, his parents, and a friend all testified about Jonathan's health and living conditions. The more serious allegations of neglect included evidence that Polly A.S. and Jonathan lived in a trailer that did not have electricity for several weeks during March and April of 1992. During this time, the trailer lacked hot water, refrigeration, a usable oven, and, except for one kerosene heater and a wood stove that was described as being improperly installed and a "fire hazard", the trailer lacked adequate heat. The circuit court also heard evidence that the child always was extremely unclean and smelled, always had a cold, and had a very severe diaper rash. In addition, John D.K. testified that one day he witnessed Jonathan sitting on the floor of the trailer playing beside dog manure, and that he saw Polly A.S. and Jonathan outside one night in the rain.

The evidence presented by John D.K. was controverted by Polly A.S. and her mother. They both testified that Jonathan was kept clean. Polly A.S. admitted that she did not have electricity for a period of time, but she said that it was because the electric company had to install a new pole before service became available. Polly A.S. stated that even when she did not have electricity, she would bathe Jonathan at a neighbor's trailer or carry hot water to her own trailer. She admitted that Jonathan was outside in the rain, but added that it was during the time she did not have refrigeration and she needed to go to the store to get milk. She also admitted that John D.K. saw Jonathan on the floor with the dogs, but stated that it only occurred once, and that she no longer owned the dogs.

Polly A.S. testified that she regularly took Jonathan to the doctor for checkups and vaccinations. She said that a health care worker told her that Jonathan's colds were from allergies and his rash was from an allergy to disposable diapers and diaper rash cream. Polly A.S. stated that she now uses different diapers and a different diaper rash cream to correct the problem. It was generally agreed that Jonathan was well behaved and seemed happy.

By order entered July 10, 1992, the circuit court awarded custody of Jonathan to John D.K. and awarded Polly A.S. supervised visitation. The circuit court found that Polly A.S. had abused and neglected Jonathan and that there was clear and convincing evidence that she was not a fit and proper person to retain custody of Jonathan. The circuit court continued by indicating that it was familiar with the deplorable living conditions of Polly A.S. and that it was not within her ability to improve those conditions. The judge further stated that he personally had observed the child as being unkempt and dirty, and had seen the child with a broken arm while in the custody of Polly A.S.

On July 21, 1992, Polly A.S. filed a motion for reconsideration with the circuit court. The circuit court denied the motion by order dated July 27, 1992. The circuit court granted Polly A.S. an extension on November 30, 1992, until March 27, 1993, to file her petition for appeal with this Court because the transcript of the prior proceedings was not prepared. The petition was filed in March, and, on June 9, 1993, this Court accepted the petition and issued a stay of the July 10, 1992, order of the circuit court.

Subsequently, John D.K. filed a motion to lift the stay, but this motion was denied by this Court on June 23, 1993. On June 30, 1993, John D.K. filed another motion, this time requesting this Court to remand the case to the circuit court for further evidentiary hearings. Polly A.S. filed a response requesting that the motion be denied. By order dated July 8, 1993, this Court denied the motion.

II.

yPolly A.S. argues that John D.K. waived his right to have the circuit court review the family law master's recommended order because no exceptions were filed as required under W. Va. Code, 48A-4-7 (1990), which states, in part: "Failure to timely file the petition shall constitute a waiver of exceptions[.]" (Emphasis added). Although it is true that under the foregoing Code section John D.K. waived his right to file exceptions in this case, we do not believe that the circuit court erred in reviewing the recommended order and in holding a hearing on the neglect allegations.

In State ex rel. Dillon v. Egnor, 188 W. Va. 221, ___, 423 S.E.2d 624, 628-29 (1992), we recognized the limited role of the family law master's recommended order:

> "The family law master's recomm ended or der does not ha ve the force and effect of law until it is approved by the circuit court. Indeed, except with re gard t o tem porary pr ocedural or ders and pendente lite custody and s upport orders, the family law master has no power to enter an enforceable order affecting the rights and obligations of the part ies. Under W. Va. C ode, 48A-4-5 (1990), t hat power is reserved to the circu it court." (Foot note and citation omitted).See footnote 6

The language of W. Va. Code, 48A-4-10(c) (1990), that provides for the review of the family law master's recommended order is not limited to only those recommended orders to which exceptions have been filed. See footnote 7 Moreover, we are not cited nor have we found any situation that limits a circuit court's right to review a recommended order of a family law master. Such a provision would be inconsistent with W. Va. Code, 48A-4-5, which makes a family law master's order unenforceable until approved by a circuit court. We conclude that in the absence of any statutory limitation to the contrary, a circuit court may review a recommended order of a family law master even though no exceptions were filed.

Under W. Va. Code, 48A-4-10(d) (1990), when a circuit court reviews a recommended order of a family law master and discovers that certain evidence that may have affected the outcome of the case was either not considered or was inadequately developed, the court may recommit the matter with instructions to the family law master or proceed to take additional evidence on its own. See footnote 8 In this case, the circuit court was authorized to hold a hearing because the family law master did not consider the evidence of neglect.

After the circuit court makes its review, we recognized in Higginbotham v. Higginbotham ___ W. Va. ___, ___, 432 S.E.2d 789, 791-92 (1993), "that under

W. Va. Code, 48A-4-10(c) (1990), a circuit court 'may, in its discretion, enter an order upon different terms, as the ends of justice may require.'" In Syllabus Point 1 of Higginbotham, we stated:

> "W. Va. Code, 48A-4-10(c) (1990), lim its a circuit judge's ability to overturn a fam ily law m aster's findings and c onclusions unless they fall within one of the six enumerat ed statutory criteria containe d in this section. Moreover , Rule 52(a) of the We st Virginia Rules of Civil Procedure requires a circuit court which changes a family law master's recom mendation t o m ake known it s factual findi ngs a nd conclusions of law." See footnote 9

Therefore, in the present case, the circuit court had full authority to review the record, to review the order, to take necessary additional evidence, and to enter an order on different terms so long as the circuit court made the appropriate findings of fact and conclusions of law.

The problem with the circuit court's decision in this case stems from the factual findings that it made in determining that the mother was not a fit and proper person to have the permanent care, custody and control of Jonathan. The circuit court incorporated information into the findings of fact that was not offered into evidence at any hearing. For instance, the circuit court, in speaking of the parents of Polly A.S., said:

> "That the Court knows th e m other, Mildre d [W] . 'Step-and-a-half', and father, Harol d [W]. ' Cannonball', of the Responde nt, P olly [A.S.]; the Responde nt's lack of m ental, physical, and em otional capacity to provide for her children is not entirely her fault -- it is inherited; it will not improve, but will get worse."

The record contains no professional psychological or medical evidence to support this statement.

The circuit court also went beyond the scope of the record in stating in the findings of fact that Jonathan suffered a broken arm while in the custody of his mother. Besides its mention in the final order, there is no evidence of when or how Jonathan suffered this serious injury. In fact, given the allegations that were made, it is very disturbing to this Court that no professional testimony exists as to Jonathan's condition nor as to the mother's or father's ability to care for him.

It is apparent that the circuit court relied on its personal, out-of-court knowledge of the respondent and her family in making these statements. We consistently have held that a custody decision by a circuit court will not be set aside unless the court abuses its discretion or makes a clearly erroneous application of the law as outlined in Syllabus Point 4 of Judith R. v. Hey, 185 W. Va. 117, 405 S.E.2d 447 (1990):

> "'The exercise of discretion by a tr ial court in awardi ng custody of a minor child will not be disturbed on appeal unless that discretion has been abused; however, where the tr ial court's ruling does not reflect a discretionary decision but is ba sed upon an erro neous application of the law and is clearly wrong, the ruling will be reversed on appeal.' Syl. Pt. 2, Funkhouser v. Funkhouser, 158 W. Va. 964, 216 S.E.2d 570 (1975)."

The case at bar bears some analogy to Rowsey v. Rowsey, 174 W. Va. 692, 329 S.E.2d 57 (1985), where we set aside a change of custody which had been awarded by the trial court based on unproven assertions that the ex-wife was living with a lesbian. We stated in Syllabus Point 3 of Rowsey:

> "'A change of custody shoul d not be based only upon speculati on that such change will be benefici al to the children.' Syl. pt. 6, Holstein v. Holstein, 152 W. Va. 119, 160 S.E.2d 177 (1968)."

In the present case, we conclude that the circuit court abused its discretion not only by considering facts not in evidence, but also by displaying a preexisting, negative attitude towards the mother. Moreover, given the circumstances, we are dismayed that no one presented any evidence from any neutral, third-party witnesses as to Jonathan's condition. See footnote 10

We find the evidence that was presented to be highly contested by the parties and unclear. Therefore, we reverse and remand the entire custody issue for a fuller inquiry. In addition, we direct that the matter be reassigned by an appropriate administrative order to another judge to prevent a recurrence of the problems that exist in this case. See Judith R. v. Hey, 185 W. Va. at 124, 405 S.E.2d at 454 (upon remand, assigning case to another judge because the first judge abandoned his neutral role in a child custody decision); State v. Buck, 173 W.Va. 243, 248, 314 S.E.2d 406, 411 (1984) (ordering the designation of another circuit judge for resentencing of a criminal defendant).

Upon remand, Jonathan's best interests must be served by determining whether his mother, who is acknowledged to have been the primary caretaker, is a fit person to have custody of him under the principles contained in Syllabus Point 5, in part, of David M. v. Margaret M., 182 W.Va. 57, 385 S.E.2d 912 (1989):

> "To be considered fit , the prim ary caretaker parent must: (1) feed and clothe the child appropriately; (2) adequately supervise the child and protect him or her from harm; (3) provide habitable housing; (4) avoid extreme discipline, child a buse, and other sim ilar vices; and (5) refrain from immoral behavior under cir cumstances that w ould affect the child."

Allegations of abuse are always troubling and must be examined thoroughly, although certainly lack of child support from the father the first nine months of the child's life cannot be ignored when considering such issues as lack of adequate living conditions.

III.

In domestic cases involving allegations of abuse and neglect, a circuit court or family law master may now order that a home study be performed to investigate the allegations under Rule 34(b) of the Rules of Practice and Procedure for Family Law. See footnote 11 Furthermore, under W. Va. Code, 49-6A-2 (1992),See footnote 12 it is mandatory for any circuit judge, family law master, or magistrate having reasonable cause to suspect abuse or neglect to immediately report the same to the Division of Human Services See footnote 13 of the Department of Health and Human Resources.

The circuit judge appointed to hear this case should order the Division of Human Services to perform a home study. Hopefully, a thorough home study will either disclaim or substantiate the allegations of neglect so that a proper determination of custody can be made. In custody cases where the evidence of abuse or neglect is not clear and is highly controverted, and the parties do not offer any neutral, third-party professional opinions to refute or substantiate the allegations, the circuit court should order a home study to ensure that any conclusions it makes will protect the best interests of the child.

We further order both the circuit court and the Division of Human Services to expedite this matter so that Jonathan is provided with a permanent and secure home. See In Interest of Carlita B., 185 W. Va. 613, 408 S.E.2d 365 (1991). In the meantime, we conclude that Polly A.S. should retain custody of Jonathan unless the circuit court finds that Jonathan is at a present or future risk of neglect and abuse.

For the foregoing reasons, the judgment of the Circuit Court of Grant County is reversed, in part See footnote 14, and the case is remanded for further proceedings consistent with this opinion.

Affirmed in part, reversed, in part, and remanded.

Footnote: 1We follow our traditional practice in domestic relations and other cases which involve sensitive facts and do not use the last names of the parties so as not to stigmatize them or their child. See, e.g., State ex rel. Div. of Human Serv. by Mary C.M. v. Benjamin P.B., 183 W. Va. 220, 395 S.E.2d 220 (1990); Nancy Viola R. v. Randolph W., 177 W. Va. 710, 356 S.E.2d 464 (1987).

Footnote: 2Polly A.S. also has a seven-year-old son who resides with her.

Footnote: 3At the time the petition was filed John D.K. was living with his parents. He is now married and lives in a trailer with his wife and her young son.

Footnote: 4John D.K. has a different lawyer on appeal.

Footnote: 5The record is confusing as to whether exceptions were actually filed. At the pretrial hearing, it was suggested that exceptions were attached improperly to the recommended order, so it was withdrawn and a new recommended order without exceptions was filed. In its order entered on July 10, 1992, the circuit court stated that John D.K. appeared in person, without counsel, and expressed his desire to appeal the recommended order. However, in his brief to this Court, John D.K. asserts that his father spoke with the circuit court judge and told the judge of John D.K.'s intent to appeal. As will later be discussed, the controversy surrounding the exceptions is irrelevant under the specific facts of this case.

Footnote: 6W. Va. Code, 48A-4-5 (1990), provides:

"With the exception of pendente lite support and custody orders entered by a master in accordance with the provisions of section three [§ 48A-4-3] of this article, and procedural orders entered pursuant to the provisions of section two [§ 48A-4-2] of this article, an order imposing sanctions or granting or denying relief may not be made and entered except by a circuit court within the jurisdiction of said court and as authorized by law."

The current counterpart to this Code section is contained in W. Va. Code, 48A-4-15 (1993).

Footnote: 7For the complete text of W. Va. Code, 48A-4-10(c), see note 9, infra.

Footnote: 8W. Va. Code, 48A-4-10(d), specifically provides:

"In making its determination under this section, the circuit court shall review the whole record or those parts of it cited by a party. If the circuit court finds that a master's recommended order is deficient as to matters which might be affected by evidence not considered or inadequately developed in the master's recommended order, the court may recommit the recommended order to the master, with instructions indicating the court's opinion, or the circuit court may proceed to take such evidence without recommitting the matter." (Emphasis added).

This Code section now appears at W. Va. Code, 48A-4-20(d) (1993).

Footnote: 9W. Va. Code, 48A-4-10(c), in its entirety, reads:

"The circuit court shall examine the recommended order of the master, along with the findings and conclusions of the master, and may enter the recommended order, may recommit the case, with instructions, for further hearing before the master or may, in its discretion, enter an order upon different terms, as the ends of justice may require. The circuit court shall not follow the recommendation, findings, and conclusions of a master found to be:

"(1) Arbitrary, capricious, an abuse of discretion, or otherwise not in conformance with the law;

"(2) Contrary to constitutional right, power, privilege, or immunity;

"(3) In excess of statutory jurisdiction, authority, or limitations, or short of statutory right;

"(4) Without observance of procedure required by law;

"(5) Unsupported by substantial evidence; or

"(6) Unwarranted by the facts."

This section now is located at W. Va. Code, 48A-4-20(c) (1993).

Footnote: 10Only one witness who was not related to the involved parties testified. She testified for the father and was characterized in his brief as a "friend of both parties[.]" However, the record reveals that this witness was not neutral and was to babysit for the father if he was awarded custody.

Footnote: 11The Rules of Practice and Procedure for Family Law were adopted by this Court on July 21, 1993, and became effective on October 1, 1993. Rule 34(b) specifically provides:

"Allegations of Abuse and Neglect. When there are allegations that either one or both of the parties have abused or neglected the other party or any child of the parties, the family law master or circuit judge may, sua sponte or on motion of either party, order an investigation or home study of one or both of the parties. The family law master or circuit judge may apportion the costs of the home study or home studies, or order the department of health and human resources or other social service agency to perform the investigation. When a family law master or circuit judge finds that a child has been neglected or abused, the family law master or circuit judge shall report the abuse in accordance with the provisions of chapter 49, article 6A, section 2 of the Code of West Virginia."

Footnote: 12W. Va. Code, 49-6A-2, was amended in 1992 to include the members of the clergy, circuit judges, family law masters, and magistrates. The relevant section of W. Va. Code, 49-6A-2, provides:

"When any medical, dental or mental health professional, Christian Science practitioner, religious healer, school teacher or other school personnel, social service worker, child care or foster care worker, emergency medical services personnel, peace officer or law-enforcement official, member of the clergy, circuit court judge, family law master or magistrate has reasonable cause to suspect that a child is neglected or abused or observes the child being subjected to conditions that are likely to result in abuse or neglect, such person shall immediately, and not more than forty- eight hours after suspecting this abuse, report the circumstances or cause a report to be made to the state department [division] of human services: Provided, That in any case where the reporter believes that the child has been seriously physically injured or sexually abused or sexually assaulted, the reporter shall also immediately report, or cause a report to be made to the department of public safety, and any law-enforcement agency having jurisdiction to investigate the complaint[.]"

Footnote: 13Although W. Va. Code, 49-6A-2, refers to "the state department [division] of human services," the Executive Reorganization Act of 1989 redesignated this body as the Division of Human Services under the newly created Department of Health and Human Resources. See W. Va. Code, 5F-1-1 (1992); W. Va. Code, 5F-2-1(d) (1992); W. Va. Code, 9-2-1a.

Footnote: 14Prior to the final order, the parties agreed that Jonathan's last name would be changed from S. to K. As part of its final order, the circuit court entered this change. We find no reason, nor does either side present any argument, that would be grounds for reversing this part of the order.

Supreme Court Of Appeals Of West Virginia
IN RE: JONATHAN G.
No. 23465
Submitted: November 19, 1996
Filed: December 18, 1996

SYLLABUS BY THE COURT

1. The foster parents' involvement in abuse and neglect proceedings should be separate and distinct from the fact-finding portion of the termination proceeding and should be structured for the purpose of providing the circuit court with all pertinent information regarding the child. The level and type of participation in such cases is left to the sound discretion of the circuit court with due consideration of the length of time the child has been cared for by the foster parents and the relationship that has developed. To the extent that this holding is inconsistent with Bowens v. Maynard, 174 W. Va. 184, 324 S.E.2d 145 (1984), that decision is hereby modified.

2. "Parental rights may be terminated where there is clear and convincing evidence that the infant child has suffered extensive physical abuse while in the custody of his or her parents, and there is no reasonable likelihood that the conditions of abuse can be substantially corrected because the perpetrator of the abuse has not been identified and the parents, even in the face of knowledge of the abuse, have taken no action to identify the abuser." Syl. Pt. 3, In re Jeffrey R.L., 190 W. Va. 24, 435 S.E.2d 162 (1993).

3. "Child abuse and neglect cases must be recognized as being among the highest priority for the courts' attention. Unjustified procedural delays wreak havoc on a child's development, stability and security." Syl. Pt. 1, in part, In re Carlita B., 185 W. Va. 613, 408 S.E.2d 365 (1991).

4. "'Under W. Va. Code, 49-6-2(b) (1984), when an improvement period is authorized, then the court by order shall require the Department of Human Services to prepare a family case plan pursuant to W. Va. Code, 49-6D-3 (1984).' Syl. Pt. 3, State ex rel. West Virginia Dept. of Human Serv. v. Cheryl M., 177 W. Va. 688, 356 S.E.2d 181 (1987)." Syl. Pt. 3, In re Carlita B., 185 W. Va. 613, 408 S.E.2d 365 (1991).

5. " In formulating the improvement period and family case plans, courts and social service workers should cooperate to provide a workable approach for the resolution of family problems which have prevented the child or children from receiving appropriate care from their parents. The formulation of the improvement period and family case plans should therefore be a consolidated, multi-disciplinary effort among the court system, the parents, attorneys, social service agencies, and any other helping personnel involved in assisting the family." Syl. Pt. 4, In re Carlita B., 185 W. Va. 613, 408 S.E.2d 365 (1991).

6. "The clear import of the statute [West Virginia Code § 49-6-2(d)] is that matters involving the abuse and neglect of children shall take precedence over almost every other matter with which a court deals on a daily basis, and it clearly reflects the goal that such proceedings must be resolved as expeditiously as possible." Syl. Pt. 5, In re Carlita B., 185 W. Va. 613, 408 S.E.2d 365 (1991).

7. "At the conclusion of the improvement period, the court shall review the performance of the parents in attempting to attain the goals of the improvement period and shall, in the court's discretion, determine whether the conditions of the improvement period have been satisfied and whether sufficient improvement has been made in the context of all the circumstances of the case to justify the return of the child." Syl. Pt. 6, In re Carlita B., 185 W. Va. 613, 408 S.E.2d 365 (1991).

8. "It is a traumatic experience for children to undergo sudden and dramatic changes in their permanent custodians. Lower courts in cases such as these should provide, whenever possible, for a gradual transition period, especially where young children are involved. Further, such gradual transition periods should be developed in a manner intended to foster the emotional adjustment of the children to this change and to maintain as much stability as possible in their lives." Syl. Pt. 3, James M. v. Maynard, 185 W. Va. 648, 408 S.E.2d 400 (1991).

9. "In cases where there is a termination of parental rights, the circuit court should consider whether continued association with siblings in other placements is in the child's best interests, and if such continued association is in such child's best interests, the court should enter an appropriate order to preserve the rights of siblings to continued contact." Syl. Pt. 4, James M. v. Maynard, 185 W. Va. 648, 408 S.E.2d 400 (1991).

10. "When parental rights are terminated due to neglect or abuse, the circuit court may nevertheless in appropriate cases consider whether continued visitation or other contact with the abusing parent is in the best interest of the child. Among other things, the circuit court should consider whether a close emotional bond has been established between parent and child and the child's wishes, is he or she is of appropriate maturity to make such request. The evidence must indicate that such visitation or continued contact would not be detrimental to the child's well being and would be in the child's best interest." Syl. Pt. 5, In re Christina L., 194 W. Va. 446, 460 S.E.2d 692 (1995).

11. A child has a right to continued association with individuals with whom he has formed a close emotional bond, including foster parents, provided that a determination is made that such continued contact is in the best interests of the child.

Appellants Kenneth and Patricia Stem, as prior long-term foster parents of the infant Jonathan G., See footnote 1 appeal from the October 23, 1995, decision See footnote 2 of the Circuit Court of Berkeley County denying them permanent visitation rights with Jonathan G. The Stems assert additional error with regard to the circuit court's failure to permit them to participate meaningfully in the termination proceedings that occurred on June 21 and 22, 1994; the circuit court's decision to return Jonathan G. to his biological parents; and the circuit court's decision to remove the West Virginia Department of Health and Human Resources ("DHHR") from this case. DHHR cross-assigns as error the circuit court's decision to return Jonathan G. to his parents, the prosecuting attorney's improper representation of DHHR, and the circuit court's removal of DHHR from the case. Upon a thorough review of this matter, we See footnote 3 affirm the circuit court's order restoring permanent custody to the natural parents, but remand this case for further proceedings to determine whether it would be in Jonathan G.'s best interest to have continued contact with the Stems.

I. Factual and Procedural Background

Jonathan G. was born to Johnny G. and Lisa K. on April 23, 1990. While his parents are hearing impaired, See footnote 4 Jonathan G. has no hearing problems. In June of 1990, Jonathan G. suffered a spiral break of his left femur, which was subsequently determined by the treating physicians to be accidental in nature. Then on December 8, 1990, Jonathan G.'s mother took him to the emergency room for what was later diagnosed as "shaken baby syndrome." The shaking incident actually occurred a day earlier. As a result of the shaking, Jonathan suffered intercranial hemorrhaging. The severity of his injuries required immediate transfer to Johns Hopkins in Baltimore, Maryland, for treatment.

On December 19, 1990, DHHR filed an abuse and neglect petition pursuant to West Virginia Code § 49-6-1 (1996), seeking temporary custody of Jonathan G. See footnote 5 A hearing was held on the abuse and neglect petition on December 28, 1990, and the circuit court found that DHHR had demonstrated probable cause concerning the abuse of Jonathan G. The circuit court granted DHHR custody of Jonathan G. for sixty days, ordered supervised visitation for Jonathan G.'s parents, and further directed that the natural parents were to submit to psychological examinations. Through this same order, See footnote 6 the court ordered DHHR to develop a family case plan in accordance with the provisions of West Virginia Code § 49-6D-3 (1996) and to make all reasonable efforts in assisting Jonathan G. to remain in his home. The Stems, as foster parents, were awarded physical custody of Jonathan G. on December 29, 1990, when he was ten months old. Jonathan G. continued in their care and custody until September 2, 1994, when he was over four years old.

An adjudicatory hearing was held on February 19, 1991. During this hearing, the circuit court received the psychological report of Hal Slaughter. The order reflecting the findings of this proceeding states that:

> Upon motion by the State, the Counsel for the natural parents and infant child, as well as the State, agreed to stipulate that the report of Hal Slaughter was acceptable and should be entered in the record.
> The Court then notified the parties that the mother within the report had admitted that she was in fact the party who had abused the child. The mother acknowledged in the affirmative. The Court accordingly accepts the stipulation of the parties to Mr. Slaughter's report.

As a result of the adjudicatory proceeding, the circuit court concluded that Jonathan G. was an abused and neglected child; continued the custody of the infant child with DHHR; ordered DHHR to develop a family case plan; ordered supervised visitation for the natural parents; and directed that the natural parents participate in counseling programs as directed by DHHR. The order further provided that the natural parents were to be permitted to use the services of an interpreter to assist them in cooperating with the circuit court's directives.

A dispositional hearing was held on May 13, 1991, resulting in the circuit court's continuation of custody with DHHR. The circuit court again directed that the natural parents were to participate in counseling programs after finding "no improvement from the prior hearing." The circuit court further directed the child's parents to cooperate with DHHR "and with the Family Case Plan filed in this matter."

On June 11, 1992, DHHR filed a motion for termination of parental rights, asserting that the biological parents deny any abuse of Jonathan G. and that counseling has resulted in "very little progress." The petition further provides that DHHR has permitted the natural parents to have weekly visitation during the entire seventeen-month period that Jonathan G. has been in the custody of foster parents.

On July 16, 1992, the circuit court ordered Dr. Townsend, a psychologist, to perform an independent evaluation of Jonathan G. and his natural parents. On July 28, 1992, the circuit court granted the State's motion to continue the termination proceedings based on the "recent development" concerning the availability of "services that might have been provided to hearing impaired parents of hearing children which were not provided due to two opposing expert philosophies." See footnote 7

Dr. Townsend sent the circuit court a letter dated October 9, 1992, indicating that Lisa K. "has shown progress" and referencing the viability of the improvement plan previously discussed with the court. Another letter, dated October 16, 1992, from Randy Henderson, a licensed professional counselor, sets forth that both natural parents "have shown progress in our therapy sessions." During a hearing before the circuit court on November 30, 1992, the natural parents moved for increased visitation with Jonathan G. While the circuit court denied an increase in the frequency of the visitation, it ordered that "the length of each visit should be gradually increased" and further provided for "[a]t least one unsupervised visit . . . around Christmas." The circuit court ordered expanded visitation for the natural parents at a hearing on January 15, 1993. The order from this proceeding indicates that following "a two hour session between the parents, child and third party [,visitation] then shall be expanded to a two hour session twice weekly then shall be expanded to five hour sessions" and further states the court's intention "that unsupervised visitation of very short periods of time may be arranged in the future."

By January 4, 1993, Jonathan G. had been in the Stems' custody and care for more than two years, and they filed a petition seeking leave to make an appearance in these proceedings. See footnote 8 As support for their intervention, the Stems averred that DHHR "has been largely unsuccessful" in its efforts to "prevent the termination of the parental rights" and in its "effort[s] to reunify the family." The Stems stated that their intention was "to appear in a hybrid relationship of physical custodian of the child and as the child's representative in loco parenti." As statutory authority for their involvement, the Stems cited West Virginia Code §§ 49-6-5 and -8 (1996).See footnote 9 After requesting briefs from the parties on the issue of the Stems' involvement in these proceedings, See footnote 10 the circuit court heard arguments concerning this issue on February 4, 1993. Finding that "there is no clear statutory provision for automatic standing of a foster family[,]" the circuit court initially denied the Stems' petition for intervention. However, by order entered July 8, 1993, the circuit court "granted [the Stems] standing in this matter, in order to present another perspective on the best interests of the minor." See footnote 11 The order granting standing expressly admonishes the Stems "that their involvement in these proceedings should not create the false impression that they have parental rights equivalent to Johnny G. or Lisa K., nor coequivalent rights of any sort with regard to Jonathan G."

On May 6th and 7th, 1993, the circuit court held a hearing on a petition filed by the natural parents, seeking a finding of contempt against DHHR. See footnote 12 The circuit court found that DHHR was "in contempt of the prior Orders of this Court regarding preparation of a case plan for the purpose of reunification[.]" The circuit court declared that DHHR "is unable to continue to manage this case objectively with a view towards possible reunification of the family herein, and accordingly must be removed as the primary case manager but should remain as a party throughout these proceedings." Responsibility for the "development and implementation of a case plan consistent with the expressed goals of reunification previously contained in the prior Orders of the Court[]" was delegated to an independent agency. The private agency utilized in the stead of DHHR was Action Youth Care, Inc. ("Action Youth"). The order reflecting the contempt proceedings makes it clear that while DHHR was "removed from its role as case manager," the circuit court directed that DHHR "shall remain a party to these proceedings and will be represented by counsel of its choice." See footnote 13

On June 7, 1993, the circuit court ordered that this matter be continued for six months See footnote 14 "at which time the Court shall review the efforts of . . . Action Youth Care, Inc. to determine whether or not the parents and the child can be successfully reunited or the parental rights [should be] terminated." In November 1993, the circuit court enlisted the services of Dr. Paul Kradel, as friend of the court, to perform a psychological study and family assessment of the parties. In the report dated February 3, 1994, that Dr. Kradel submitted to the circuit court, he states that Lisa K. "provided me with no definitive answer about who might have done the shaking." See footnote 15 He concluded that "it is my estimation that it will take a minimum of another three (3) years of intensive social and therapeutic services to bring the biological family to a point of skill where they can function as an independent family unit."

In the monthly progress report submitted to the circuit court by Action Youth dated March 7, 1994, the natural parents were noted to have completed their in-home preservation/reunification program as of January 17, 1994. The report further states:

> Action Youth Care is of the opinion that this family is very aware of its obligation to this child and are capable of parenting this child in a safe, consistent, self-respecting, and definitely loving atmosphere. We do not suspect this child to be in any sort of physical or mental danger while in the biological home nor have we witnessed anything that would indicate otherwise.

We feel that permanency for this child is the utmost importance at this time.

On April 19, 1994, the State See footnote 16 filed a petition to terminate the parental rights of the natural parents. As grounds for its petition, the State cited the mother's denial of her earlier admission of the abuse and the lengthy period of time Dr. Kradel estimated it would take before the family could function independently. A two-day hearing was held on the State's termination motion on June 21 and 22, 1994. Before concluding the presentation of its evidence, however, the State withdrew its petition when it realized it was unable to meet its burden of proof. See footnote 17 The circuit court's order reflects that "[t]he State further requested that reunification efforts continue and that within a six month time frame the infant child shall be returned to the physical custody of the biological parents" and "the plan outlined by Dr. Paul Kradle [sic] should be implemented." The order finds, inter alia, that:

1. The facts and evidence in this case are insufficient to support termination.

2. Once appropriate services were provided the family improved.

3. The safety of the child is not an issue.

4. The foster family has been a valuable resource in this case and have provided excellent care for this child.

5. The Court agrees that closure is needed.

6. The Court agrees that in six months that the child should be physically reunited with the biological parents.

On August 1, 1994, the Stems presented arguments on their Rule 60(b) motion for relief See footnote 18 from the circuit court's order entered in connection with the termination proceedings. Relying on the Bowens case, the Stems argued that they were denied meaningful participation at the termination proceeding. The Stems' motion was opposed by the guardian ad litem, the State, and the natural parents. After hearing arguments regarding the Stems' lack of participation at the termination proceedings, See footnote 19 the circuit court ordered the parties to submit briefs on this issue. After reconsidering this issue at a hearing on August 24, 1994, the circuit court denied the Stems' motion for relief, finding that:

> the case of Bowen[s] v. Maynard, 324 S.E.2d 145 (W.Va. 1984) is distinguishable from this case primarily due to the fact that custody was given to the Petitioner in Bowen[s] by the natural parents and in this case the Intervenors' [Stems'] custody was given to them by the Department of Health and Human Resources who in fact have custody and were allowed to fully participate in the hearing on June 21 and 22, 1994 . . . .

At the conclusion of this same proceeding, the circuit court ordered that Jonathan G. was to be returned to his natural parents' household on September 2, 1994, and provided for the foster parents to have visitation on alternating weekends and on alternating holidays, beginning on September 9, 1994.

Although the termination proceedings had reached their conclusion on June 22, 1994, at which time the petition seeking termination was dismissed pursuant to joint motion of the State and DHHR, the circuit court continued jurisdiction in this matter "because of the special needs that are present in this case." The circuit court reviewed the status of this matter periodically. See footnote 20 By letter dated April 24, 1995, Dr. Kradel reported to the circuit court that "[f]or the most part things are going well. The biological parents have independently provided the majority of care for their son for nearly eight months with no major problems."

The final hearing held in this case occurred on October 23, 1995, at which time Jonathan G. was returned to the legal custody of his natural parents. While finding that "both biological and foster parents are 'psychological parents'" of Jonathan G., the circuit court concluded, "that it does not believe that it has the authority to order visitation rights to the foster parents; however, if he had the power he would do so." The natural parents agreed to voluntary visitation, which continued until the Stems filed their petition for appeal with this Court.

II. Discussion

A. Procedural Delays

We face yet another case where the delays in resolving the underlying allegations of abuse, in developing an effective improvement plan, in resolving whether the family could be reunified, and in bringing permanency to this child's life are totally unacceptable.

Upon reviewing another egregiously delayed abuse and neglect case chronology in In re Carlita B., 185 W. Va. 613, 408 S.E.2d 365 (1991) we said:

> Certainly many delays are occasioned by the fact that troubled human relationships and aggravated parenting problems are not remedied overnight. The law properly recognizes that rights of natural parents enjoy a great deal of protection and that one of the primary goals of the social services network and the courts is to give aid to parents and children in an effort to reunite them.
>
> The bulk of the most aggravated procedural delays, however, are occasioned less by the complexities of mending broken people and relationships than by the tendency of these types of cases to fall through the cracks in the system. The long procedural delays in this and most other abuse and neglect cases considered by this Court in the last decade indicate that neither the lawyers nor the courts are doing an adequate job of assuring that children--the most voiceless segment of our society--aren't left to languish in a limbo-like state during a time most crucial to their human development.
> Id. at 623, 408 S.E.2d at 375.

Since the Carlita B. case in 1991, this Court has consistently urged upon the circuit courts that they must accord abuse and neglect cases the highest priority and must not let them languish during the critical formative years in a child's life. We urged this point again in State ex rel. Amy M. v. Kaufman, 196 W. Va. 251, 470 S.E.2d 205 (1996), while recognizing how difficult it can be for courts to recognize that the time is ripe for decision:

> A circuit judge overseeing a case such as this has an immensely difficult task, for in many abuse and neglect cases there is a genuine emotional bond as well as the natural biological bond between parent and child which courts are understandably hesitant to break if there is hope of meaningful change. In most abuse and neglect cases, the parent(s) may have redeeming qualities that create such hope that they will be able to make the necessary changes to become adequate parents.
>
>
> Although it is sometimes a difficult task, the trial court must accept the fact that the statutory limits on improvement periods (as well as our case law limiting the right to improvement periods) dictate that there comes a time for decision, because a child deserves resolution and permanency in his or her life, and because part of that permanency must include at minimum a right to rely on his or her caretakers to be there to provide the basic nurturance of life.
> Id. at __, 470 S.E.2d at 214.

Despite this Court's emphasis on the level of attention that should be given to abuse and neglect cases, lawyers and judges continue to allow these cases to lag on without prompt resolution. While fault for the delays experienced in the instant case can be assessed against various entities, our goal is not to point the finger of fault but to seek once again to capture the circuit courts' attention on this issue. Hopefully, this Court's adoption of the new Rules of Procedure for Abuse and Neglect Proceedings, on December 5, 1996, will create progress in this very difficult arena.

B. Role of Foster Parents at Termination Proceeding

The Stems argue that they were denied the right to meaningful participation at the termination hearing. Their counsel was permitted to be present, but was not permitted to present or cross-examine witnesses. See footnote 21

This Court recognized in syllabus point one of Bowens that "[i]f a party has lawful physical custody of a child, she has the right to service of process and to be heard in any proceeding that concerns the child." 174 W. Va. at 184-85, 324 S.E.2d at 145. We further held that "[i]f a party having lawful physical custody of a child is not served with process of a proceeding concerning that child she has the right to intervene in that proceeding." Id. In that case, we determined that an individual who had been granted physical custody of the children by written agreement of the natural mother prior to the initiation of abuse and neglect proceedings was entitled to notice of the proceedings pursuant to West Virginia Code § 49-6-2(c) and was wrongly denied the right to intervene in the abuse proceedings. In deciding Bowens, the Court first looked to the definition of custodian found in West Virginia Code § 49-1-5(5) (1981)See footnote 22 which provides that "'[c]ustodian' means a person who has or shares actual physical possession or care and custody of a child, regardless of whether such person has been granted custody of the child by any contract, agreement or legal proceedings[.]" This Court then examined the language of West Virginia Code § 49-6-2(c) (1984),See footnote 23 which stated that "[i]n any proceeding under this article, the party or parties having custody of the child shall be afforded a meaningful opportunity to be heard, including the opportunity to testify and to present and cross-examine witnesses."

In denying the Stems' motion for relief, the circuit court reasoned that the involvement of DHHR, as Jonathan G.'s custodian, precluded the applicability of the Bowens ruling. While DHHR was clearly the legal custodian of Jonathan G., however, it was not his physical custodian. Thus, the circuit court's attempt to distinguish Bowens from the present case on that basis does not survive scrutiny under the statutory definition of custodian. See W. Va. Code § 49-1-5(5). Bowens, however, was decided in the factual context of an individual who was a lawful custodian prior to the initiation of abuse and neglect proceedings, which clearly is the type of custodian contemplated by the provisions of West Virginia Code § 49-6-2(c). The more difficult issue that we face here is whether foster parents enjoy the statutory rights of notice and participation extended by West Virginia Code § 49-6-2(c) when their status as a child's custodian results from the filing of abuse and neglect charges and exists subject to and under the auspices of the DHHR's role as the child's legal custodian. An examination of the law of other jurisdictions is helpful.

The Court of Appeals of Minnesota determined in In re Welfare of C.J., 481 N.W.2d 861 (Minn. App. 1992), that because the statutory definition of custodian See footnote 24 included foster parents, the foster parents involved in that case were permitted to intervene under Minnesota's statutory language which parallels that of West Virginia Code § 49-6-2(c).See footnote 25 481 N.W. 2d at 862-63. The Minnesota court expressly rejected the argument that the foster parents are merely agents for the county and therefore cannot intervene as of right. The court held: "The intervention statute, however, does not require a party have legal custody; instead the party must only be a lawful custodian. Here the foster parents fall under the definition of custodian and therefore they have the right to participate in the termination proceedings." Id. at 863. Like the Minnesota court, we conclude that the absence of a statutory provision requiring that only legal custodians have a right to participate in termination proceedings negates the argument that DHHR's involvement, as the child's legal custodian, is all that is authorized by West Virginia Code §49-6-2(c).

Numerous tribunals have permitted foster parents to intervene and participate in at least part of the termination proceedings, depending on applicable statutory provisions. See Custody of a Minor, 432 N.E.2d 546, 554 (Mass. App. 1982) (finding no error in trial court's decision to permit foster parent involvement in termination proceedings despite lack of constitutional right to such participation); In re Kimberly J., 595 N.Y.S.2d 146 (N.Y. App. Div. 1993) (holding that foster parents had no statutory right to intervene in fact-finding stage of termination proceedings, but did have right to intervene in dispositional phase of proceeding given custody nature of proceeding); In re Baby Boy Scearce, 345 S.E.2d 404, 410 (N.C. App. 1986) (discussing statutory right of foster parents to participate in review proceedings concerning child's placement after termination of parental rights and noting "[a]t the very least, foster parents have the right for an opportunity to be heard, a right which derives from the child's right to have his or her best interests protected"); see also Berhow v. Crow, 423 So.2d 371 (Fla. Dist. Ct. 1982) (finding that foster parents had liberty interest arising from relationship with child that entitled them to notice and meaningful opportunity to be heard in adoption proceedings).

Many of those courts that permit foster parents to participate in termination proceedings recognize a need to limit the scope of their involvement in such proceedings. In In re D.L.C., 834 S.W.2d 760 (Mo. Ct. App. 1992), the appellate court held that the foster parents' participation in everything but name in a parental rights termination proceeding was reversible error. See footnote 26 Id. at 768. Rather than relying on language within a termination statute as grounds for participation, however, the foster parents in D.L.C. looked to the provisions of a foster parent statute which permitted them "to present evidence for the consideration of the court." See footnote 27 834 S.W.2d at 767 (quoting 1985 Mo. Laws § 211.464). In castigating the full- blown participation of the foster parents in the termination proceeding, the Missouri appellate court cited the United States Supreme Court's observation in Santosky v. Kramer, 455 U.S. 745 (1982), that: "'However substantial the foster parents' interests may be, they are not implicated directly in the factfinding stage of a state-initiated permanent neglect proceeding against the natural parents.'" 834 S.W.2d at 767 (quoting Santosky, 455 U.S. at 761 and citation omitted).

In the instant case, it is difficult not to be sympathetic to the Stems' effort to participate, not only because they had Jonathan G. with them for so long, providing him with love, constancy, and care in his earliest years; but also because the significant issues relating to a child's life and fate must not be decided in some artificial procedural vacuum, and the Stems, after the passage of so much time, probably were absolutely more knowledgeable than anyone as to this child's needs. What makes balancing their right to participate, and the extent of such participation, against the natural rights of the biological parents, as well as the statutory objective of reunifying Jonathan G. with them, so difficult is that both sets of parents, foster and biological, obviously loved and wanted this child. As a result of this love, and their strong commitment to this child, the two sets of parents became adversaries during these proceedings. As an aside, we must comment that scenarios such as the one before us would discourage most people from ever embarking on the noble work of foster care. Since the Stems were a constant in Jonathan G.'s life for such a long period of time and during his formative years, it would seem to go against not only all principles of fairness and equity, but also against all values of human relationship and compassion to deny them the right to be heard as to Jonathan G.'s best interests during these proceedings.

While we recognize that the statutory language of West Virginia Code § 49-6-2(c), when viewed in conjunction with the Bowens case, certainly appears to afford foster parents a right to participate in abuse and neglect proceedings, we believe sound public policy and the overall purposes of both statutory and case law regarding abuse and neglect proceedings dictate that such participation have its limits. Perhaps the healthiest balance we can achieve is to hold that the foster parents' involvement in abuse and neglect proceedings should be separate and distinct from the fact-finding portion of the termination proceeding and should be structured for the purpose of providing the circuit court with all pertinent information regarding the child. The level and type of participation in such cases is left to the sound discretion of the circuit court with due consideration of the length of time the child has been cared for by the foster parents and the relationship that has developed. To the extent that this holding is inconsistent with Bowens v. Maynard, 174 W. Va. 184, 324 S.E.2d 145 (1984), that decision is hereby modified. When foster parents are involved in these proceedings, however, the circuit court must assure that the proceeding does not evolve into a comparison of the relative fitness of the foster parents versus the biological parents. See footnote 28 See In re Trapp, 593 S.W.2d 193, 205-06 (Mo. 1980), appeal dismissed, 456 U.S. 967 (1982) (overruling trial court's granting of foster parents' motion to intervene in neglect proceedings, noting that foster parents' presence would "interject the false issue of the fitness of the foster parents to have custody of the children" and observing that children cannot be removed from their parents on grounds that they would be "better off" in another home).

We do not reverse the circuit court on this issue of denial of meaninful participation, but direct that on remand the Stems should be given a full opportunity to be heard concerning Jonathan G.'s interests and their desire to have a continued relationship with him.

C. Failure to Terminate Parental Rights

Both the Stems and DHHR See footnote 29 argue that the circuit court erred by not terminating the parental rights of the natural parents. In support of this assignment, these parties cite in In re Jeffrey R.L., 190 W. Va. 24, 435 S.E.2d 162 (1993), in which we held that:

> Parental rights may be terminated where there is clear and convincing evidence that the infant child has suffered extensive physical abuse while in the custody of his or her parents, and there is no reasonable likelihood that the conditions of abuse can be substantially corrected because the perpetrator > of the abuse has not been identified and the parents, even in the face of knowledge of the abuse, have taken no action to identify the abuser.

Id. at 25-26, 435 S.E.2d at 163-64, Syl. Pt. 3. They question whether Lisa K. properly acknowledged that she committed an abusive act towards Jonathan G. The record reveals that during the adjudicatory hearing on February 19, 1991, the circuit court expressly incorporated the report of the psychologist, Hal Slaughter, to whom Lisa K. admitted that she had committed the act resulting in Jonathan G.'s "shaken baby" diagnosis. The circuit court's order further states "[t]he mother acknowledged in the affirmative." While it is somewhat unclear from this language whether the circuit court was referencing an in-court affirmation by Lisa K. regarding the act of abuse, nonetheless, the parties stipulated to the admission of Mr. Slaughter's report which contained the admission of abuse.

The facts of this case simply are not the equivalent of those present in In re Jeffrey R.L. While Lisa K. did vacillate when subsequently questioned regarding the act of abuse during therapy, Dr. Kradel suggests an explanation in his report of February 3, 1994: "In some instances individuals have emotional blockages where traumatic experiences are removed from conscious awareness and they truly do not remember what has happened to them or what they have done." Another explanation provided by the signing counselors, according to the prosecutor's brief, is that "the mother could no longer recount the abuse . . . because in therapy they had moved beyond that point and progressed toward positive interaction with the child." While Lisa K. may have shown some ambivalence about her earlier admission of abuse, See footnote 30 the original acknowledgment was nonetheless made. See footnote 31 Moreover, both the natural parents cooperated with therapeutic intervention, that was ultimately deemed beneficial.

The termination proceedings ended on the State's motion to withdraw the petition with DHHR joining in this decision. We find no abuse of discretion regarding the circuit court's granting of that motion based on its finding that the evidence presented at that time was not sufficient to justify termination. Apparently, the circuit court, the State, and DHHR all agreed that the evidence, at this time, did not support a finding that the conditions that led to the abuse could not be substantially corrected. The record reveals that the guardian ad litem had no objection to the withdrawal of the termination petition. See footnote 32

D. Removal of DHHR

While DHHR argues that it was removed from this case by virtue of the circuit court's ruling during the May 6-7, 1993, contempt proceedings, a careful review of the record does not support this position. The circuit court removed DHHR as the case manager due to its conclusion that DHHR was "in contempt of the prior Orders regarding preparation of a case plan for the purpose of reunification." The order entered in connection with this proceeding states clearly that DHHR "should remain as a party throughout these proceedings."

The circuit court apparently felt that it had no choice but to involve an independent agency like Action Youth, given DHHR's failure to obey the circuit court's repeated directive to develop and follow a case plan for the purpose of reunifying Jonathan G. with his natural parents. DHHR, as a party to this case (usually by its agent, an individual child protective services worker), has the right and responsibility to advocate whatever position it determines proper under the law and in the best interests of the child. However, DHHR also has the duty to follow the court's directives in working on the case from the perspective of the delivery of social services. In a case, such as this, where DHHR refuses to comply with court directives, a circuit court may appoint an agency independent of DHHR to assist in case management. DHHR, however, as the circuit court clearly recognized by virtue of its directive that DHHR remain a party, was not absolved of its statutory duties to Jonathan G. despite its removal as the case manager.

E. Role of Prosecuting Attorney

The duties of the prosecuting attorney in regard to prosecution of abuse and neglect proceedings are set forth in West Virginia Code § 49-6-10 (1996):

> It shall be the duty of every prosecuting attorney to fully and promptly cooperate with persons seeking to apply for relief under the provisions of this article in all cases of suspected child abuse and neglect, to promptly prepare applications and petitions for relief requested by such persons, to investigate reported cases of suspected child abuse and neglect for possible criminal activity and to report at least annually to the grand jury regarding the discharge of his or her duties with respect thereto.

In the amicus brief submitted in this case by Jane Moran, she states that "[t]he relationship between the DHHR and the Prosecuting Attorney . . . appears to have been mutually supportive from the original taking of Jonathan in December, 1990 through July 1992." Ms. Moran suggests that the problem began when the prosecutor sought a continuance on the grounds that "'there are services that might have been provided to hearing impaired parents of hearing children which were not provided due to two opposing expert philosophies.'" Apparently, there was a meeting between the prosecutor and the foster care workers and assigned supervisor on January 25, 1993, during which it became apparent that the prosecutor did not support DHHR's decision to seek a termination of parental rights.

The record, as well as the oral arguments presented in this case, evidence that vitriolic discord existed between DHHR and the prosecuting attorney, all of which stemmed from a difference in views regarding the resolution of this matter. The prosecutor apparently believed that reunification was possible, whereas DHHR fervently believed that termination of parental rights was in Jonathan G.'s best interests. See footnote 33 Herein lies the problem. Should the role of the prosecutor be comparable to her role in criminal proceedings, requiring her to independently weigh the evidence before proceeding on a complaint, or should it be that of a traditional lawyer/client relationship, requiring her to present evidence in accord with the client's wishes within the confines of the law?

Guidance on this issue is provided by West Virginia Code § 49-7-26 (1996), which states that "[t]he prosecuting attorney shall render to the state department of welfare [division of human services], without additional compensation, such legal services as the department may require." This statutory provision supports the view that the prosecuting attorney stands in the traditional role of a lawyer when representing DHHR in connection with abuse and neglect proceedings. Indeed, the prosecuting attorney cites no authority to the contrary. In the analogous decision of Manchin v. Browning, 170 W. Va. 779, 296 S.E.2d 909 (1982), this Court held that "[t]he Legislature has thus created a traditional attorney-client relationship between the Attorney General and the state officers he is required to represent." Id. at 790, 296 S.E.2d at 920. Based on our conclusion that the prosecuting attorney's role as related to DHHR in an abuse and neglect proceeding is that of a traditional attorney-client, we further determine that a prosecuting attorney has no independent right to formulate and advocate positions separate from its client in these cases. See footnote 34

This case presents a difficult and confusing scenario regarding the prosecuting attorney's role. See footnote 35 According to the amicus brief, the prosecutor advised the circuit court following the filing of the contempt petition by the natural parents against DHHR that she had a conflict in representing her client in the contempt proceedings, but would not withdraw "from any other part of this case." The Attorney General was brought into the case at the prosecutor's request See footnote 36 and upon the circuit court's direction. See footnote 37 Although the prosecuting attorney had a questionable role in these proceedings, the representations in her brief illustrate the difficulties encountered by the prosecutor in connection with her representation of DHHR. See footnote 38

Jane Moran, as amicus curiae, suggests that DHHR was prevented by the actions of the prosecutor from presenting its point of view to the circuit court. We do not find that to be the case. While DHHR has a right to determine and advocate a position that comports with its statutory responsibilities, it must nonetheless follow the court's directives even if such directives conflict with its position. All the orders clearly reflect the circuit court's awareness of DHHR's view towards termination rather than reunification. In addition, DHHR had the benefit of the Attorney General's counsel. Upon review, we find the Department was not restricted from full participation in the proceedings, but only in its management of the case. Although the prosecutor's role in this case appears to have exceeded the boundaries of a traditional lawyer/client relationship, we find no reversible error with regard to the prosecutor's involvement in these proceedings under the facts of this case. See infra note 38.

F. Failure to Develop Case Plan

The circuit court's orders are replete with directives to DHHR to develop a case plan. Yet, we cannot determine from a review of the record whether such a plan was ever developed and submitted to the circuit court. DHHR is statutorily obligated by West Virginia Code § 49-6-5 (1996) to prepare the case plan immediately after a child is adjudicated as abused or neglected. See footnote 39 Since this Court's decision in Carlita B., we have repeatedly admonished lawyers and the circuit courts regarding the critical need for prompt resolution of child abuse and neglect proceedings, as well as the importance of a promptly prepared and thorough case plan geared toward meaningful improvement and reunification. We recognized in Carlita B., that

>
> 3. "Under W. Va. Code, 49-6-2(b) (1984), when an improvement period is authorized, then the court by order shall require the Department of Human Services to prepare a family case plan pursuant to W. Va. Code, 49-6D-3 (1984)." Syl. Pt. 3, State ex rel. West Virginia Dept. of Human Serv. v. Cheryl M., 177 W. Va. 688, 356 S.E.2d 181 (1987).
>
> 4. In formulating the improvement period and family case plans, courts and social service workers should cooperate to provide a workable approach for the resolution of family problems which have prevented the child or children from receiving appropriate care from their parents. The formulation of the improvement period and family case plans should therefore be a consolidated, multi-disciplinary effort among the court system, the parents, attorneys, social service agencies, and any other helping personnel involved in assisting the family.
>
> 5. The clear import of the statute [West Virginia Code § 49-6-2(d)] is that matters involving the abuse and neglect of children shall take precedence over almost every other matter with which a court deals on a daily basis, and it clearly reflects the goal that such proceedings must be resolved as expeditiously as possible.
>
> 6. At the conclusion of the improvement period, the court shall review the performance of the parents in attempting to attain the goals of the improvement period and shall, in the court's discretion, determine whether the conditions of the improvement period have been satisfied and whether sufficient improvement has been made in the context of all the circumstances of the case to justify the return of the child.
> 185 W. Va. at 615-16, 408 S.E.2d at 367-68, Syl. Pts. 1, in part, 3-6.

While this case presents an unusual scenario in that DHHR was ordered removed as the case manager and Action Youth appointed in its stead, the obligation to prepare a case plan was initially imposed on DHHR at the conclusion of the adjudicatory hearing on February 19, 1991, when the circuit court expressly ordered DHHR to develop a family case. DHHR remained as the case manager in this case until May 7, 1993, when the circuit court removed it from such role, due to DHHR's failure to comply with the court's directives regarding "the preparation of a case plan for the purpose of reunification." For more than two years before its removal as case manager, DHHR was obligated to prepare a case plan. Because the circuit court makes several references to requiring DHHR to update its case plan, case plans may have been submitted to the trial court, and just not filed as a matter of record. See footnote 40 However, given the circuit court's complete dissatisfaction with DHHR regarding its failure to submit a case plan dealing with reunification, we can only conclude that the plans submitted by DHHR either did not comply with the statutory requirements of West Virginia Code § 49-6-5 and/or the court's directives, or that DHHR's execution of the case plan was determined by the circuit court to be inadequate. Even after Action Youth was assigned the role of case manager, we believe that DHHR nonetheless retained its statutory responsibility with regard to the filing of a case plan with the court under West Virginia Code § 49-6-5.

To be very clear, the position of DHHR that the parental rights should have been terminated is not without merit. Jonathan was a victim of shaken baby syndrome, which has frequently been the cause of serious permanent injury, or even death, of infants. Once the court made the determination that reunification was the goal, however, DHHR should have worked diligently to accomplish that goal, or filed a petition for a writ of prohibition if they believed the record justified it. See Syl. Pt. 2, Amy M., 196 W. Va. at __, 470 S.E.2d at 207 (holding that prohibition was available to restrain courts from granting improvement periods of greater extent and duration than permitted statutorily); see also State ex rel. West Virginia Dep't of Health and Human Resources, 185 W. Va. 318, 406 S.E.2d 749 (1991) (granting writ of prohibition to DHHR to prevent enforcement of circuit court order directing blood testing seven years after jury determination of paternity).

G. Visitation Rights

The circuit court incorrectly determined that it had no basis upon which to order continued association between the foster parents and Jonathan G. Beginning with this Court's decision in Honaker v. Burnside, 182 W. Va. 448, 388 S.E.2d 322 (1989), we have recognized the need to consider whether a child, whose custodial arrangements are being altered, should be permitted to have continued contact with individuals with whom an emotional bond has been formed. In that case, we held that the circuit court should provide for visitation rights between a child and her stepfather and half-brother. Id. at 452, 388 S.E.2d at 326. Later in James M. v. Maynard, 185 W. Va. 648, 408 S.E.2d 400 (1991), an abuse and neglect case resulting in termination of parental rights, we held:

> It is a traumatic experience for children to undergo sudden and dramatic changes in their permanent custodians. Lower courts in cases such as these should provide, whenever possible, for a gradual transition period, especially where young children are involved. Further, such gradual transition periods should be developed in a manner intended to foster the emotional adjustment of the children to this change and to maintain as much stability as possible in their lives.
>
> In cases where there is a termination of parental rights, the circuit court should consider whether continued association with siblings in other placements is in the child's best interests, and if such continued association is in such child's best interests, the court should enter an appropriate order to preserve the rights of siblings to continued contact.
> Id. at 649, 408 S.E.2d at 401, Syl. Pts. 3, 4.

More recently in In re Christina L., 194 W. Va. 446, 460 S.E.2d 692 (1995), we recognized that visitation rights may be afforded in some circumstances to a parent who is found to have abused the child, even though his parental rights have been terminated:

> When parental rights are terminated due to neglect or abuse, the circuit court may nevertheless in appropriate cases consider whether continued visitation or other contact with the abusing parent is in the best interest of the child. Among other things, the circuit court should consider whether a close emotional bond has been established between parent and child and the child's wishes, is he or she is of appropriate maturity to make such request. The evidence must indicate that such visitation or continued contact would not be detrimental to the child's well being and would be in the child's best interest.
> Id. at 448, 460 S.E.2d at 694, Syl. Pt. 5.

The guiding principle relied upon by this Court in recommending consideration of continued contact with a child is whether a strong emotional bond exists between the child and an individual such that cessation in contact might be harmful to the child, both in its transitory period of adjusting to a new custodial arrangement and in its long-term emotional development. We find no reason to except individuals, like the Stems, who have had a successful long-term relationship with a foster child and have been found, in fact, to be psychological parents to Jonathan G., from consideration for such continued association.

The court in In re Custody of H.S.H.K., 533 N.W.2d 419 (Wis. 1995), cert. denied sub nom. Knott v. Holtzman, __ U.S. __, 116 S.Ct. 475 (1995), observed that while "[t]here is little uniformity in the case law concerning nonparental visitation over the objection of a biological or adoptive parent, . . . some courts have observed a judicial trend toward considering or allowing visitation to nonparents who have a parent-like relationship with the child if visitation would be in the best interest of the child." Id. at 435, n.37 and cases cited therein. The trial court was held to have abused its discretion in denying visitation rights to the foster parents where a foster family had been the custodial family since birth of a five- year-old child. In re Ashley K., 571 N.E.2d 905 (Ill. App. 1991). The court upheld the trial court's decision to grant visitation rights to the non-successful adoptive foster parents in In re Adoption of Francisco A., 866 P.2d 1175 (N.M. App, 1993), relying on the best interests of the child standard. The court recognized that such visitation rights may be reconsidered "[i]f at some time the visitation is no longer in the child's best interests." Id. at 1181; see also In re John T., 538 N.W.2d 761, 772 (Neb. App. 1995) (refusing to remove child from foster parent who had AIDS, observing that lack of biological connection between foster parent and child was inconsequential in assessing child's best interests); Sorensen v. Sorensen, 906 P.2d 838 (Or. App. 1995) (applying statute that permits any person including a foster parent "who has established emotional ties creating a child-parent relationship" to petition court for visitation rights).

Based on the principle of a child's right to continued association previously enunciated by this Court, we hold that a child has a right to continued association with individuals with whom he has formed a close emotional bond, See footnote 41 including foster parents, provided that a determination is made that such continued contact is in the best interests of the child. Accordingly, we remand this matter for further proceedings to determine whether continued contact with the Stems would be in Jonathan G.'s best interest. Due to the lengthy period of time that Jonathan G. has now resided exclusively in the home of his natural parents, the assessment of such continued contact may be different from what it might have been immediately following the transfer of physical custody.

Based on the foregoing, the decision of the Circuit Court of Berkeley County is remanded for further proceedings to consider whether continued association between Jonathan G. and his former foster parents is in his best interests.

Remanded.

Footnote: 8 The Stems had previously filed a document on November 11, 1992, styled "Notice of Appearance," which indicated that Scott A. Ollar was their counsel of record.

Footnote: 9 West Virginia Code § 49-6-5 deals with the disposition of neglected or abused children. West Virginia Code § 49-6-8 concerns foster care review that is to be initiated by the state, and provides that the circuit court shall give notice to and permit the appearance of foster parents in such review proceedings.

Footnote: 10 The natural parents submitted a joint memorandum, arguing that the provisions of West Virginia Code §§ 49-6-5 and -8 provide no authority for the involvement of foster parents. They further argued that "intervention by the foster parents would compromise the ability of the State to provide a meaningful improvement period."

Footnote: 11 This order followed a motion for reconsideration filed by the Stems in which they informed the circuit court of this Court's holding in Bowens v. Maynard, 174 W. Va. 184, 324 S.E.2d 145 (1984), that "a party [that] has lawful physical custody of a child, . . . has the right . . . to be heard in any proceeding that concerns the child." Id. at 184-85, 324 S.E.2d at 145, Syl. Pt. 1, in part.

Footnote: 12 As grounds for their petition for contempt against DHHR, the natural parents averred, inter alia:

1. That the undisputed evidence in the instant case shows more particularly, since October, 1992, that the natural parents herein have made great improvements and advances in acquiring those skills and attributes needed to become good, caring, and nurturing parents, and although these parents may not as of yet be ready for reunification with their infant child, they have demonstrated to the Court that they have willingly cooperated with DHHR in the development of a reasonable family case plan designed to lead to reunification and that they have responded and followed through with such a plan of action and other rehabilitative efforts through social, medical, mental health and other rehabilitative agencies . . . . 2. That the aforesaid efforts of the natural parents were not the result of any family case plan prepared or advocated by DHHR, but were the result of intervention by the Court at the insistence of their respective counsel when the Court was made aware of the underlying flaw in the manner in which DHHR was attempting to seek rehabilitation and reunification for this family, to-wit, not using counselors and personnel trained in sign and the culture of the deaf community; and that once this flaw was corrected and appropriately trained personnel and agencies intervened, great improvement was noted by both natural parents as aforesaid. 3. That as a matter of law, there exists sufficient evidence before the Court to justify a finding that "there is a reasonable likelihood that the conditions of neglect or abuse can be substantially corrected by the natural parents herein." 4. That despite such improvement by the natural parents herein, DHHR has directed a course of conduct against said parents to prevent them from engaging in any meaningful improvement period by restricting visitation between the parents and their child, and by advocating for termination of their parental rights, even in the face of the improvements aforesaid.

Footnote: 13 Due to the fact that DHHR and the prosecuting attorney were in disagreement regarding the issue of termination of parental rights and because the prosecuting attorney perceived the existence of a potential conflict of interest with regard to her continued representation of DHHR, see infra note 36, the prosecuting attorney requested that the Attorney General's office be involved in these proceedings to represent DHHR. An attorney from the Attorney General's office appeared at the May 7, 1993, contempt proceedings on behalf of DHHR. Even after the prosecuting attorney sought the involvement of the Attorney General because of the contempt proceedings, the prosecutor continued to appear and take an active role in these proceedings. From the contempt proceedings forward, it appears that the Attorney General's office represented DHHR and the prosecutor appeared on behalf of the State's interest. DHHR states in its brief to this Court, that "at hearings before and after the contempt hearing, the role of the prosecutor was unclear."

Footnote: 14 The case had been before the circuit court for more than two and one-half years at this time. We observe, additionally that it had been two years and four months since an adjudication of abuse, even though the statute in effect at that time provided that a post- adjudicatory improvement period could not exceed twelve months. See W. Va. Code § 49-6- 5(c) (1992) **.

Footnote: 15 Dr. Kradel notes in his report that "[i]t is Mr. Slaughter's opinion that if [D]HHR would have built a solid treatment program based on that original confession [to him] that this matter would have been successfully resolved with the family being much closer to reunification than it is now."

Footnote: 16 By the State, we are referring to the prosecuting attorney. At times, the prosecutor appears to have continued to represent DHHR and at other times, the prosecutor seems to have represented her own views with regard to the issues herein.

Footnote: 17 The circuit court concurred with the State's assessment of the evidence, stating in its order that "if the State had rested its case, upon motion of any other party, a motion of directed verdict against the State would have issued."

Footnote: 18 The Stems sought to have the circuit court set aside its order entered in connection with the termination hearing and further sought a stay of all proceedings.

Footnote: 19 The record indicates that the circuit court advised the parties to confer prior to the termination proceedings for the express purpose of resolving the role that the Stems' counsel should have at the termination hearing.

Footnote: 20 Review hearings were held before the circuit court on September 25, 1994; November 17, 1994; April 19, 1995; and August 14, 1995.

Footnote: 21 The circuit court did permit the Stems' counsel to state his position with regard to effecting the reunification of Jonathan G. with his natural parents and also with regard to immediate removal of Jonathan G. from the Stems following the termination hearing. See infra note 32.

Footnote: 22 The current statutory definition of "custodian" is identical to the one set forth in the 1981 statute relied upon in Bowens. See 174 W. Va. at 186, 324 S.E.2d at 147; cf. W. Va. Code § 49-1-5(5) (1996).

Footnote: 23 The current version of this statute reads: "In any proceeding pursuant to the provisions of this article, the party or parties having custodial or other parental rights or responsibilities to the child shall be afforded a meaningful opportunity to be heard, including the opportunity to testify and to present and cross-examine witnesses." W. Va. Code § 49-6- 2(c) (1996).

Footnote: 24 Custodian was defined under Minnesota law as "'any person who is under a legal obligation to provide care and support for a minor or who is in fact providing care and support for a minor.'" In re C.J., 481 N.W.2d at 863 (quoting Minn. Stat. § 260.015, subd. 14 (1990)).

Footnote: 25 The Minnesota statute delineating who has the right to participate in termination proceedings provided: "A child who is the subject of a petition, and the parents, guardian, or lawful custodian of the child have the right to participate in all proceedings on a petition." In re C.J., 481 N.W.2d at 863 (quoting Minn. Stat. § 260.155, subd. 1a (1987)).

Footnote: 26 The foster parents participated through counsel, as though a party to the proceedings, and "[t]he trial court did not confine Hickle's [their counsel's] role to presenting evidence relevant to the termination issue." 834 S.W.2d at 768. The foster parents' counsel presented evidence of their education and their affection for the child, which evidence, the appellate court stated, "had nothing to do with whether one or more grounds existed for termination of . . . parental rights. . . ." Id.

Footnote: 27 The statute, in its entirety, states:

Where a child has been placed with a foster parent, with relatives or with other persons who are able and willing to permanently integrate the child into the family by adoption, if the court finds that it is in the best interests of the child, the court may provide the opportunity for such foster parent, relative or other person to present evidence for the consideration of the court.

1985 Mo. Laws § 211.464.

Footnote: 28 The natural parents in this case aver that they were improperly and unknowingly sent to a psychologist, whose report was then used to compare them to the foster parents.

Footnote: 29 Since it joined in the State's motion to withdraw the termination petition, we find the DHHR's assertion of this assignment of error to be without a proper procedural basis.

Footnote: 30 It is well-documented that where there is no acknowledgement of abuse nor an acknowledgement of a failure to protect, it generally does not bode well for future improvement from a therapeutic perspective.

Footnote: 31 We observe additionally that Dr. Kradel, in his February 3, 1994, report, refers to an interview with psychologist Stephen Townsend on January 24, 1994, during which Mr. Townsend told Dr. Kradel "that Lisa had 'signed' to him that she shook the baby."

Footnote: 32 The only concerns raised by the guardian ad litem pertained to his concurrence with the recommendation of Dr. Kradel and Mr. Henderson that Jonathan G. be removed from the Stems and placed in another foster home with individuals trained in signing and that the reunification efforts be expedited. While there was discussion at the conclusion of the termination proceedings regarding the removal of Jonathan G. from the Stems, this removal was apparently never effectuated. The guardian ad litem's position with regard to this appeal is that the identity of Jonathan G.'s perpetrator of harm was identified and as such, cannot be relied upon as the basis for reversing the termination proceeding. Furthermore, the guardian ad litem observes that the Stems assented to the return of Jonanthan G. to his natural parents during the October 23, 1995, hearing, stating that they were only seeking visitation rights. With regard to visitation rights, the guardian ad litem takes the position that the Stems do not have standing to seek such rights.

Footnote: 33 To be fair to the prosecuting attorney, she did proceed to draft and file a petition for termination, even when she thought that reunification efforts had not been fully and properly attempted by DHHR. Moreover, she, along with counsel from the Attorney General's office, sought a termination of parental rights during the two-day hearing that occurred on June 21 and 22, 1994.

Footnote: 34 While Manchin supports the prosecutor's role in terms of a traditional lawyer/client relationship, we acknowledged that the Attorney General, as discussed in that decision, has no law enforcement powers. Id. at 787, 296 S.E.2d at 917. In contrast, the prosecutor clearly has law enforcement powers. Moreover, the same statute that directs the prosecutor to assist in the prosecution of child abuse and neglect laws also authorizes the prosecutor "to investigate reported cases of suspected child abuse and neglect for possible criminal activity." W. Va. Code § 49-6-10. These investigatory and enforcement rights are clearly outside the scope of the traditional lawyer/client relationship. Thus, the prosecutor, unlike the Attorney General, clearly has a dual role in the area of civil/criminal abuse and neglect cases that requires him or her to provide representation to those seeking to file child abuse and neglect complaints and also to investigate and enforce child abuse and neglect laws of this State. Thus, the prosecutor's authority is more limited by the client's position within the civil arena of abuse and neglect proceedings as compared to the criminal side of such proceedings.

Footnote: 35 Indeed, the prosecuting attorney stated at the oral argument of this case that she had no client and was appearing in connection with DHHR's allegations in its brief concerning her commission of unethical conduct.

Footnote: 36 Among additional reasons cited by the prosecutor for the involvement of the Attorney General was a potential conflict of interest in the event criminal contempt proceedings were brought against DHHR, and violation of Rules 1.2(d) and 1.6(b) of the Rules of Professional Responsibility. Given the parameters of this appeal, we do not further discuss the ethical concerns raised in conjunction with the prosecutor's representation of DHHR.

Footnote: 37 The circuit court ordered that the petition for contempt be sent to the office of the Attorney General for assignment of counsel.

Footnote: 38 Among the problems the prosecutor encountered was the discovery that, while DHHR represented to the circuit court that it was providing the natural parents with appropriate counseling services, the services were often rendered inadequate because considerations necessary for providing effective services to the hearing impaired, such as interpreters and special technological devices, were either not consistently provided or were not being utilized. The prosecutor, in her brief, states: What was very troubling to the State at the time and remains so today is that the Romney School for the Deaf is the state facility for deaf persons. It is where these parents were educated. For the Department not to know about specialized signing services that could have helped this family earlier is incomprehensible. Departmental workers claimed that they looked for deaf services in this area and found none. But within an approximate twenty-five mile radius of Berkeley County there exist more than twenty agencies and programs who directly deal with deaf parents who need the skills that the Circuit Court ordered.

The prosecutor states additionally that DHHR "refused to accept the progress reports of the signing counselors" and that "[t]here is some indication that they [DHHR] were not paying the bills of these counselors." The prosecutor further indicates that upon her review of records and communication with service providers, she discovered facts that differed greatly from what she was being told by DHHR. She learned that Jonathan G. "was not being taught to communicate with his parents, especially his father as ordered by the Court." She discovered that with regard to the natural parents' visitation, the foster parents were being given priority as to the time periods they were permitted to spend with Jonathan G. Yet another discovery was that the Stems maintain they had been promised from almost the time of placement that Jonathan G. would be eligible for adoption by them. In addition, the prosecutor states she learned "that if certain witnesses were called to the witness stand, that they might commit perjury to further the case."

Footnote: 39 Case plans can also be required by a circuit court in the pre-adjudicatory phase pursuant to West Virginia Code § 49-6-2(b), when an improvement period is granted.

Footnote: 40 In reviewing the record, Dr. Kradel's notes also refer to numerous DHHR service plans.

Footnote: 41 The length of time that the child has remained with the foster parents is a significant factor to consider in determining this issue.

Per Curiam:

Sherry D., See footnote 1 the respondent below and appellant herein, appeals a final order entered July 25, 1994, by the Circuit Court of Wood County, which terminated her parental rights to her son, Jonathan Michael D. She asserts the circuit court erred because there was no evidence she knowingly allowed her husband, Jonathan Brett D., to abuse their child; the evidence established she complied with the terms of her improvement period; and the West Virginia Department of Health and Human Resources (Department) made no reasonable efforts to reunify the family. After reviewing the record, we find no reversible error and affirm the decision of the circuit court.

I.
FACTS

In February, 1993, Karol Walton, a child protective services worker with the Department, filed a petition pursuant to W. Va. Code, 49-6-1 (1992),See footnote 2 alleging five-month-old Jonathan Michael D. was an abused and/or neglected child according to W. Va. Code, 49-1-3 (1992).See footnote 3 The petition set forth the following facts:

> "On February 4, 1993, the above-named child was taken to St. Joseph's Hospital and treated for a spiral fracture in right femur which injury was sustained when father was placing the child in a swing and allegedly pulled the child's leg and heard a snap. The respondent father reports that the child has been bruised on three previous occasions. In addition, the father has a history of mental illness and poor impulse control. Further, the respondent-mother is aware of said abuse by the respondent-father and has failed to adequately supervise said child and does nothing to prevent said abuse."

The circuit court determined that Jonathan was in imminent danger and ordered temporary custody placed with the Department. See footnote 4 The child was placed with his great-aunt and continues to reside in her home.

A preliminary hearing was held on February 11, 1993. Adjudicatory hearings were held on March 26, 1993, and April 26, 1993. At the conclusion of the April 26, 1993, hearing, the circuit court determined the Department had proved by clear and convincing evidence that Jonathan was subject to child abuse: "The totality of the evidence here shows a continuing and reoccurring injuries to a child which are not normal and are inconsistent with the father's explanation of any of the things that happened according to the medical testimony." A dispositional hearing was held May 21, 1993, and a twelve-month improvement period was granted. On November 18, 1993, the circuit court reviewed the progress of the improvement period and determined temporary custody should remain with the Department. A final hearing was held on July 14, 1994. By order entered July 25, 1994, Sherry D.'s and Jonathan Brett D.'s parental rights were terminated. See footnote 5 The evidence taken at the hearings is summarized as follows.

Ms. Walton testified she filed the petition after receiving information from the hospital that Jonathan received a fracture to his right leg. Further examinations were conducted at the hospital because child abuse was suspected, and an old injury to the right arm and three old left rib fractures were revealed. The Department also received telephone calls indicating the child was observed on at least three occasions with bruises on his face, back, and his bottom near his scrotum.

Jonathan Brett D. testified his son was fussy the night before the incident occurred and he had awakened very early the next morning. He took Jonathan downstairs and put him in the child swing. The baby's legs were folded up and he had to pull them down through the leg holes in the swing. He testified he heard the leg crack when he pulled it through. He stated that he asked Sherry D.'s stepmother, a registered nurse, to examine the baby and she believed his leg was alright. See footnote 6 Jonathan Brett D. explained the rib injuries probably occurred when he fell down a flight of stairs while holding the baby and they both hit the wall. He attributed the arm injury to an accident that occurred when he lifted the baby out of a playpen and the baby fell back against the side of the playpen and fell to the floor. He went on to relate the bruises to Jonathan's bottom to an incident where he bounced the baby on his knee. He explained that other bruises may have occurred when the baby rolled around on their waterbed. Jonathan Brett D. denied ever intentionally hitting his son.

Of particular significance is the fact that Jonathan Brett D. admitted he was a victim of child abuse. He had undergone counseling sessions with James D. Wells, a counselor at the Worthington Center in Parkersburg, to help him work through his anger toward his mother and father. He discontinued seeing Mr. Wells when he lost his medical card because he could not afford the therapy. Mr. Wells testified he counseled Jonathan Brett D. briefly when the baby was approximately two months old. Mr. Wells identified impulse control problems and diagnosed Jonathan Brett D. as experiencing major depression.

At the April 26, 1993, hearing, Sherry D. testified she never witnessed her husband abusing their son. She supported his explanation for the baby's injuries. She testified again at the final hearing held July 14, 1994, and admitted that Jonathan's injuries were serious. However, she denied any responsibility for the injuries. Sherry D. went so far as to say it may have been possible her husband intentionally caused the injuries, but she was not certain. She still maintained it was possible the baby was injured accidently. Eventually, she claimed to have separated from Jonathan Brett D. and filed for divorce because she could not be absolutely sure her son would be safe in the same house as his father.

Jonathan's foster mother, Elizabeth M., testified Sherry D. told her she was going to "play the game" with the Department and tell them what they wanted to hear in order to get her son back. The couple then planned to reunite and move to Ohio. Sherry D. denied making those particular statements, although she admitted she would do anything to regain custody. Sherry D. testified Elizabeth M. offered her $10,000 to relinquish her parental rights to Jonathan. Elizabeth M. denied such offer.

Dr. Min Liu, a pediatrician, testified the skeletal survey report showed a nondisplaced spiral fracture of the right leg, See footnote 7 old fractures of the left 5th, 6th, and 7th ribs, and evidence of a healing right upper arm bone. It appeared to Dr. Liu that the bone scan only evidenced a broken leg; however, she admitted a radiologist is better trained to interpret these results. She testified these injuries were suspicious and may be an indication of child abuse. Otherwise, her examination revealed a healthy, well-nourished baby.

Dr. Anthony Twite, an orthopedist, testified the bone scan showed abnormalities only in the leg and the X-rays showing prior injuries to the ribs and upper right arm "may be called into question" because the bone scan is a more accurate method of detecting fractures. See footnote 8 However, his conclusions were discredited by Dr. Paul VanDyke, a diagnostic radiologist who possessed more training and experience in evaluating bone scans and X-rays.

Dr. VanDyke testified the X-ray skeletal survey illustrated an old injury to the right humerus (upper arm) which indicated a "good manifestation of trauma to the bone that didn't result in fracture but resulted in injury to the bone[.]" He opined the baby's rib injuries and right arm injury were in the process of healing and could have been sustained anywhere from weeks to months earlier. Furthermore, the spiral fracture of the right femur was the type of injury that would require "significant trauma" to inflict because an infant's bones are more flexible than an adult's. When questioned about the difference in the bone scan and X-ray results, Dr. VanDyke explained the two reports were actually consistent. A close examination of the bone scan revealed the type of injuries more readily apparent from the X-ray. The rib fractures were not as apparent from the bone scan because the injury occurred much earlier and the ribs were in a later stage of healing. Therefore, one would not expect to see heavy activity at that site.

Dr. VanDyke further testified that the parents' explanation for the baby's leg injury would be inconsistent with the medical evidence because the amount of force used to effectuate the fracture would necessarily be much more momentous than simply pulling the leg through the hole in a baby swing. He noted the injuries were clearly out of the range of expected injuries based on a five-month-old's limited activity and lack of mobility. He found the fact the baby suffered major injuries at different sites at different times significant.

Joan George, a child protective services worker with the Department, prepared a case report in June of 1994 and testified at the final hearing held July 14, 1994. She recommended termination of parental rights. Her primary concern was the parents' failure to accept any responsibility for the baby's injuries. She believed they minimized the seriousness of the problems. Furthermore, Sherry D. and Jonathan Brett D. continued to insist the injuries were not intentionally inflicted, but were caused by accidents. Ms. George testified the parents were inconsistent with following through with their need for counseling. Sherry D. attended less than ten counseling sessions during the course of the one-year improvement period. The parents also demonstrated no ability to be self-sufficient. They did obtain various employment, but lost their jobs and had to live with relatives for most of the year.

On cross-examination, Ms. George admitted Sherry D. essentially performed the tasks set forth in the family case plan. However, she felt because Sherry D. failed to acknowledge responsibility for her son's injuries, the issue could not be addressed and worked on during the improvement period. In this regard, she felt Sherry D. and Jonathan Brett D. had not attempted to correct the behavior that caused the injuries. Accordingly, Ms. George was unable to conclude that Sherry D.'s level of functioning improved to the point that the safety of the child could be ensured.

Cynthia Beck, the psychologist who evaluated Sherry D., reiterated the fact that Sherry D. continued to deny responsibility for her son's injuries. Ms. Beck, however, did not recommend termination of parental rights. She prepared a report recommending Sherry D. submit to counseling and undergo an evaluation to determine if she should be placed on medication.

At the final hearing, the circuit court determined there was no reasonable likelihood the conditions of neglect or abuse resulting in the baby's injuries could be substantially corrected in the future. Accordingly, parental rights were terminated. The circuit court found the numerous injuries could not have been inflicted accidentally and neither parent had accepted responsibility for the baby's injuries. The circuit court found that in the two months preceding the final hearing, Sherry D.'s cooperation with the Department was not sincere. Furthermore, the circuit court found her testimony was not credible. It stated Sherry D. was "only going through the motions and playing a little game with the department until such time when she gets her child back, and then she's going to reunite with the father."

II.

STANDARD OF REVIEW

When an action is tried upon the facts without a jury, the circuit court "shall find the facts specially and state separately its conclusions of law thereon . . . [and these] [f]indings . . . shall not be set aside unless clearly erroneous[.]" W.Va.R.Civ.P. 52(a). "'A finding is "clearly erroneous" when although there is evidence to support it, the reviewing court on the entire evidence is left with the definite and firm conviction that a mistake has been committed.'" Board of Educ. of County of Mercer v. Wirt, ___ W. Va. ___, ___ n.14, 453 S.E.2d 402, 413 n.14 (1994), quoting U.S. v. U.S. Gypsum Co., 333 U.S. 364, 395, 68 S. Ct. 525, 542, 92 L.Ed.2d 746, 765-66 (1948). However, a reviewing court may not overturn a finding simply because it would have decided the case differently, and it must affirm "[i]f the [circuit] court's account of the evidence is plausible in light of the record viewed in its entirety[.]" Anderson v. City of Bessemer City, N.C., 470 U.S. 564, 573, 105 S. Ct. 1504, 1511, 84 L.Ed.2d 518, 528 (1985). Finally, "[w]hen findings are based on determinations regarding the credibility of witnesses, Rule 52(a) demands even greater deference to the trial court's findings[.]" 470 U.S. at 574, 105 S. Ct. at 1512, 84 L.Ed.2d at 529. Applying these principles to the facts of this case, we are of the opinion that the circuit court's findings were not clearly erroneous.

III.
FINDING OF ABUSE

Sherry D. first contends there was no evidence in the record to support the circuit court's initial finding that her conduct constituted child abuse or neglect. This Court has held that parental rights may be terminated on account of abuse even if the parent did not personally inflict the injuries. Syllabus Point 2 of In re Jeffrey R.L., 190 W. Va. 24, 435 S.E.2d 162 (1993), sets forth the standard for when parental rights may be terminated for failure to prevent abuse:

> "'W. Va. Code, 49-1-3(a) (1984), in part, defines an abused child to include one whose parent knowingly allows another person to commit the abuse. Under this standard, termination of parental rights is usually upheld only where the parent takes no action in the face of knowledge of the abuse or actually aids or protects the abusing parent.' Syl. pt. 3, In re Betty J.W., 179 W. Va. 605, 371 S.E.2d 326 (1988)."

The circuit court found that Jonathan Brett D. intentionally abused his son and that Sherry D. was aware of the abuse and did nothing to prevent it. As we previously stated, this Court accords deference to such findings of fact. See footnote 9 within the first five months of his life, not to mention the numerous bruises about his back, face, and bottom. Sherry D. may not have been present when the abuse occurred, as she claims, but it could reasonably be inferred she possessed knowledge the abuse was occurring. Other family members questioned how the baby sustained the bruises and reported their suspicions to the Department. Sherry D. was aware her husband had received counseling for impulse control problems after the birth of their son. See footnote 10 Standing alone this factor is not determinative. However, considering the other evidence in this case, we find the circuit court's determination that Sherry D. was aware the abuse was occurring was substantially supported by the record.

Courts oftentimes must rely upon circumstantial evidence in finding a parent liable for failing to protect his or her child from abuse even though he or she never actively participated in the abuse. Should the parents choose to support each other's version of what transpired, there may be no direct evidence to the contrary. Particularly when the victim of the abuse is a baby, as in this case, he or she cannot testify. In State v. Adams, 89 N.M. 737, 557 P.2d 586 (1976), the Court of Appeals of New Mexico affirmed the defendant's criminal conviction of child abuse resulting in the death of his twenty-eight-month-old daughter. The Adamses had a rationalization for all the child's bruises and injuries--from her playing with her brother to being accidently hit on the head with a glider. The defendant supported his wife's explanation for how their child was injured and eventually died. The court found his claims to be unconvincing. The circumstances leading to the child's death supported the inference that the father knew the abuse was occurring and failed to take action to stop it. See footnote 11 See also State v. Williquette, 129 Wis. 2d 239, 385 N.W.2d 145 (1986) (mother failed to protect seven- and eight-year- old children from their father's abuse after they reported the abuse to her); but see Pope v. State, 284 Md. 309, 396 A.2d 1054 (1979) (defendant's child abuse conviction reversed because she was not within the class of persons specified by the statute, i.e., a parent or guardian, even though she witnessed a friend beat her baby to death and did nothing to stop it).

IV.
TERMINATION OF PARENTAL RIGHTS

Sherry D. contends the circuit court erred in terminating her parental rights because she complied with the terms set forth in the family case plan during the improvement period. See footnote 12 Ms. George admitted Sherry D. performed the required tasks. However, the recommendation to terminate parental rights was due to the fact that Sherry D.'s attitude and beliefs did not change during the improvement period. She never accepted responsibility for Jonathan's injuries and only during the last few months of the improvement period did she admit even the possibility that Jonathan Brett D. intentionally inflicted the injuries. The family case plan specifically provided "goal achievement will be measured by the level of change effectuated by participation in the identified tasks and not by mere compliance." Furthermore, this Court has recognized it is possible for an individual to show "compliance with specific aspects of the case plan" while failing "to improve . . . [the] overall attitude and approach to parenting." W. Va. Dept. of Human Serv. v. Peggy F., 184 W. Va. 60, 64, 399 S.E.2d 460, 464 (1990).

The assessment of the overall success of the improvement period lies within the discretion of the circuit court "regardless of whether or not the individual has completed all suggestions or goals set forth in family case plans." In Interest of Carlita B., 185 W. Va. 613, 626, 408 S.E.2d 365, 378 (1991). Syllabus Point 6 of Carlita B. states:

> "At the conclusion of the improvement period, the court shall review the performance of the parents in attempting to attain the goals of the improvement period and shall, in the court's discretion, determine whether the conditions of the improvement period have been satisfied and whether sufficient improvement has been made in the context of all the circumstances of the case to justify the return of the child."

Of particular concern to the circuit court was the fact that Sherry D.'s behavioral change during the last few months of the improvement period was an attempt to deceive the Department. There was evidence she was merely going through the motions to appease the Department while her true intentions were to reunite with Jonathan Brett D. and move out of the State. The circuit court was particularly concerned about the baby's safety should Sherry D. reunite with her husband. Thus, the circuit court found there was no substantial likelihood the conditions had changed. The circuit court is in the best position to judge a witness's credibility, and we find nothing in the record to lead this Court to a different conclusion.

On the issue of the improvement period, we sua sponte address an issue of particular concern to this Court. We have stated: "During the improvement period, the status of the child(ren) and the progress of the parent(s) in satisfying the conditions of the improvement period should be monitored by the circuit court on a monthly basis. To the extent possible, such review should also incorporate the multi-disciplinary approach, with social workers and other helping personnel present in the court with attorneys and parties to review progress and assure the program is being followed and improvement being made." Carlita B., 185 W. Va. at 625, 408 S.E.2d at 377. (Emphasis added). The improvement period was ordered in June of 1993. On November 18, 1993, the circuit court conducted its only hearing reviewing the progress of the parents before the final hearing was held on July 14, 1994. It must be emphasized that at that point the child had spent more than half of his life in foster care. A single six- month review of a one-year improvement period is woefully inadequate, especially where such a young infant is involved. Frequent monitoring enables a speedy return of the child should the parents demonstrate substantial improvement. "[T]he significance of a six-month period in the first three years of life must once again be viewed as an extremely vital time in the course of a child's human development." Carlita B., 185 W. Va. at 624, 408 S.E.2d at 376. It also allows the circuit court to see to it that the Department is making reasonable efforts toward the goal of family reunification and to assure the child is receiving all necessary services.

We do not, however, find reversible error in the circuit court's lack of diligence in monitoring this case. We are not convinced that additional proceedings before the circuit court would have made any difference in the final outcome of this case because Sherry D. failed to ever acknowledge that Jonathan was an abused child. Without such revelation, the circuit court found it unlikely Sherry D. would take steps to prevent further abuse from occurring.

V.

DUTY OF DEPARTMENT

Sherry D.'s final argument is that the Department failed to make a reasonable effort to reunify the family pursuant to W. Va. Code, 49-6-5 (1992). This assignment of error is without merit. The Department promptly prepared the family case plan, See footnote 13 submitted the plan to the circuit court in May of 1993, and took immediate steps to offer services. Sherry D. failed to take advantage of the opportunity to work with the Department until the end of the improvement period and even then did not truly accept the fact that the abuse occurred. The failure to reunify the family in this case does not lie with the Department.See footnote 14 Sherry D. failed to bear the responsibility of demonstrating to the Department and the circuit court sufficient progress and improvement in order to regain custody.

VI.

CONCLUSION

For the foregoing reasons, we find the Circuit Court of Wood County did not abuse its discretion in terminating the parental rights of Sherry D. Accordingly, the judgment is affirmed.

Affirmed.

Footnote: 1 We follow our traditional practice in child abuse and neglect matters and other cases involving sensitive facts and do not use the last names of the parties. See, e.g., Matter of Scottie D., 185 W. Va. 191, 406 S.E.2d 214 (1991);

State ex rel. Div. of Human Serv. by Mary C.M. v. Benjamin P.B., 183 W. Va. 220, 395 S.E.2d 220 (1990).

Footnote: 2 W. Va. Code, 49-6-1(a), states, in part:

"If the state department or a reputable person believes that a child is neglected or abused, the department or the person may present a petition setting forth the facts to the circuit court in the county in which the child resides, or to the judge of such court in vacation. The petition shall be verified by the oath of some credible person having knowledge of the facts. The petition shall allege specific conduct including time and place, how such conduct comes within the statutory definition of neglect or abuse with references thereto, any supportive services provided by the state department to remedy the alleged circumstances and the relief sought. Upon filing of the petition, the court shall set a time and place for a hearing and shall appoint counsel for the child."

Footnote: 3 W. Va. Code, 49-1-3(a), defines an "abused child":

"'Abused child' means a child whose health or welfare is harmed or threatened by:

"(1) a parent, guardian or custodian who knowingly or intentionally inflicts, attempts to inflict, or knowingly allows another person to inflict, physical injury, or mental or emotional injury, upon the child or another child in the home; or

"(2) Sexual abuse or sexual exploitation; or

"(3) The sale or attempted sale of a child by a parent, guardian, or custodian[.]"

W. Va. Code, 49-1-3(g)(1), defines a "neglected child":

"'Neglected child' means a child:

"(A) Whose physical or mental health is harmed or threatened by a present refusal, failure or inability of the child's parent, guardian or custodian to supply the child with necessary food, clothing, shelter, supervision, medical care or education, when such refusal, failure or inability is not due primarily to a lack of financial means on the part of the parent, guardian or custodian; or

"(B) Who is presently without necessary food, clothing, shelter, medical care, education or supervision because of the disappearance or absence of the child's parent or custodian[.]"

The statute was amended in 1994. The minor changes do not affect our determination of this case.

Footnote: 4 See W. Va. Code, 49-6-3 (1992), which states, in part:

"(a) Upon the filing of a petition, the court may order that the child alleged to be an abused or neglected child be delivered for not more than ten days into the custody of the state department or a responsible relative, which may include any parent, guardian or other custodian pending a preliminary hearing, if it finds that: (1) There exists imminent danger to the physical well-being of the child, and (2) there are no reasonably available alternatives to removal of the child[.]"

Footnote: 5 Jonathan Brett D.'s petition for appeal to this Court was denied.

Footnote: 6 Barbara M., Sherry D.'s stepmother, testified Jonathan Brett D. was concerned about his son's injury and asked her to look at the baby's leg. Barbara M. failed to recognize the leg was broken and attributed the child's behavior to constipation. Nevertheless, Sherry and Jonathan Brett D. transported the baby to the hospital.

The family lived with the stepmother when these incidents took place. As a registered nurse, she felt confident she would have noticed any indications of child abuse, and she felt none were present.

Footnote: 7 A nondisplaced spiral fracture means the leg bone sustained a break but was still in proper alignment.

Footnote: 8 Dr. Paul VanDyke, a diagnostic radiologist at St. Joseph's Hospital, explained that in a bone scan, a radioactive label is used on a substance that goes to the bone and illustrates the entire skeletal system at one time. The substance accumulates at the sites of osteoplastic activity (where bone cells are laying down bone to repair injuries). By using the information from the X-rays and the bone scan, medical professionals are able to identify bone fractures and traumas and estimate how long ago the injury occurred.

Footnote: 9 As we recognized in In re Elizabeth Beth H., ___ W. Va. ___, ___, 453 S.E.2d 639, 642 (1994):

"Consistent with our cases in other areas, we give appropriate deference to findings of the circuit court. In this regard, the circuit court has a superior sense of what actually transpired during an incident, by virtue of its ability to see and hear the witnesses who have firsthand knowledge of the events. Appellate oversight is therefore deferential, and we should review the circuit court's findings of fact following an evidentiary hearing under the clearly erroneous standard. If the circuit court makes no findings or applies the wrong legal standard, however, no deference attaches to such an application. Of course, if the circuit court's findings of fact are not clearly erroneous and the correct legal standard is applied, the circuit court's ultimate ruling will be affirmed as a matter of law."

Footnote: 10 Studies indicate that victims of child abuse are at a greater risk of becoming perpetrators of abuse to their own children. Child abusers that were victims themselves liken abuse with proper parenting skills. See Dean M. Herman, A Statutory Proposal to Prohibit the Infliction of Violence Upon Children, 19

Fam.L.Q. 1, 20-21 (1985) (parents justify the abuse they inflict on their children by the treatment they received and such justifications are very difficult to overcome).

Footnote: 11 In Santillanes v. State, 115 N.M. 215, 849 P.2d 358 (1993), the Supreme Court of New Mexico held the application of the civil negligence standard went beyond the intended scope of the criminal child abuse statute. Mr. Adams' conviction was not reversed, however, because the court declined to retroactively apply the criminal negligence standard.

Footnote: 12 The family case plan submitted by Ms. George in May of 1993 outlined numerous goals and tasks for Mr. and Mrs. D. They were to read booklets entitled All That a Child Can Be and Toddlers and prepare various reports for the Department. For instance, they were required to prepare reports detailing the reasons they felt the Department removed the baby from their care and explain their understanding of what must be accomplished in order for them to regain custody. Sherry D. was required to participate in individual therapy sessions on a monthly basis and apprise her social worker of her efforts to comply with the case plan.

Footnote: 14 Victor I. Vieth in The Mutilation of a Child's Spirit: A Call for a New Approach to Termination of Parental Rights in Cases of Child Abuse, 20 William Mitchell L. Rev. 727, 731 (1994), recognizes the arduous task faced by social services in attempting to reunite the family:

"It is often difficult, however, to reunite victims of physical or sexual abuse with their offending parents. Parents charged with abuse or neglect of a child 'are not candidates for quick change' and often require 'long-term treatment and long-term support in order to achieve any measure of success.' One study concludes that the success rate of treating abusive parents may be as low as forty percent.

"For social workers, the greatest challenge may be to help a nonoffending parent accept the fact that abuse has taken place. Typically, '[n]on-offending parents tend to lie to cover for the guilty parent because of their emotional ties to that person.'" (Emphasis in original; footnotes omitted).

Although there is generally a strong public policy in favor of encouraging loyalty in one spouse to the other, a parent's first commitment must be to the protection of his or her child.

MILLER, Justice:

This is an appeal by Marilyn P. from an order of the Circuit Court of Marion County, entered on August 25, 1988, terminating her parental rights to her infant son, Jonathan P. See footnote 1 Marilyn P. contends that the trial court erred in: (1) finding that there was sufficient evidence of child neglect; (2) failing to grant an improvement period; (3) terminating her parental rights on the ground that there was no reasonable likelihood that the conditions of abuse or neglect could be substantially corrected; (4) admitting the testimony of a social worker from the Department of Human Services (DHS); and (5) allowing the former prosecuting attorney to represent the infant child. We do not find reversible error, and, accordingly, the order of the Circuit Court of Marion County is affirmed.

Jonathan was born on September 20, 1986. On April 7, 1987, a temporary custody order was issued granting custody of Jonathan to DHS. See footnote 2 On April 14, 1987, a hearing was conducted to determine whether custody of Jonathan should remain with DHS. At that hearing, Nancy Riley, a worker for DHS, testified that Marilyn refused all help offered to her by DHS. The social worker testified that Marilyn did not have formula to feed Jonathan and that she expressed no concern about sleeping in a car with Jonathan despite the cold temperature. At the conclusion of the hearing, the circuit court granted temporary custody of Jonathan to DHS under the conditions set forth in the social summary prepared by Ms. Riley.

On June 25, 1987, the court issued its order granting a sixty-day assessment period based on the recommendations made at the April 14, 1987 hearing. During this assessment period, the court ordered custody to remain with DHS while Marilyn underwent psychological evaluation and counseling. The court further ordered Marilyn to contact DHS to arrange for visitation with Jonathan.

By order entered on September 22, 1987, pursuant to a joint motion of the parties, the circuit court continued this matter until completion of Marilyn's psychological evaluation and ordered that custody remain with DHS until a further hearing could be held.

On May 23, 1988, a hearing was held to determine whether Marilyn's parental rights should be terminated. By order entered on August 25, 1988, the circuit court terminated her parental rights and placed permanent custody of Jonathan with DHS. It is from that decision that Marilyn now appeals.

I.

Marilyn first contends that the temporary custody order initially removing Jonathan from her care failed to allege specific conduct which would show imminent danger to his physical well-being, as defined in W.Va.Code, 49-1- 3(e) (1984). The State contends that the circuit court's finding that the child was nutritionally deprived is specifically recognized in this section as a ground for removal. See footnote 3

W.Va.Code, 49-6-3 (1984), authorizes, upon the filing of a petition, the immediate, temporary taking of custody of a child by DHS when there exists an imminent danger to the physical well-being of the child and there are no reasonably available alternatives to the removal of the child. State v. Carl B., 171 W.Va. 774, 301 S.E.2d 864 (1983). In State ex rel. Miller v. Locke, 162 W.Va. 946, 253 S.E.2d 540 (1979), we observed that

W.Va.Code, 49- 6-3, allows a taking only in an emergency situation in which the welfare or the life of the child is endangered.

In its temporary custody order, the circuit court found that there was imminent danger to Jonathan's physical well-being "by reason of lack of cooperation from mother to provide adequate food and shelter for the child." The order concluded that there were no reasonably available alternatives to removal of the child since "the mother has refused any supportive services and fails to recognize the dangers she is exposing him to." See footnote 4

The evidence in the record supports the circuit court's findings. Marilyn and her son had been sleeping in a car with temperatures outside as low as 30 degrees. Marilyn had no formula to feed her son. Instead, she was feeding him regular milk which was causing him to have diarrhea. Although the social worker advised Marilyn how to obtain an emergency food voucher in order to get formula for Jonathan, she refused to accept the assistance offered.

Here, there clearly existed an imminent danger to Jonathan's physical well- being, and there was sufficient evidence to warrant the circuit court's issuance of a temporary custody order. The extremely young age of the child, who was six months of age at the time of the petition, is a significant factor. As we mentioned in Syllabus Point 1, in part, of In re R.J.M., 164 W.Va. 496, 266 S.E.2d 114 (1980), "children under the age of three years who are more susceptible to illness, need consistent close interaction with fully committed adults[.]"

II.

Marilyn next contends that the circuit court failed to grant her an improvement period and unlawfully continued to allow custody of Jonathan to remain with DHS. The State argues that Marilyn was given a sufficient period of time to improve her present conditions and that the court did not commit error by denying an improvement period.

We explained in Syllabus Point 2 of State ex rel. W. Va. Dep't of Human Serv. v. Cheryl M., 177 W.Va. 688, 356 S.E.2d 181 (1987), that our statute does not automatically require an improvement period and that the parent must request such an improvement period:

> "W.Va.Code, 49-6-2(b) (1984), perm its a parent to m ove the court for an improvement period which shall be allowed unless the court finds compelling circumstances to justify a denial." See footnote 5

The circuit court's order dated June 25, 1987, granting DHS custody of Jonathan for a sixty-day evaluation period, provided that Marilyn should contact DHS to arrange for visitation with Jonathan. By order entered on September 22, 1987, the initial sixty-day assessment period was extended by agreement of all the parties. The September 22, 1987 order in effect extended the assessment period and Marilyn's visitation privileges for another year. During this time, Marilyn did not move for an improvement period.

Even after the extension, Marilyn did not request an improvement period. The record shows that Marilyn visited her son four times during the period from June to December, 1987, and had no contact after December, 1987, until the May 23, 1988 hearing.

According to Marilyn's testimony, she had been hitchhiking in New York, New Jersey, North Carolina, Virginia, Florida, Texas, New Mexico, and Arizona. During this time, she testified that she was doing psychical research. She stated that she had been "thinking ahead to this case" and had decided to do "a little bit of my own investigation" into the areas of extrasensory perception and clairvoyance. Marilyn stated that she thought she may have a "sixth or seventh sense," and she wanted to be tested for this before the May 23, 1988 hearing.

Marilyn also had, at best, a sporadic work history along with this itinerant lifestyle. She testified that she worked approximately four weeks from December 23, 1987, until May 23, 1988. Two of those weeks she worked in Virginia Beach, but she testified that she "just couldn't handle it anymore." Marilyn testified that she worked in a warehouse in Florida for two weeks and also "did some cleaning" to make "a few dollars here and there." Marilyn stated that she received "a lot of charity from friends."

Marilyn did request an improvement period on June 29, 1988. However, this request was made after the May 23, 1988 final hearing to terminate her parental rights and approximately fourteen months after the initial temporary custody order was entered. Under W.Va.Code, 49-6- 2(b) (1984), a request for an improvement period must be made "prior to final hearing." In view of this delay and of the failure to make a timely request, we find that the trial court did not err in refusing an improvement period.

III.

Marilyn also contends that the circuit court should not have terminated her parental rights since there was insufficient evidence of no reasonable likelihood that the conditions of neglect or abuse could be substantially corrected. We have acknowledged this principle in Syllabus Point 2 of In re R.J.M., supra :

> "Termination of parental rights, the most drastic remedy under the statutory provision covering the dispos ition of neglected children, W.Va.Code, 49-6-5 [1977] m ay be em ployed wit hout the use of intervening less restrictive alternatives when it is found that there is no reasonable > likelihood under W.Va.Code, 49-6-5(b) [1977] that conditions of neglect or abuse can be substantially corrected."

We find sufficient evidence to support the circuit court's finding that there was no reasonable likelihood that the conditions of neglect or abuse could be substantially corrected. William J. Fremouw, Ph.D., conducted a psychological examination of Marilyn. See footnote 6 Dr. Fremouw diagnosed Marilyn as suffering from schizophrenia. In his report, Dr. Fremouw observed that "[a]lthough [Marilyn] is not currently psychotic she has a condition which under stress will produce psychotic symptoms. Her suspicions would easily become fully developed delusions and could lead to more extreme behavior which could endanger herself or a child." Dr. Fremouw opined that Marilyn did not have the psychological stability to function as Jonathan's primary caretaker.

Additionally, the trial court had before it evidence showing Marilyn's failure to provide proper food and shelter for her son, her lack of concern for Jonathan's welfare by failing to visit him regularly, and her itinerant lifestyle. Accordingly, we find sufficient evidence to support the trial court's termination of her parental rights.

IV.

Marilyn next asserts that the trial court erred by allowing the testimony of the social worker from DHS on the ground that she did not have any personal knowledge of the case. Marilyn maintains that the social worker's testimony was hearsay under Rule 602, W.Va.R.Evid., which provides:

> "A witness may not testify to a ma tter unless evidence is introduced sufficient to support a finding that he has personal knowledge of the matter. Evidence to prove personal knowledge m ay, but need not, consist of the testimony of the witness him self. This rule is subject to the provisions of Rule 703 relating to opinion testimony by expert witnesses."

The social worker who testified on behalf of DHS in this case had observed visits between Marilyn and her son and had reviewed the records in the case. Moreover, the social worker was available for cross-examination. See footnote 7 Thus, we find no reversible error. See footnote 8

V.

For the above stated reasons, the judgm ent of the Circuit Court of Marion County is affirmed.

Affirmed.

Footnote: 2 The forthwith custody order was issued pursuant to W.Va.Code, 49-6-3 (1984), which provides, in pertinent part:
"Upon the filing of a petition, the court may order that a child alleged to be an abused or neglected child be delivered for not more than ten days into the custody of the state department or a responsible relative, pending a preliminary hearing, if it finds that: (1) there exists imminent danger to the physical well-being of the child, and (2) there are no reasonably available alternatives to removal of the child, including, but not limited to, the provision of medical, psychiatric, psychological or homemaking services in the child's present custody."

Footnote: 3 W.Va.Code, 49-1-3(e), provides:
" 'Imminent danger to the physical well-being of the child' means an emergency situation in which the welfare or the life of the child is threatened. Such emergency situation exists when there is reasonable cause to believe that any child in the home is or has been sexually abused or sexually exploited, or reasonable cause to believe that the following conditions threaten the health or life of any child in the home: (1) Nonaccidental trauma inflicted by a parent, guardian, custodian, sibling or a babysitter or other caretaker; or (2) A combination of physical and other signs indicating a pattern of abuse which may be medically diagnosed as battered child syndrome; or (3) Nutritional deprivation ; or (4) Abandonment by the parent, guardian, or custodian; or (5) Inadequate treatment of serious illness or disease; or (6) Substantial emotional injury inflicted by a parent, guardian or custodian." (Emphasis added).

Footnote: 4 The mother was from out of state, had no relatives in this state, and had been living in her car. She also testified that she and Jonathan had been abandoned by the child's natural father.

Footnote: 5 W.Va.Code, 49-6-2(b), provides:
"In any proceeding under this article, the parents or custodians may, prior to final hearing, move to be allowed an improvement period of three to twelve months in order to remedy the circumstances or alleged circumstances upon which the proceeding is based. The court shall allow one such improvement period unless it finds compelling circumstances to justify a denial thereof, but may require temporary custody in the state department or other agency during the improvement period. An order granting such improvement period shall require the department to prepare and submit to the court a family case plan in accordance with the provisions of section three [§ 49-6D-3], article six-D of this chapter."

Footnote: 6 Marilyn argues that Dr. Fremouw's testimony that her parental rights should be terminated was impermissible under Rule 704 of the West Virginia Rules of Evidence because such a statement is a legal opinion. Rule 704, W.Va.R.Evid., provides that: "Testimony in the form of an opinion or inference otherwise admissible is not objectionable solely because it embraces an ultimate issue to be decided by the trier of fact." See State v. Smith, 178 W.Va. 104, 107 n. 1, 358 S.E.2d 188, 191 n. 1 (1987). This proceeding was not tried before a jury. We have said that, in such an instance, even if the evidence was improper, it is not error for the court to hear it. This is based on the premise that the judge is fully competent to disregard inadmissible evidence. In re E.H., 166 W.Va. 615, 276 S.E.2d 557 (1981); Farley v. Farley, 136 W.Va. 598, 68 S.E.2d 353 (1951). In this proceeding, the trial judge indicated that he would make the ultimate decision as to the termination of Marilyn's rights notwithstanding Dr. Fremouw's conclusions.

Footnote: 7 These facts differ from those in In Interest of S.C., 168 W.Va. 366, 284 S.E.2d 867 (1981), where DHS chose not to introduce any testimony from the social workers who prepared the reports incorporated into the neglect petition. The mother in that case argued that DHS's decision not to call these social workers to testify or to offer their reports into evidence violated her statutory right to cross-examine witnesses. We held that there was no statutory requirement that DHS call any or all social workers involved in the case nor was DHS's decision not to call these witnesses a violation of the mother's statutory right to cross-examine witnesses.

Footnote: 8 Marilyn asserts that the court erred in allowing the former assistant prosecuting attorney to represent Jonathan as his guardian ad litem. There is nothing in the record that indicates the former assistant prosecuting attorney was in office or had anything to do with representing the State in the initial stages of this case. Nor is there any specific assertion of a conflict of interest or prejudice resulting from such representation, except the vague charge that the attorney had at one time handled neglect cases for DHS. We find no merit in this argument.

Harrisville, West Virginia
Guardian Ad Litem

Ernest M. Douglass, Esq. Joanna Bowles, Esq.
Douglass and Douglass Assistant Attorney General
Parkersburg, West Virginia Charleston, West Virginia
Attorney for the Appellant Attorney for the Appellee

Maynard, Justice:
This is an appeal by Glen A., Jr. from an order of the Circuit Court of Wood County, West Virginia, entered on May 21, 1996, denying the father an improvement period and continuing legal custody of Justin A. and Joseph (Joey) A. See footnote 1 in the Department of Health and Human Resources (DHHR) for placement in long-term foster care. Glen A. contends the trial court erred in: (1) finding abuse by clear and convincing evidence; (2) denying an improvement period; and (3) excluding Glen A. during the testimony of Justin A. at the adjudicatory hearing. We find no reversible error; therefore, the order of the Circuit Court of Wood County is affirmed.

Appellant, Glen A., a widower, is the father of Justin A. and Joey A. At the time the juvenile neglect petition was filed in January 1996, Justin was fourteen years old and Joey was eight years old. The appellant is also the father of two older children, Stacy and Scott, who have reached the age of majority and are emancipated.

According to the juvenile neglect petition, the appellant threw a glass ashtray at Joey on January 17, 1996, resulting in a one to one and one-half inch laceration on the back of Joey's head. At school, two days later, Joey was sent to the school nurse, Diane Fuchs, who testified at the adjudicatory hearing and described a gaping and deep laceration with dried blood that needed sutures. Since the family had no telephone, Ms. Fuchs took Joey home. She explained Joey's medical needs to the appellant, including the possibility of needing sutures. The appellant answered that his car had a flat tire, so Ms. Fuchs offered to take the appellant and Joey to the emergency room. The appellant declined the offer. It was obvious to Ms. Fuchs that the appellant was not going to take Joey to the emergency room, so she offered advice on how to care for the laceration in lieu of medical treatment. She told him to keep the area clean, shave around the cut, and pull it together with steri-strips to promote faster healing.

Ms. Fuchs testified the appellant explained Joey's injury by stating the child fell against a box in the bedroom. Without any accusation from Ms. Fuchs, the appellant defensively and emphatically denied playing any role in Joey's injury.

The appellant recalled the visit somewhat differently. He testified at the dispositional hearing that the nurse gave him the option of taking Joey to the hospital or treating the wound himself with steri-strips. He informed Ms. Fuchs he had some steri-strips. See footnote 2

The weekend passed, and on Monday, January 22, 1996, Joey had not yet received medical attention for the deep cut on his head. A family member took Joey to the DHHR and showed the laceration to Ms. Spiker, a Child Protective Service Worker with whom the family was already involved. Ms. Spiker later testified the laceration was matted with dried crusted blood and contained yellow areas suggesting that infection was present. She also testified Joey's hair did not appear to have been washed since the nurse's visit, three days earlier. See footnote 3

Ms. Spiker testified that she asked the family member to take Joey to the hospital while she and another social worker went to the appellant's home. When asked if he knew what had happened to Joey's head, the appellant told Ms. Spiker the child fell on a wooden box while playing in his bedroom. When asked why he had not followed Ms. Fuch's recommendations regarding treatment, the appellant answered "he didn't do anything to the laceration because he didn't want his neighbors to call the welfare on him." When Ms. Spiker informed the appellant that lack of medical attention could have caused medical problems for Joey, he again responded "he didn't want the welfare to be called on him." According to defense counsel, the appellant believed the referral in this case came about as a result of his having had an affair with his neighbor and his neighbor's husband had reported the abuse "to get back at him."

The referral regarding Joey and Justin also alleged the appellant owned a number of pornographic movies, which were easily accessible to his sons. When the appellant was questioned about having pornographic movies, he answered there were none in the home. Ms. Spiker opened the television stand, and the first three movies she removed were pornographic in nature. She recognized the movies as pornographic by the titles and by the accompanying filing cards which described the contents of the films. The movies were titled The First Nudie Musical, Hollywood Uncensored, and Slammer Girls. The appellant informed the social workers that Slammer Girls was an R rated prison movie, so Ms. Spiker insisted that they view a few moments of the movie. The social workers witnessed four to five women having sex with one another. Ms. Spiker found at least one tape which contained both children's cartoons and adult movies. When confronted with the fact that he had not been truthful about owning these movies, the appellant responded that his sons had been told they were not allowed to watch those movies. See footnote 4

The petition filed by Ms. Spiker additionally alleged that the appellant stored gunpowder in a can in the kitchen. The social worker noted during her testimony that the appellant had shown her the can with gunpowder in it, while Justin testified the gunpowder was kept in a cardboard peanuts can and stored in a cabinet by the refrigerator. He testified he and Joey had played with the gunpowder by taking it outside and lighting it.

The petition also stated the appellant kept a loaded pistol in a location which was accessible and known to the children. During Ms. Spiker's visit to the home, the appellant led her to his padlocked bedroom and showed her the gun. When asked if the gun was loaded, the appellant took the bullets from the gun and tossed both the gun and the bullets on the bed. Justin testified his dad told him he kept some guns in his bedroom, but Justin had never seen them. The appellant told Ms. Spiker the room was padlocked when the children were home alone, and they were not allowed in the room.

During Justin's testimony, he further testified that his father had mood swings and had threatened to kick him out of the house if he kept missing the bus after school and walking home. The petition alleged the appellant had threatened on numerous occasions to give Joey to the Department.

Justin was cross-examined regarding the events that happened the evening Joey was injured. Justin stated their father wanted to see what Joey had in his hands. Joey showed him the hand in which he was holding a piece of metal, but not the hand in which he was holding a screwdriver. Justin then heard the ashtray hit Joey, who started crying. Justin was asked by the appellant's counsel if the ashtray was thrown "overhand, underhand, side-armed." He answered he was not watching when his father threw the ashtray because he was watching television. He did not see it strike his brother except out of the corner of his eye. He testified this was not the first time the appellant had thrown the ashtray at Joey.

The DHHR traced the history this family has had with the department, beginning in May 1989, shortly after the death of the children's mother in November 1988. The report prepared by Child Protective Service Worker, Joan George, states that initially Justin exhibited behavioral and hygiene problems and concerns were raised regarding fifteen-month old Joey because there was no running water in the home. The appellant was provided services regarding budgeting and was taught to utilize community resources. Justin was provided counseling regarding his mother's death. In October 1989 social services were discontinued.

In March 1991 the DHHR substantiated allegations of neglect and emotional abuse. Stacy, only sixteen years old at the time, was caring for both her siblings and was maintaining the house. Stacy was having suicidal thoughts and was afraid her father would kill her. Counseling was initiated. A social worker assisted the appellant by offering parenting skills education along with problem solving and discipline techniques. These services were being provided when Stacy disclosed in April 1992 that the appellant had sexually abused her.

Pursuant to the filing of a petition, the three children were adjudicated to be abused and neglected, and the appellant was charged with criminal sexual abuse. The appellant was acquitted of the criminal charges in March 1993. The court granted a post-adjudicatory improvement period beginning April 15, 1993. In August 1994 Stacy was eighteen years old and emancipated. At that time, the boys were returned to the appellant's home. Action Youth Care provided reunification services, which were closed in June 1995, when it was believed that all possible progress with the appellant had been made.

The DHHR next received a referral regarding the physical abuse of Joey in December 1995. Joey denied the abuse and there was no apparent physical evidence of abuse. Then, in January 1996 the incident involving the cut on the back of Joey's head precipitated the filing of the instant petition.

The trial court held an adjudicatory hearing on March 29, 1996. The court adjudicated the children to have been abused. A dispositional hearing was held on May 16, 1996. In its final order, the court denied the appellant's motion for an improvement period and placed the children in long-term foster care. It is from this order that the appellant appeals.

On appeal, the appellant contends the evidence in this case is legally insufficient to find abuse by clear and convincing evidence. He argues the evidence is insufficient because Justin did not actually see him throw the ashtray, and no medical testimony was presented to invalidate the appellant's explanation that Joey fell against a box. He also argues no evidence was presented to verify that the school nurse's suggested treatment was necessary or that Joey's well-being was harmed by the lack of medical care. The appellant further contends that no expert testimony was presented which showed that the children's exposure to pornography harmed their safety and well being. The DHHR argues the court properly found a long and substantial history of abuse and neglect by the appellant.

In Syllabus Point 1 of West Virginia Department of Health and Human Resources ex rel. Wright v. Brenda C., 197 W.Va. 468, 475 S.E.2d 560 (1996), we said:

> """W.Va. Code, 49-6-2(c)[1980], requires the State Department of Welfare [now the Department of Human Services], in a child abuse or neglect case, to prove 'conditions existing at the time of the filing of the petition...by clear and convincing proof.' The statute, however, does not specify any particular manner or mode of testimony or > evidence by which the State Department of Welfare is obligated to meet this burden." Syllabus Point 1, In Interest of S.C., 168 W.Va. 366, 284 S.E.2d 867 (1981).' Syllabus Point 1, West Virginia Department of Human Services v. Peggy F., 184 W.Va. 60, 399 S.E.2d 460 (1990)." Syllabus Point 1, In re Beth, 192 W.Va. 656, 453 S.E.2d 639 (1994). Syl. Pt. 3, In re Christina L., 194 W.Va. 446, 460 S.E.2d 692 (1995).

Although W.Va. Code 49-6-2(c) was amended by the West Virginia Legislature in 1996 and the Department of Human Services is now known as the Department of Health and Human Resources, these changes do not alter the fundamental holding that proof of abuse and neglect must be by clear and convincing evidence. Here, not only was evidence presented that the appellant seriously injured his son, Joey, but he then forced Joey to wipe up his own blood. He clearly refused to give or to allow Joey to receive any medical attention with the excuse that he did not want the welfare department to be called.

Appellant criticizes the DHHR for not presenting testimony by a psychologist that the children were harmed by viewing pornographic movies. He claims he did not encourage the children to watch the videos and they did not watch the movies with him or with his knowledge. We do not believe it is necessary for the trial court to require the DHHR to present the testimony of an expert in order to conclude that watching pornography has harmful effects upon minor children. See footnote 5 Given the long history of this family and the more recent events involving Joey's serious head injury, the lack of needed medical care, the presence of gun powder in the home, and keeping and allowing the children to have access to pornographic videos in the home, we believe the trial court properly found that this appalling misconduct constituted clear and convincing proof of abuse and neglect.

The appellant next contends the trial court erred in denying his motion for an improvement period. Even though the appellant acknowledges the court may deny parents an improvement period if compelling circumstances justify denial, he argues that since he achieved reunification once before, there is no reason to believe he could not do so again. The appellant admits his temper is not under control, but seems to argue the DHHR should offer him counseling. The guardian ad litem stated the appellant was given in excess of three years to improve the situation in which he was raising these two boys, but failed to make substantial improvements.

The DHHR asserts the lower court properly denied an improvement period because of the appellant's history during the previous abuse and neglect proceeding. The department also maintains that the appellant continues to exhibit behavior that is in sharp contrast to the internalization of proper parenting skills and argues the lower court did not err in failing to grant a post-adjudicatory improvement period on the basis that reunification was previously achieved.

After Justin and Joey were adjudicated to be abused and neglected, the court held a dispositional hearing where counsel for the children offered his opinion, by stating, Your Honor, I've discussed these matters with Justin, who's the oldest (sic) of the two boys, and it's my opinion that Mr. A. does, in fact, throw things at the boys and he did inflict this injury upon Joseph, as Justin testified to at the adjudicatory hearing, and I do not believe that there's any reason to grant him an additional improvement period, don't believe it would be beneficial. The boys don't have any interest in visiting their father, let alone living with him.

In his argument to the court at the dispositional hearing, appellant's counsel stated, "I don't believe that this incident was so serious that it would constitute a compelling reason to deny the improvement period." The court pointed to behavior of the appellant which transcended the thrown ashtray, the child's injury, and the failure to seek or provide medical treatment. The court described as "pretty significant" the content of some letters the appellant wrote to his older son, Scott. The court stated:

> What nobody's mentioned, of course, is one thing I think is pretty significant, is these letters which he wrote to his children. Even though Mr. A. says he didn't mean what they clearly say, I don't see how you can read them any other way than being some kind of a veiled threat. And they clearly state that the reason he wants them back is because he needs the money that the State would pay him for having his children to be able to pay his own rent....

These letters are a clear threat to do something, something pretty bad obviously. He said, "I will have to turn from Doctor Jekyll to Mr. Hyde. All I want is for you to come home and sit down like a man and talk to me face to face. That's all I'm asking. What I am thinkin I will do --" underscored "-- as long as I have the kids back before the 29th of this month I will not do --" I will not do, and it's underscored "-- what I already will do or thinking about. It's all up to you, Scott." He even give a deadline. "You only have until this weekend --" and he underscores that "-- for me not to do it."

And he says, " If you don't come this weekend, expect me to do something. I will have to turn from Doctor Jekyll to Mr. Hyde." There's no other way to read that than a threat to do something outrageous, because Mr. Hyde was certainly an outrageous person, he did outrageous things, and this is what he's threatening to do. Nothing specific, but something outrageous.

And he says, "This is your last warning." A warning. "I hope you don't upset me by not showing up or not calling. This will be my last letter to you until I see you or see or hear from you, and if you don't think I have something to work by that, you'd better be prepared for the worst."

I don't see any reason to grant this man another improvement period. He's had one before. He went through the motions and apparently pulled the wool over the eyes of the department and they put the children back in his care, which was probably a mistake, but, you know, everybody's human and makes mistakes. The fact the department put them back with him and thought he had completed the improvement period satisfactorily doesn't mean that he did. And then this other abuse took place. It clearly was abuse. And these letters are very revealing of the character of Mr. A.

I'm not going to grant him an improvement period. I'm going to follow the recommendation of the department and the recommendation of Counsel for the children and put these children in long-term foster care under the jurisdiction of the department. That's all.

During the pendency of this action, W.Va. Code 49-6-2(b) (1992), stated in pertinent part:

> In any proceeding under this article, any parent or custodian may, prior to final hearing, move to be allowed an improvement period of three to twelve months in order to remedy the circumstances or alleged circumstances upon which the proceeding is based. The court shall allow one such improvement period unless it finds compelling circumstances to justify a denial thereof[.] See footnote 6

This statute does not automatically require that a parent be granted an improvement period. In Syllabus Point 2 of the Matter of Jonathan P., 182 W.Va. 302, 387 S.E.2d 537 (1989), this Court said, "'W.Va. Code, 49-6-2(b) (1984), permits a parent to move the court for an improvement period which shall be allowed unless the court finds compelling circumstances to justify a denial.' Syllabus Point 2, State ex rel. W.Va. Dep't of Human Services v. Cheryl M., [177] W.Va. [688], 356 S.E.2d 181 (1987)." We reiterated in In re Lacey P., 189 W.Va. 580, 433 S.E.2d 518 (1993), that there is no absolute right to an improvement period in this State.

In State ex rel. West Virginia Department of Human Services v. Cheryl M., 177 W.Va. 688, 356 S.E.2d 181 (1987), the trial court did not grant an improvement to Cheryl M. As a result, the Department of Human Services (DHS) did not present a family case plan to the court. The DHS took the position from the beginning of their involvement with Cheryl M., prior to any parenting assistance being offered, that her parental rights should be terminated. This Court found the DHS had provided little relevant assistance and had made no good faith effort toward developing a rehabilitative plan. A counselor with the local mental health agency testified that Cheryl M. cooperated during counseling sessions on parenting skills and progressed in her skill level. The counselor testified that it was her opinion that there was no imminent danger in reunifying Cheryl M. with her child. This Court concluded that under these circumstances the mother was entitled to a meaningful improvement period to demonstrate her ability to care for her child.

Obviously, the facts in the case at bar are very different. Apart from the abuse and neglect discussed above, the appellant did not successfully complete the tasks enumerated in the family case plan that was submitted when he was granted a prior improvement period. There is no evidence in the record nor was any testimony presented to establish the appellant's attendance at weekly therapy sessions or participation in a substance abuse assessment. The appellant was provided with reunification and family preservation services as well as individual social worker counseling and education, group education and support, in-home modeling of appropriate parenting behavior, individual therapy and psychological services, and intensive family education. Yet, all of these services failed to prevent the incidents which gave rise to these proceedings. There is also evidence Justin and Joey were deliberately socially isolated from outside influences and peer relationships, possibly to protect family secrets of abuse. Therefore, we cannot say the trial court in this case improperly found compelling circumstances existed that justified denying an improvement period.

After being removed from the home, the children had three supervised visits with their father. Ms. George concluded after the third visit:

> Each of these visits with Mr. A. was emotionally stressful and of no benefit to the children. Justin has stated that he has no particular interest in visiting his father. Joey has been disappointed and hurt with each contact. In consideration of the affect (sic) visits with Mr. A. have had on these children, visits are arranged only upon request from the children.

Evidence was also presented that there was no indication the children lived in their father's trailer; the toys and the children's clothes had been locked away in an "irrational attempt to disguise a rather sadistic ploy to control[.]" Apparently no further visits were requested, because the appellant testified that he had visited with his sons on three occasions since their removal. In view of the circumstances listed above, we find the trial court did not err in refusing to grant to this appellant a second improvement period.

On appeal, the appellant also alleges the trial court erred in excluding him from the in camera adjudicatory hearing when his son, Justin, testified. The DHHR requested that Justin be permitted to testify out of the presence of his father. The court granted the motion, and the appellant appeared to acquiescence and only asked if he could use the restroom. However, appellant's counsel "object[ed] to the procedure, just for the record." There was no request for appellant's counsel to leave the room. Appellant's counsel was present during all of Justin's testimony and was afforded the opportunity to fully cross- examine Justin. In fact, the attorney exercised this opportunity and did indeed fully and completely cross-examine Justin.

W.Va. Code 49-6-2(c)(1996), is controlling on this issue and states in pertinent part:

> In any proceeding pursuant to the provisions of this article, the party or parties having custodial or other parental rights or responsibilities to the child shall be afforded a meaningful opportunity to be heard, including the opportunity to testify and to present and cross-examine witnesses.

The requirement of cross-examination was satisfied by the presence of the appellant's counsel and the meaningful cross-examination which ensued after Justin was questioned by the DHHR. The approach used here is permissible under the new Rules of Procedure for Child Abuse and Neglect Proceedings, which were not yet in effect when this case was tried, but which this Court approved on December 5, 1996. Rule 8(b) See footnote 7 controls the procedure for taking testimony from children in abuse and neglect proceedings in future cases. The result we reach today would be reached under the new rules; thus, we find no reversible error.

Lastly, the appellant argues the permanency plan, also called the child's case plan or the family case plan, is inadequate because the plan fails to state how or when a permanent home will be achieved for these children. The DHHR states the case plan is adequate in that permanency has not yet been determined and the plan specifically addresses the long-term foster care in which the children currently are placed.

W.Va. Code 49-6-5(a)(1996), states in pertinent part,

> The term permanency plan refers to that part of the case plan which is designed to achieve a permanent home for the child in the lease restrictive setting available....If reunification is not the permanency plan for the child, the plan must state why reunification is not > appropriate and detail the alternative placement for the child to include approximate time lines for when such placement is expected to become a permanent placement.

At the time of the writing of the children's case plan on May 13, 1996, Justin and Joey were living with their sister, Stacy, and her family. The plan recites the inadequacy of the placement as a long-term arrangement. However, the plan also addresses the alternative placement of the children by noting that "long term foster care with optimal contact between these siblings will be in the best interest of all family members." The plan goes on to state "[l]ong term foster care with a permanent placement commitment from a foster family is the permanency plan ... in the event custody remains with the Department." The department reports the children are no longer living with their sister, who is now married with two children of her own, but have been placed together in a foster home with the anticipation that the foster parents will welcome Justin and Joey as permanent placements.

The plan specifically states in detail why reunification with the appellant is not appropriate, most notably the appellant's failure to maintain any gains in coping skills or in his beliefs and attitudes about parenting during the three years he was given to improve. When we look at the facts of this case and the procedural status of this action at the time the permanency plan was written, we believe placement with a family member and later in a foster home by long-term foster care is the least restrictive alternative available. Given that custody and permanency still remain unresolved at this time, we cannot say the plan is inadequate.

For the above stated reasons, the judgment of the Circuit Court of Wood County is affirmed.

Affirmed.

Footnote: 3 During a prior abuse and neglect proceeding, the appellant had been granted a post-adjudicatory improvement period. At that time, Christine Spiker, a Child Protective Service worker, became involved with the family. She worked with the appellant for approximately one and one-half to two years as overseer of the improvement period.

Footnote: 4 Justin testified during the adjudicatory hearing that his father kept adult movies in their home:

Q Does your dad keep dirty movies in the house?
A Yeah, he has a couple.
Q Have you seen some of those movies yourself?
A A couple of them.
Q Does he keep them in a place that you have access to; I mean, can you get them pretty easy if you want to see them.
A Yeah, most of them.
5. In her report to the court, Joan George, a Child Protective Service Worker, wrote to the trial judge:

In the Department's five years of service to this family Mr. A. has consistently maintained a very closed family system. Mr. A. expected all the needs of the individuals to be met by the family. Influence from outside the family was not desirable. The children were restricted from developing peer relationships, confined to the home and socially isolated in part to protect family secrets of abuse. This manner of relating remains unchanged.

It is difficult to know to what degree the children are abused and neglected in this system of rigid control where secrecy is valued above all else. We have known, however, since 1992, with Stacey's disclosure, that she was being sexually abused from at least as far back as 1989. We also know, that there have been numerous incidents of unreported physical abuse to Justin and Joey. Sexually explicit videos remain in the home, easily accessible to these children. Exposure to adult sexual activities can have far reaching effects on the personality and behavior of child victims. To assume that Justin and Joey because of their gender, are not at risk of sexual abuse may be at their peril. It is obvious from their history that neither would be readily able to protect themselves by requesting help with a secret of such magnitude.

Mr. A. has continued to deny any abusive behavior towards his children, while presenting a very descriptive scenario of events in stark contrast to reality. Additionally, Mr. A. has written several letters to his son, Scott A., attempting to bribe, intimidate, and threaten him into lying about the abuse so he, Mr. A., could have his children returned and be eligible for AFDC.

Footnote: 6 This Code section was amended by the West Virginia Legislature in 1996.

Footnote: 7 Rule 8(b) of the Rules of Procedure for Child Abuse and Neglect Proceedings states:
(b) Procedure for taking testimony from children. The presiding judicial officer may conduct in camera interviews of a minor child, outside the presence of the parent(s). The parties' attorneys shall be allowed to attend such interviews, except when the presiding judicial officer determines that the presence of attorneys will be especially intimidating to the child witness. When attorneys are not allowed to be present for in camera interviews of a child, the presiding judicial officer shall, unless otherwise agreed by the parties, have the interview electronically or stenographically recorded and make the recording available to the attorneys before the evidentiary hearing resumes. Under exceptional circumstances, the presiding judicial officer may elect not to make the recording available to the attorneys but must place the basis for a finding of exceptional circumstances on the record. Under these exceptional circumstances, the recording only will be available for review by the Supreme Court of Appeals. When attorneys are present for an in camera interview of a child, the presiding judicial officer may, before the interview, require the attorneys to submit questions for the presiding judicial officer to ask the child witness rather than allow the attorneys to question the child directly, and the presiding judicial officer may require the attorney to sit in an unobtrusive manner during the in camera interview.

Per Curiam:

The appellant herein, the West Virginia Department of Health and Human Resources [hereinafter referred to as "DHHR"], appeals from an order entered April 29, 2002, by the Circuit Court of Harrison County. In that order, the circuit court ruled that DHHR was obligated to pay the appellee herein, Stepping Stone, Inc. [hereinafter referred to as "Stepping Stone"], a per diem rate for Joseph G.'s care equal to the amount to which Stepping Stone would have been entitled under Medicaid. On appeal to this Court, DHHR disputes that it is obligated to pay these monies to Stepping Stone. Upon a review of the parties' arguments, the pertinent authorities, and the record designated for appellate consideration, we affirm the decision of the Harrison County Circuit Court.

I.

FACTUAL AND PROCEDURAL HISTORY

In February, 1992, DHHR assumed custody of Joseph G. as a result of an abuse and neglect proceeding. After numerous unsuccessful placements, and in light of his various behavioral problems, Joseph was housed at Stepping Stone, a nonprofit corporation which operates a nine-bed child care residential facility, on June 29, 1999. Since his placement at this facility, Joseph has progressed remarkably, no longer exhibits behavioral problems, and does well in school. In light of the success of this placement,

Joseph's multidisciplinary team[1] recommended that his permanency plan should continue his placement at Stepping Stone until such time as he would be eligible to enter an independent (transitional) living program[2] at the end of the 2001-2002 school year, i.e., May 28, 2002. During his placement at Stepping Stone, DHHR and Stepping Stone had a contractual arrangement whereby DHHR paid a per diem fee for Joseph's room, board, care, and supervision.[3] Additionally, because Stepping Stone provides certain medical services to its residents, it generally is entitled to an additional Medicaid rate per client per

[1]Multidisciplinary teams "assist courts in facilitating permanency planning, following the initiation of judicial proceedings, to recommend alternatives and to coordinate evaluations and in-community services." W. Va. Code § 49-5D-1(a) (1998) (Repl. Vol. 2001). Typically, a multidisciplinary treatment team is comprised of > the child's custodial parent or parents, guardian or guardians, other immediate family members, the attorney or attorneys representing the parent or parents of the child, the guardian ad litem, if any, the prosecuting attorney or his or her designee and any other person or an agency representative who may assist in providing recommendations for the particular needs of the child and family. The child may participate in multidisciplinary treatment team meetings if such is deemed appropriate by the multidisciplinary treatment team.

W. Va. Code § 49-5D-3(b) (2003) (Supp. 2003).

[2]Typically, state and federal guidelines require a juvenile to be seventeen years old before he/she may enter an independent living arrangement. Joseph turned seventeen on May 16, 2002.

[3]This rate is approximately $92.78 per day and is paid by the Office of Social Services [hereinafter referred to as "OSS"].

day.[4] The specific time period during which Stepping Stone is entitled to receive these Medicaid monies for Joseph's care is the source of the present controversy.

Pursuant to a scheduled review of juveniles within DHHR's custody and the Medicaid services they were receiving, an Administrative Services Organization[5] [hereinafter referred to as "ASO"] determined, in January, 2002, that Joseph no longer required the services of Stepping Stone and, thus, that he was no longer entitled to the same. Moreover, the ASO made this determination retroactive finding that Joseph's Medicaid eligibility for said services had ceased on November 1, 2001. In order to permit Joseph to nevertheless remain at Stepping Stone, his counsel moved the court, in February, 2002, for an order to that effect. Ultimately, DHHR, Stepping Stone, and Joseph's counsel acquiesced to an agreed order whereby DHHR would waive the independent living age requirement and expedite efforts to place him in such a setting; in the meantime, Joseph would remain at Stepping Stone. Because Joseph was not entitled to Stepping Stone's Medicaid services, however, the instant controversy ensued as to whether Stepping Stone could nonetheless recover such Medicaid monies from DHHR for the period from [4]This amount is approximately $38.18 per day and is paid by the Bureau for Medical Services [hereinafter referred to as "Medicaid"].

[5]DHHR represents that the function of an Administrative Service Organization, or ASO, "is to review and ensure that appropriate services are being utilized [by] Medicaid clients. The ASO in advance must approve and authorize continued treatment by a facility to [permit it to] be compensated."

November 1, 2001, until his discharge from Stepping Stone on April 17, 2002.[6]

On November 1, 1998, DHHR and Stepping Stone entered into a Child Care Agreement [hereinafter referred to as "Agreement I"]. Pertinent to the instant controversy, this contract provided that "the Office of Social Services shall pay the treatment rate established by the Office of Audits, Research, and Analysis for those youth for whom treatment was provided but which cannot be billed to Medicaid because [the] child was not eligible for the service under Medicaid regulations." Agreement I, at Article XV. Agreement I remained in force and effect through December 31, 2001. In light of the above-quoted language, DHHR concedes that it is obligated to pay the Medicaid monies to Stepping Stone for the contract period Joseph was housed at Stepping Stone but was not eligible for Medicaid services, i.e., November 1, 2001, through December 31, 2001, which sum is approximately $2,328.98.[7] [6]Following his discharge and placement in an independent transitional living program, Joseph reverted back to the behavioral and social problems he exhibited prior to his initial admission to Stepping Stone. Consequently, Joseph was determined to once again be medically eligible for the Medicaid services Stepping Stone provides; his independent living program was terminated; and he was re-admitted to Stepping Stone in order to receive such services. Joseph's current permanency plan envisions that he will remain at Stepping Stone until six months after his eighteenth birthday, which was on May 16, 2003. Payment for this period of Joseph's residency at Stepping Stone is not disputed and is not at issue in the present appeal.

[7]The sum of $2,328.98, for which DHHR accepts responsibility under Agreement I, represents the cost of the Medicaid services Joseph received at Stepping Stone from November 1, 2001, until December 31, 2001, when Agreement I ended.

Thereafter, DHHR and Stepping Stone entered into a Group Residential Provider Agreement [hereinafter referred to as "Agreement II"], which replaced Agreement I, and remained in force and effect from January 1, 2002, through December 31, 2002. Unlike the parties' prior Agreement I, Agreement II does not contain any language to indicate who is responsible for the payment of Medicaid monies if a Stepping Stone resident is deemed to be ineligible for such services. Therefore, the parties disagree as to who is liable for such Medicaid payments for Joseph's residence at Stepping Stone from January 1, 2002, until his discharge on April 17, 2002. At the per diem Medicaid rate of $38.18, the total amount in controversy is approximately $4,085.26.[8]

By order entered April 29, 2002, the Circuit Court of Harrison County determined DHHR to be liable to Stepping Stone for the theretofore unreimbursed Medicaid monies for Joseph's residence at that facility:

> The Court . . . finds that based upon the intent of the parties, as evidenced by other contractual terms, Stepping Stone was no longer obligated to keep Joseph at its facility, absent a court order, once Joseph failed to meet the target population admission criteria and the ASO determined that treatment provided by Stepping Stone was no longer medically necessary.
> The Court further finds that although Joseph no longer met the target population admission criteria and treatment provided by [8]The sum of $4,085.26, the payment of which is in controversy in this case, represents the cost of the Medicaid services Joseph received at Stepping Stone from January 1, 2002, until his discharge from Stepping Stone on April 17, 2002.

> The Court further finds that Stepping Stone had the right to condition Joseph's continued placement at its facility upon payment by the Department because, under the Current Agreement [Agreement II], Stepping Stone was not required to keep Joseph at its facility once he failed to meet the target population admission criteria and treatment was deemed no longer medically necessary.

From this ruling of the circuit court, DHHR appeals to this Court.

STANDARD OF REVIEW

The sole issue presented by the instant appeal requires us to interpret the contract entered into by DHHR and Stepping Stone. We previously have held that "'[i]t is the province of the Court, and not of the jury, to interpret a written contract.' Syl. Pt. 1, Stephens v. Bartlett, 118 W. Va. 421, 191 S.E. 550 (1937)." Syl. pt. 1, Orteza v. Monongalia County Gen. Hosp., 173 W. Va. 461, 318 S.E.2d 40 (1984). This is so because "the determination of what constitutes a contract under our relevant cases is a question of law. . . ." Williams v. Precision Coil, Inc., 194 W. Va. 52, 62 n.18, 459 S.E.2d 329, 339 n.18 (1995). Accord Syl. pt. 1, in part, Berkeley County Pub. Serv. Dist. v. Vitro Corp. of America, 152 W. Va. 252, 162 S.E.2d 189 (1968) ("The question as to whether a contract is ambiguous is a question of law to be determined by the court."). Accordingly,

"[w]hether a contract is ambiguous is a legal question reviewable by this Court de novo." Williams, 194 W. Va. at 65 n.23, 459 S.E.2d at 342 n.23 (citation omitted). See also id., 194 W. Va. at 62 n.18, 459 S.E.2d at 339 n.18 ("[I]n interpreting a contract, a court determines the existence of an ambiguity as a matter of law." (internal quotations and citations omitted)). Mindful of this standard, we proceed to consider the parties' arguments.

III.

DISCUSSION

On appeal to this Court, we are asked to interpret the contractual agreement entered into by DHHR and Stepping Stone to determine whether DHHR is obligated to pay a per diem rate for Joseph's care equivalent to the amount to which Stepping Stone would have been entitled had Joseph been Medicaid eligible to receive Stepping Stone's services.

In support of its assignment of error, DHHR contends that the language of Agreement II is plain and easily resolves the instant controversy. Unlike Agreement I, Agreement II is silent as to who is responsible for the payment of Medicaid monies once a resident child is no longer eligible for said Medicaid services. Because Agreement II further states that it "contains all the terms and provisions relating to the subject matter hereof and there are no other understandings, oral or otherwise," Agreement II, at Article XIV, § 4, DHHR asserts that the circuit court should have applied, rather than construed, the parties' contract. Citing Syl. pt. 1, Cotiga Dev. Co. v. United Fuel Gas Co., 147 W. Va. 484, 128 S.E.2d 626 (1962) ("A valid written instrument which expresses the intent of the parties in plain and unambiguous language is not subject to judicial construction or interpretation but will be applied and enforced according to such intent.").

Stepping Stone responds by stating that the circuit court correctly determined DHHR to be responsible for the Medicaid monies at issue herein. Under the terms of Agreement II, the prior provisions of Agreement I were revised in order to prevent a situation such as the one at issue here by permitting Stepping Stone to accept only those youth who are medically eligible for the Medicaid services it provides. Because Agreement II does not resolve the situation at hand, where a resident is deemed to be medically ineligible for Medicaid services but nevertheless continues to be housed at Stepping Stone, Stepping Stone urges the Court to look outside the parameters of the contract in order to resolve this dispute. Citing Syl. pt. 2, in part, Berkeley County Pub. Serv. Dist. v. Vitro Corp. of America, 152 W. Va. 252, 162 S.E.2d 189 (1968) ("Extrinsic evidence may be used to aid in the construction of a contract if the matter in controversy is not clearly expressed in the contract, and in such case the intention of the parties is always important[.]"). In this regard, Stepping Stone contends that this Court should be instructed by the terms of Agreement I in resolving this dispute as Joseph was admitted to Stepping Stone under those terms.

The sole issue presented by the instant appeal requires us to determine whether the parties' contractual agreement required DHHR to pay Stepping Stone the monies to which it claims to be entitled. Ordinarily, "[a] valid written instrument which expresses the intent of the parties in plain and unambiguous language is not subject to judicial construction or interpretation but will be applied and enforced according to such intent." Syl. pt. 1, Cotiga Dev. Co. v. United Fuel Gas Co., 147 W. Va. 484, 128 S.E.2d 626 (1962). However, "[t]he mere fact that parties do not agree to the construction of a contract does not render it ambiguous. The question as to whether a contract is ambiguous is a question of law to be determined by the court." Syl. pt. 1, Berkeley County Pub. Serv. Dist. v. Vitro Corp. of America, 152 W. Va. 252, 162 S.E.2d 189 (1968).

In making such a determination of contractual ambiguity, we consider whether the subject contract is capable of more than one interpretation. Thus, "[c]ontract language is considered ambiguous where an agreement's terms are inconsistent on their face or where the phraseology can support reasonable differences of opinion as to the meaning of words employed and obligations undertaken." Syl. pt. 6, State ex rel. Frazier & Oxley, L.C. v. Cummings, 212 W. Va. 275, 569 S.E.2d 796 (2002). Once we have determined a contract to be ambiguous, we look to the parties' relationship to glean the parties' intent in entering into the agreement under scrutiny. "Evidence of usage or custom may be considered in the construction of language of a written instrument which is uncertain or ambiguous but may not be considered to alter the legal effect of or to engraft stipulations upon language which is clear and unambiguous." Syl. pt. 5, Cotiga, 147 W. Va. 484, 128 S.E.2d 626.

Having reviewed the contract in question, we find it to be ambiguous insofar as it does not clearly indicate which party is responsible for payment of the Medicaid funds to which Stepping Stone would have been entitled had Joseph been eligible for such services from January 1, 2002, until April 17, 2002. Given the parties' prior dealings under Agreement I, DHHR clearly would have been required to reimburse Stepping Stone.[9] Upon execution of Agreement II, however, the parties attempted to prevent the present scenario by specifically providing that "[y]outh admitted to group residential program(s) shall meet the targeted population admission criteria for the level of treatment offered by Provider as established by the Bureau for Medical Services." Agreement II, at Article I, § 3.06. Thus, Agreement II does not contemplate a situation such as the one presented herein because every child housed at Stepping Stone would first have to have been certified as medically eligible to receive the facility's services.

Despite this strategic wording, the fact nevertheless remains that a non-medically eligible child, namely Joseph, was, in fact, housed at Stepping Stone while Agreement II was in force and effect. That said, some party is responsible either for paying for the Medicaid services Joseph received while in residence at Stepping Stone or for absorbing such costs. We find, based upon the parties' prior agreement addressing similar situations, that DHHR is the party responsible for such costs. To find otherwise would, in short, be unjust and inequitable, particularly when, under the parties' second agreement, Stepping Stone was prohibited from discharging Joseph because no other placement plan had been devised, much less implemented, for him. See Agreement II, at Article I, § 5.01 ("Provider shall not discharge a youth meeting targeted population criteria without an appropriate plan and living arrangement agreed upon by the child's MDT except in the event of court ordered discharges and as allowed in Section XIII.3.03(1-4)."). Accordingly, we affirm the circuit court's ruling imposing such liability upon the West Virginia Department of Health and Human Resources.

IV.

CONCLUSION

For the foregoing reasons, the April 29, 2002, order of the Circuit Court of Harrison County is hereby affirmed.

SYLLABUS BY THE COURT

1. "Although conclusions of law reached by a circuit court are subject to de novo review, when an action, such as an abuse and neglect case, is tried upon the facts without a jury, the circuit court shall make a determination based upon the evidence and shall make findings of fact and conclusions of law as to whether such child is abused or neglected. These findings shall not be set aside by a reviewing court unless clearly erroneous. A finding is clearly erroneous when, although there is evidence to support the finding, the reviewing court on the entire evidence is left with the definite and firm conviction that a mistake has been committed. However, a reviewing court may not overturn a finding simply because it would have decided the case differently, and it must affirm a finding if the circuit court's account of the evidence is plausible in light of the record viewed in its entirety." Syllabus point 1, In the Interest of: Tiffany Marie S., 196 W. Va. 223, 470 S.E.2d 177 (1996).

2. In making a determination of whether a child is an abused and/or neglected child as defined in W. Va. Code § 49-1-3 (1994) (Repl. Vol. 1996), a court must consider evidence of a parent's progress, or lack thereof, during the pre-adjudication improvement period. However, pursuant to W. Va. Code § 49-6-2(c) (1996) (Repl. Vol. 1996), such evidence is proper only if it relates back to conditions that existed at the time of the filing of the abuse and/or neglect petition, and that were alleged in such petition.

Evidence regarding a parent's pre-adjudication improvement period may not be used to informally amend a previously-filed petition. The proper method of presenting new allegations to the circuit court is by requesting permission to file an amended petition pursuant to Rule 19 of the West Virginia Rules of Procedure for Child Abuse and Neglect Proceedings.

3. """W. Va. Code, 49-6-2(c) [1980], requires the State Department of Welfare [now the Department of Health and Human Resources], in a child abuse or neglect case, to prove "conditions existing at the time of the filing of the petition . . . by clear and convincing proof." The statute, however, does not specify any particular manner or mode of testimony or evidence by which the State Department of Welfare is obligated to meet this burden.' Syllabus Point 1, In Interest of S.C., 168 W. Va. 366, 284 S.E.2d 867 (1981)." Syllabus Point 1, West Virginia Department of Human Services v. Peggy F., 184 W. Va. 60, 399 S.E.2d 460 (1990).' Syllabus Point 1, In re Beth, 192 W. Va. 656, 453 S.E.2d 639 (1994)." Syllabus Point 3, In re Christina L., 194 W. Va. 446, 460 S.E.2d 692 (1995).

4. Under Rule 19 of the West Virginia Rules of Procedure for Child Abuse and Neglect Proceedings, amendments to an abuse/neglect petition may be allowed at any time before the final adjudicatory hearing begins. When modification of an abuse/neglect petition is sought, the circuit court should grant such petition absent a showing that the adverse party will not be permitted sufficient time to respond to the amendment, consistent with the intent underlying Rule 19 to permit liberal amendment of abuse/neglect petitions.

Davis, Justice:

In this child abuse and neglect action, Emily G., See footnote 1 an infant, through her Guardian ad Litem, appeals an order of the Circuit Court of Hancock County finding that she was not a neglected child as defined in West Virginia Code § 49-1-3(g)(1)(A). We find that the circuit court failed to consider relevant evidence developed during Emily's mother's improvement period. Thus, its conclusion that Emily G. was not a neglected child was clearly erroneous.

I. FACTUAL AND PROCEDURAL HISTORY

In March of 1995, the West Virginia Department of Health and Human Resources [hereinafter "DHHR"] received a call from an individual expressing concern that Julie G. was neglecting her then fourteen-month-old daughter Emily G. The caller informed DHHR that Julie's parental rights to her two other children had been terminated by the State of Ohio, and that John F., Emily's father, had a serious criminal record and presented a potential risk of harm to the child.

Subsequent to this call, two DHHR protective service workers visited Julie at her mobile home on the afternoon of March 22, 1995. They found the home to be in a deplorable condition. It was dirty, had a foul odor and was cluttered. The only source of heat was a kerosene heater that was sitting precariously on top of a dresser in the bedroom. The kerosene heater was surrounded by papers, clothing and other flammable materials. The home had no running water, and the cooking stove did not work. The protective service workers expressed to Julie their concerns about the condition of the home. Julie explained that she was in the process of moving from a nearby mobile home, and that she expected her new land lord to quickly correct the problems with her new home. The workers learned that Julie's rent for her former residence was paid until the end of the month. They encouraged Julie to return to her former home until the problems with her new home were corrected. She declined.

The workers discussed Julie's financial resources with her, and Julie explained that she received Supplemental Security Income [hereinafter "SSI"], food stamps, a medical card, and a welfare check from the State of Ohio, where she had lived prior to moving to West Virginia earlier that month. Julie explained that she was also anticipating aid from a community utility resource agency. In addition, Julie stated that she had applied for West Virginia welfare benefits, but her application had been denied because she was still receiving benefits from Ohio. The workers instructed Julie on how to terminate her Ohio benefits so that she could receive West Virginia benefits.

Also during their visit, the protective service workers observed Julie's interactions with Emily. They perceived that Julie roughly handled Emily and seldom spoke to her. The workers further observed that Emily was drinking from a bottle, but appeared hungry. Julie was feeding Emily bites of scrambled eggs and toast from a plate she had prepared for herself. The workers asked Julie if Emily had eaten anything else that day to which Julie responded that she could not remember. Upon inspection, the workers noticed that there was little food in the home. Julie explained that her food supply had not yet been moved from her former home. The workers also found that Emily had dried feces on her bottom, and explained to Julie the importance of keeping Emily clean.

Finally, the workers questioned Julie about John F., who was not present during the visit. They expressed their concern regarding his criminal history. Julie stated that she knew that John F. had gone to prison for killing his wife, and that he had killed his prison cell-mate. She also stated that she had heard rumors that John had a history of child molesting, but she did not know if the rumors were true. See footnote 2 Julie explained that John rarely visited her and that he was never left alone with Emily. At the conclusion of their visit, the workers provided Julie with their phone number, offered their assistance and departed.

The following day, March 23, 1995, the workers received a call from Julie informing them that water service had been turned on at her new residence; however, she still did not have running water due to a plumbing problem. The workers encouraged Julie to notify her landlord. In addition, they once again urged her to return to her former home pending resolution of the problems in her new home. Julie again declined.

On March 24, 1995, the protective service workers visited Julie a second time. They found that there had been no improvement in the conditions of the mobile home. During this visit, they asked Julie how she was able to bathe Emily without running water. Julie responded that she left Emily unattended while she went to her former home to retrieve water. The workers also observed Julie changing Emily's diaper. Upon noting redness and apparent tenderness, they explained the proper method of changing a diaper and again stressed the importance of keeping Emily clean.

The protective service workers then asked to examine the mobile home from which Julie was moving so they could determine its suitability as a home. The workers found that the former home had heat, running water and a working cook stove, and appeared to be in better condition than her present home. They again encouraged Julie to return to her former home until the problems with her new residence were resolved. Julie once again declined. Also during this visit, Julie admitted that she was living with John F., and that she had moved to her current residence because it was larger. After returning to Julie's present home, the workers asked her to remain there until she heard from them.

The protective service workers then initiated the filing of an abuse and neglect petition through the Office of the Prosecuting Attorney for Hancock County. The petition was filed that day, March 24, 1995. The petition alleged that Julie's parental rights to her two other children had been terminated for neglect and abuse; that Emily was residing with Julie G. and John F. in a trailer without water, heat or a working cook stove; that Julie G. left Emily unattended in a mobile home containing a running kerosene heater; that Julie G. had demonstrated a lack of parenting skills; and that Julie G. and John F. had a history of lacking parenting skills. See footnote 3 That same day, the Honorable Judge Fred Riscovich issued an order authorizing DHHR to take emergency custody of Emily G. The workers returned to Julie's residence, also on March 24, and found that Emily had been taken to the home of her paternal grandmother in Ohio. The workers explained to Julie that criminal action could be taken if Emily was not immediately returned to West Virginia. Emily was returned, and DHHR took custody of her. Julie waived a preliminary hearing regarding the court's award of emergency custody of Emily to DHHR.

Subsequent proceedings in this case were presided over by the Honorable Judge Ronald E. Wilson. At a hearing on May 8, 1995, Julie requested a pre-adjudication improvement period. During the same hearing, a case plan was tendered to the court by the DHHR protective service workers. The court then granted Julie a 60-day pre-adjudication improvement period. Thereafter, the court periodically extended Julie's improvement period and, on one occasion, modified her case plan. During this time, the court frequently held hearings to review Julie's progress. Each hearing was followed by an order. In these orders, the court occasionally noted that Julie was making progress with respect to her improvement period. Many of the orders addressed Julie's problems. The court noted on one occasion that Julie had missed two appointments for nutrition counseling by WIC, See footnote 4 and a later order noted that the counseling had been terminated. See footnote 5 Another court order required Julie to refrain from having animals in her home, and to keep a gate closed to prevent Emily from having access to a stairway. Several orders addressed Julie's continued contact with John F. The record reveals that Julie continued to receive visits from John even after the court entered orders prohibiting such visits. Julie's conduct was also contrary to an amended case plan See footnote 6 that had been approved by the circuit court on August 17, 1995, and which remained in effect until Julie's pre-adjudication improvement period was finally terminated. See footnote 7

During Julie's improvement period, she was given a psychological evaluation by Dr. William Hewitt, a clinical and forensic psychologist. Dr. Hewitt determined that Julie functioned at the bottom of the low-average range of intelligence. He diagnosed Julie as suffering from Mild Depression, Mild Anxiety, Severe Personality Disorder with Avoidant, Dependent, Narcissistic, Negativistic, and Paranoid Features. Dr. Hewitt opined that Julie may be able to manage an infant and a child or children if she is in the company of a reasonably responsible companion, male or female, or with live-in supervision and help. But otherwise she probably won't be able to safely care for, manage, nurture, or adequately parent an infant or child.

And as long as Mr. [F.] is in the picture she is unlikely to link up with either a responsible male or female companion. Dr. Hewitt noted that Julie expressed a desire to live with John F. and have additional children with him. Dr. Hewitt's report concluded "[i]f [Julie G.] does not respond adequately to the requirements of her improvement period then consider termination of parental rights and adoption of her daughter."

A report filed on September 16, 1996, by the West Virginia Youth Advocate Program related that "[Julie G.] failed the Parent/Child Relationship Inventory, scored in the severe range of Depression, is inconsistent in keeping her home environment clean and hygienic, and poorly manages her finances." The report also detailed that, while Julie expressed love for Emily, Julie "demonstrate[d] significant impairment in providing a nurturing, safe life/environment for Emily. We have witnessed borderline abusive behaviors (physical and emotional) at times by [Julie G.]" Finally, the report expressed the organization's concern regarding Julie's involvement with John F. and another man who was suspected of being a child molester.

Several court summaries filed by DHHR protective service workers also reported Julie's lack of progress during her pre-adjudication improvement period. There were multiple reports of contact between Julie and John F. In addition, Julie repeatedly expressed a desire to continue a relationship with John F. and to have additional children with him. There were also reports of Julie's irresponsible spending, failure to take medicine prescribed to treat her depression, inability to maintain a neat and clean home, inability to maintain personal hygiene and failure to keep Emily on a regular eating and sleeping schedule.

In April, 1996, Emily's guardian ad litem moved for termination of the pre- adjudication improvement period. The circuit court, by order entered on May 21, 1996, and without explanation, denied the motion and continued Julie's improvement period. In September, 1996, Emily's guardian ad litem filed a second motion to terminate Julie's improvement period. This motion was granted at a hearing held on October 17, 1996. A corresponding order was entered on November 7, 1996, wherein the circuit court announced its finding that "no substantial improvement in [Julie's] circumstances has occurred under the pre-adjudicatory improvement period [sic] and the Court was of the opinion that she will not substantially improve within a short period of time."

Following its termination of Julie's pre-adjudication improvement period, the court held an adjudicatory hearing on January 17, 1997. After hearing testimony presented by the two protective service workers who initially visited Julie G., and Julie's own testimony, the circuit court determined that Emily was not a neglected child as defined by W. Va. Code § 49-1-3(g)(1)(A). It is from this order, which is more thoroughly discussed below, that Emily G. now appeals.

II. DISCUSSION

A. Standard of Review

In this appeal, we are asked to reverse an order of the circuit court finding that Emily G. was not a neglected child. Generally, we give plenary review to a circuit court's resolution of questions of law, while factual determinations made by the circuit court are reversible only when they are clearly erroneous. Justice Cleckley recently explained the appropriate standards in Syllabus point 1 of In the Interest of: Tiffany Marie S., wherein this court held:

Although conclusions of law reached by a circuit court are subject to de novo review, when an action, such as an abuse and neglect case, is tried upon the facts without a jury, the circuit court shall make a determination based upon the evidence and shall make findings of fact and conclusions of law as to whether such child is abused or neglected. These findings shall not be set aside by a reviewing court unless clearly erroneous. A finding is clearly erroneous when, although there is evidence to support the finding, the reviewing court on the entire evidence is left with the definite and firm conviction that a mistake has been committed. However, a reviewing court may not overturn a finding simply because it would have decided the case differently, and it must affirm a finding if the circuit court's account of the evidence is plausible in light of the record viewed in its entirety.

196 W. Va. 223, 470 S.E.2d 177 (1996). Justice Cleckley further explained that: [w]hen findings are based on determinations regarding the credibility of witnesses, Rule 52(a) [of the West Virginia Rules of Civil Procedure] demands even greater deference to the trial court's findings[.] . . . Deference is appropriate because the trial judge was on the spot and is better able than an appellate court to decide whether the error affected substantial rights of the parties.

Tiffany Marie S., 196 W. Va. at 231, 470 S.E.2d at 185 (internal quotations and citations omitted). We have thoroughly reviewed the record submitted in this case with due consideration for the standards set forth above and, as hereinafter explained, we are left with the definite and firm conviction that a mistake has been committed.

B. Adjudication of Neglect

Emily G., through her Guardian ad Litem, argues that the circuit court erred in concluding that she was not a neglected child as defined by W. Va. Code § 49-1-3(g)(1)(A) (1994) (Repl. Vol. 1996). See footnote 8 We agree.

On January 17, 1997, the circuit court conducted a hearing to determine whether Emily G. was an abused or neglected child. Testimony was received from the two DHHR protective service workers who visited the mobile home where Julie and Emily were residing at the time the abuse and neglect petition [hereinafter sometimes referred to as "petition"] was filed. Testimony was also received from Julie G. Following the hearing, the court entered an order, dated May 13, 1997, concluding that Emily G. was not an abused or neglected child.

Comments included in the May 13, 1997, order indicate that the circuit court accepted Julie G.'s testimony explaining the conditions that existed at her home at the time the petition was filed, as well as her assertions that such conditions were quickly corrected. The court relied upon Julie's testimony in spite of the fact that evidence which came to light during her lengthy improvement period indicated otherwise. For example, Julie testified that she had corrected the heat, water and stove problems by Sunday, March 26, 1995, which date was two days following Emily's removal from her home. In addition, Julie asserted that her mobile home was dirty and disorderly due only to her recent move.

Conversely, a case plan dated May 5, 1995, more than one month after Emily's removal, included, as one of the goals to be met, "[i]mprove living conditions, i.e., sufficient heat and water service. Also, maintain a clean and safe living environment." The inclusion of this goal indicates that the heat and water problems had not yet been resolved. Furthermore, it appears that once the problems were resolved, Julie continued to have trouble maintaining an appropriate home environment. A status review report dated June 16, 1995, related that "[a]t this time, Julie has no heating or cooking fuel in her trailer. This prohibits her from preparing meals and bathing. She has stated that she cannot remedy this before she receives her SSI check on 7-1-95. She has exhausted community resources for assistance." At the conclusion of this evidence, the circuit court found that Julie's living conditions were "in a significant way caused by a lack of financial resources." The court opined that "SSI, food stamps, a medical card and the possibility of welfare benefits may have seemed adequate to [Julie], but those resources would provide a budget balancing challenge to the best financial planner." Notwithstanding the fact that Julie may not have had an excess of funds, the record evidence demonstrates that during her improvement period she failed to utilize the limited funds available to her to provide necessities for herself and Emily (who was present only during scheduled visits) and, instead, spent her money on expensive luxuries. See footnote 9 Moreover, the record reveals that Julie was unable to consistently maintain a clean and safe home environment during her improvement period.

The court further recognized, in its order of May 15, that Julie's parenting skills proved to be inadequate during the improvement period:

as we all learned from the prolonged (but justified) pre- adjudicatory improvement period granted in this case, the [DHHR Protective Service] Workers were correct in their initial questioning of [Julie G.'s] ability to make rational choices. But this Court's findings must be based upon conditions existing at the time of the filing of the Petition.

(Emphasis added). Having made this observation, the court nevertheless concluded that Emily was not a neglected child at the time the abuse and neglect petition was filed. We find the court's conclusion in this respect to be inconsistent with its observations. See footnote 10 Apparently, as indicated by the above quote, the court believed that information discovered during a pre- adjudication improvement period may not properly be considered in assessing the conditions that existed at the time of the filing of an abuse and neglect petition. We find that the circuit court misinterpreted the relevant statute.

W. Va. Code § 49-6-2(c) (1992) (Repl. Vol. 1995) See footnote 11 provides for a hearing before the circuit court to determine whether a particular child is abused or neglected. That section of the Code states:

(c) In any proceeding under this article, the party or parties having custodial or other parental rights or responsibilities to the child shall be afforded a meaningful opportunity to be heard, including the opportunity to testify and to present and cross-examine witnesses. The petition shall not be taken as confessed. A transcript or recording shall be made of all proceedings unless waived by all parties to the proceeding. The rules of evidence shall apply. Where relevant, the court shall consider the efforts of the state department to remedy the alleged circumstances. At the conclusion of the hearing the court shall make a determination based upon the evidence and shall make findings of fact and conclusions of law as to whether such child is abused or neglected, which shall be incorporated into the order of the court. The findings must be based upon conditions existing at the time of the filing of the petition and proven by clear and convincing proof.

(Emphasis added).

While W. Va. Code § 49-6-2(c) requires that a circuit court's findings "must be based upon conditions existing at the time of the filing of the petition and proven by clear and convincing proof," the statute also provides that:

Where relevant, the court shall consider the efforts of the state department to remedy the alleged circumstances. At the conclusion of the hearing the court shall make a determination based upon the evidence and shall make findings of fact and conclusions of law as to whether such child is abused or neglected . . . .

(Emphasis added). This language is mandatory. See Syllabus point 3, Ruble v. Office of Secretary of State, 192 W. Va. 134, 451 S.E.2d 435 (1994) (per curiam) (""The word 'shall' in the absence of language in the statute showing a contrary intent on the part of the legislature, should be afforded a mandatory connotation." Syl. pt. 2, Terry v. Sencindiver, 153 W. Va. 651, 171 S.E.2d 480 (1969).' Syl. pt. 5, Rogers v. Hechler, 176 W. Va. 713, 348 S.E.2d 299 (1986)."). Thus, the legislature has clearly provided that a circuit court must consider facts developed during the improvement period where relevant. See footnote 12

The case sub judice is a striking example of the inconsistent results which can be reached when relevant evidence has not been included in the circuit court's determination of neglect. At the time the DHHR protective service workers first visited Julie G.'s residence, they found that necessities such as heat, food and water were not present. The home was observed to be unclean and in disarray during both of the visits that preceded the abuse and neglect petition. Julie appeared to be inattentive to Emily and demonstrated an inability to properly clean and feed her. In addition, Julie admitted to having left Emily unattended on one occasion when she went to her former mobile home to retrieve water. The workers were also concerned that the kerosene heater was a fire hazard due to the clutter in the home, and that it also presented a danger to Emily. Although Julie was encouraged by the workers to return to her former home, which had heat, running water and a working cook stove, she consistently refused. Finally, the workers expressed concern regarding contact between Emily and John F. Julie first asserted that John had very little contact with Emily and was never left alone with her, but later admitted that she and John F. resided together. See footnote 13

Responding to these allegations, during her testimony at the January 17, 1997, hearing, Julie G. represented that her mobile home was equipped with heat, water and a working cooking stove within two days of Emily's removal. She also explained that her home was cluttered because she was in the process of moving into the home. Julie further stated that Emily was well fed and that she took appropriate measures to see that Emily was prevented from coming into contact with the kerosene heater. In addition, she testified that she did not want to return to the first trailer because the pipes under the kitchen sink leaked and, contrary to what she had previously told the DHHR protective service workers, See footnote 14 because there was no heat in one room and the roof also leaked. See footnote 15

Julie's testimony was greatly contradicted by her performance during the pre-adjudication improvement period. During the improvement period she was unable to maintain her home as a clean and safe environment for a young child. She refused to cooperate with a nutrition program provided by WIC, to such a degree that the program was canceled. Also during part of her improvement period, Julie lived in an apartment with stairs. Although she had a gate to prevent Emily from falling down the stairs, she failed to keep it closed. See footnote 16 While Julie insisted that she had appropriate funds and assistance to provide for herself and Emily, she was unable to manage those funds to provide necessities and, instead, spent her money on expensive luxuries. Moreover, despite repeated efforts by the protective service workers, and others providing services to Julie during her improvement period, to convince Julie to eliminate all contact with John F., she failed to do so. By permitting John to visit her home, frequently when Emily was present, Julie violated a court order, or contributed to the violation of a court order, See footnote 17 directing her and John to refrain from having contact with each other. Julie's consistent refusal to discontinue contact with John F. was also contrary to the amended case plan developed by the DHHR and approved by the circuit court. In addition, it appeared that Julie had no intention of complying with the court orders and her case plan, as she often expressed her desire to have a future with John and to have additional children with him.

The circuit court obviously believed that it must disregard facts that supported the initial concerns of the protective service workers, because such facts were not discovered until after the filing of the petition. In this regard, the court stated:

In March 1995, had the Workers visited Julie [G.'s] home without the information about John [F.'s] criminal history and without the information that Julie [G.] had been a neglectful mother, they would have found a mother and a child in a mobile home where the living conditions, while uncomfortable, were not life threatening and were being addressed by the mother. In deciding whether an emergency Order removing the child was necessary, they would or should have considered that the mother moved to a new trailer primarily for safety reasons and that this was evidence of her concern for Emily. The Workers would have or should have tempered their concern that Emily was hungry, with the observation that she was well-nourished and appeared to be in good health. As experienced child protection Workers, they would have acknowledged that the newly occupied mobile home, while messy and not as clean as they liked, did not constitute child neglect. That Emily could have been cleaner, while desirable, would not justify a finding of child neglect or a finding that there existed imminent danger to the physical well-being of the child.

(Third emphasis added). See footnote 18

Had the circuit court properly evaluated the conditions that existed at the time of the filing of the petition in light of Julie's performance during the pre-adjudication improvement period, as required by W. Va. Code § 49-6-2(c), we believe that it could have reached only one conclusion. That Emily was a neglected child within the meaning of W. Va. Code § 49-1-3(g)(1)(A).

We note, however, that W. Va. Code § 49-6-2(c) (1992) (Repl. Vol. 1995) directs, in mandatory language, that the court consider evidence related to DHHR's attempts to remedy conditions alleged in the petition, where relevant. See footnote 19 Thus, such evidence can only be considered to the extent that it relates back to the conditions that existed at the time of the filing of the petition and that were alleged in the petition. We therefore hold that, in making a determination of whether a child is an abused and/or neglected child as defined in W. Va. Code § 49-1-3 (1994) (Repl. Vol. 1996), a court must consider evidence of a parent's progress, or lack thereof, during the pre-adjudication improvement period. However, pursuant to W. Va. Code § 49-6-2(c) (1996) (Repl. Vol. 1996), such evidence is proper only if it relates back to conditions that existed at the time of the filing of the abuse and/or neglect petition, and that were alleged in such petition. Evidence regarding a parent's pre- adjudication improvement period may not be used to informally amend a previously-filed petition. The proper method of presenting new allegations to the circuit court is by requesting permission to file an amended petition pursuant to Rule 19 of the West Virginia Rules of Procedure for Child Abuse and Neglect Proceedings. See footnote 20 We hold further that, under Rule 19 of the West Virginia Rules of Procedure for Child Abuse and Neglect Proceedings, amendments to an abuse/neglect petition may be allowed at any time before the final adjudicatory hearing begins. When modification of an abuse/neglect petition is sought, the circuit court should grant such petition absent a showing that the adverse party will not be permitted sufficient time to respond to the amendment, consistent with the intent underlying Rule 19 to permit liberal amendment of abuse/neglect petitions.

The burden of proving that a child is abused or neglected is placed upon the DHHR. In this regard, we have held:

"'"W. Va. Code, 49-6-2(c) [1980], requires the State Department of Welfare [now the Department of Health and Human Resources], in a child abuse or neglect case, to prove 'conditions existing at the time of the filing of the petition . . . by clear and convincing proof.' The statute, however, does not specify any particular manner or mode of testimony or evidence by which the State Department of Welfare is obligated to meet this burden." Syllabus Point 1, In Interest of S.C., 168 W. Va. 366, 284 S.E.2d 867 (1981).' Syllabus Point 1, West Virginia Department of Human Services v. Peggy F., 184 W. Va. 60, 399 S.E.2d 460 (1990)." Syllabus Point 1, In re Beth, 192 W. Va. 656, 453 S.E.2d 639 (1994). Syllabus Point 3, In re Christina L., 194 W. Va. 446, 460 S.E.2d 692 (1995). We believe DHHR met its burden in this case. The court below misinterpreted the law with regard to the proper evidence to be considered in determining whether a child is abused or neglected. Therefore, the court's findings of fact in this case were improperly limited to a specific point in time at which the facts had not been adequately developed. We have thoroughly reviewed the record presented on appeal and have considered all of the relevant facts, and we are left with the definite and firm conviction that a mistake has been committed. Consequently, we find that the circuit court's conclusion that Emily G. is not a neglected child is clearly erroneous. We reverse the May 13, 1997, order of the Circuit Court of Hancock County. See footnote 21 We further find that Emily G. is a neglected child as defined in W. Va. Code § 49-1-3(g)(1)(A), and that Julie G. is an abusing parent as defined in W. Va. Code § 49-1-3(b) (1994) (Repl. Vol. 1996). See footnote 22

III. CONCLUSION

For the foregoing reasons, we reverse the May 13, 1997, order of the Circuit Court of Hancock County, and remand this case for further proceedings.

Reversed and Remanded.

Footnote: 1 We follow our past practice in domestic and juvenile cases involving sensitive facts and do not use the last names of the parties. See, e.g., State ex rel. Amy M. v. Kaufman, 196 W. Va. 251, 470 S.E.2d 205 (1996).

Footnote: 2 A court summary prepared by DHHR protective service workers, dated June 16, 1995, reported that John F. was "registered in the state [sic] of Ohio as a convicted child sexual abuser." The record further indicates that John F. had twice been charged with child molestation in the State of Arizona. On one occasion he apparently plead guilty to a lesser charge. On another occasion the charge was dismissed, possibly as part of a plea agreement. The record further indicates that John F. has a lengthy criminal history, including charges of public indecency, felonious assault, escape and aggravated assault.

Footnote: 3 An amended petition was filed on May 15, 1998, which included allegations against John F. that were not included in the original petition. While the amended petition re-stated the allegations previously asserted against Julie G., it did not supplement or modify those allegations. John F.'s parental rights were subsequently terminated by the circuit court's order of April 10, 1996.

Footnote: 4 WIC is a special supplementary food and health program for women, infants and children. See generally W. Va. Code § 16-2G-1 (1991) (Repl. Vol. 1995); Baugh v. Merritt, ___ W. Va. ___, ___, ___ S.E.2d ___, ___, slip op.(dissent) at 8 (No. 23783 July 3, 1997) (per curiam) (Maynard, J., dissenting).

Footnote: 5 A letter from the WIC nutritionist working with Julie indicated that Julie was not cooperating and continuation of the program was not recommended.

Footnote: 6 The first case plan that was accepted by the circuit court was dated May 5, 1995, and included goals for John F. (i.e., to get a psychiatric evaluation, to attend parenting classes and to maintain a regular schedule of supervised visitation with Emily). However, it quickly became apparent that John F. had no intention of participating in court proceedings regarding Emily G. or of cooperating with the case plan. Consequently, the case plan was modified on July 21, 1995. The modified case plan, which was approved by the circuit court, suggested that Julie needed to "end all physical and emotion contact from John [F.] as recommended by Dr. C. William Hewitt."

Footnote: 7 While we ultimately reverse this case based upon our finding that the circuit court misapplied the relevant statute, we must commend the circuit court's efforts in its handling of this case. The court regularly and frequently reviewed Julie's progress and amended her case plan, without delay, when various needs became apparent. The court truly handled this case with the type of priority that child abuse and neglect cases deserve, but of which they are all too often deprived.

Footnote: 8 Pursuant to W. Va. Code § 49-1-3(g)(1)(A) (1994) (Repl. Vol. 1996), a neglected child is a child

[w]hose physical or mental health is harmed or threatened by a present refusal, failure or inability of the child's parent, guardian or custodian to supply the child with necessary food, clothing, shelter, supervision, medical care or education, when such refusal, failure or inability is not due primarily to a lack of financial means on the part of the parent, guardian or custodian[.]

(Emphasis added).

Footnote: 9 Julie purchased a tread mill costing more than $600.00, entered into an agreement to purchase $145.00 worth of portraits of Emily, contracted to rent a color TV for $54.00 per month and bought, and then returned, a $1,500.00 reclining chair equipped with a massager and a telephone. During these periods of extravagant spending, Julie's telephone service was disconnected for failure to pay overdue charges when, according to one report, Julie needed to maintain phone service due to seizures Emily was having, and Julie received a shut-off notice from the power company for lack of payment. She entered into an installment agreement to remedy her past due account with the power company, but had to be reminded to pay the installments. W. Va. Code § 49-1-3(g)(1)(A) excludes from the definition of a neglected child a child who is deprived of certain necessities due to a lack of financial means. However, the failure on the part of a parent to properly manage his or her finances does not constitute a lack of financial means.

Footnote: 10 We note a further inconsistency between the circuit court's finding that Emily G. was not a neglected child and its order of November 7, 1996, which terminated Julie G.'s pre-adjudication improvement period. In the order of November 7, the circuit court observed that "no substantial improvement in the said respondent's [Julie G.'s] circumstances has occurred under the pre-adjudicatory improvement period [sic] and the court was of the opinion that she will not substantially improve within a short period of time."

Footnote: 11 While the 1992 version of W. Va. Code § 49-6-2(c) is applicable to the case at bar, we note that this provision was amended in 1996. However, the changes to subsection (c) were merely stylistic. Thus, our observations regarding subsection (c) also apply to the 1996 amended version of that subsection.

Footnote: 12 We have frequently held:

"'"Where the language of a statute is clear and without ambiguity the plain meaning is to be accepted without resorting to the rules of interpretation." Syl. pt. 2, State v. Elder, 152 W. Va. 571, 165 S.E.2d 108 (1968).' Syllabus point 1, Courtney v. State Dept. of Health of West Virginia, 182 W. Va. 465, 388 S.E.2d 491 (1989)." Syllabus point 3, *Francis O. Day Company, Inc. v. Syl. pt. 5, Walker v. West Virginia Ethics Comm'n, ___ W. Va. ___, ___ S.E.2d ___ (Nos. 23881, 23890 July 15, 1997).

Footnote: 13 All of these concerns were addressed in the abuse and neglect petition filed in this case.

Footnote: 14 The protective service workers represented that when they encouraged Julie to return to the first mobile home, she refused to do so because the second mobile home had more room to accommodate herself, John F. and Emily, and her clothes had already been moved into the second mobile home. Julie also informed the workers of the leaking pipes. They suggested that a bucket placed under the sink would catch any leaking water.

Footnote: 15 Interestingly, Julie chose not to return to a mobile home that had a working stove, heat, except for one room, and running, though leaking, water, in favor of a mobile home that had a portable source of heat, which, at best, warmed only one room, and that had no working stove and either no running water or only cold running water.

Footnote: 16 An order entered by the circuit court on March 12, 1996, warned that if Julie did not "keep the stairgate in position to prevent her child from climbing the steps during visitation with her said child, then such visitation shall terminate and end."

Footnote: 17 An order resulting from a hearing held on December 12, 1995, and entered on April 4, 1996, directed that John F. "shall not contact Julie [G.], and, in the event he does, he shall be in contempt of this order of the court." At a subsequent hearing on March 15, 1996, the circuit court noted that Julie had admitted, in open court, to having contact with John F. Consequently, the court ordered that Julie have no contact with John F. either directly or indirectly.

Footnote: 18 In addition to our discussion below, we note at this juncture that the standard for neglect indicated by the court in the immediately preceding quote does not comport with the standard set forth in W. Va. Code § 49-1-3(g)(1)(A), which requires only that a child's "physical or mental health" be "harmed or threatened" (emphasis added). It is not necessary to find that the child is presently harmed or that the conditions in which the child lives are "life threatening."

Footnote: 19 In determining what evidence is relevant, the circuit courts must look to Rule 401 of the West Virginia Rules of Evidence, which rules apply as explicitly stated in W. Va. Code § 49-6-2(c). Rule 401 defines "relevant evidence" as "evidence having any tendency to make the existence of any fact that is of consequence to the determination of the action more probable or less probable than it would be without the evidence." For the purposes of a hearing under W. Va. Code § 49-6-2(c), facts that are "of consequence to the determination of the action," as provided in Rule 401, are facts "based upon conditions existing at the time of the filing of the petition" as required by W. Va. Code § 49-6-2(c). See 1 Franklin D. Cleckley, Handbook on Evidence for West Virginia Lawyers, § 4-1(A), at 199 (3d ed. 1994) (explaining that "[u]nder Rule 401, for evidence to be relevant in the broad sense it must satisfy the two requirements of relevancy and materiality"); id., § 4- 1(B), at 200 (stating that materiality "is determined by considering what issues have been raised either by the law governing the case and/or the pleadings") (emphasis added); id., § 4-1 (C), at 201 (defining relevancy as involving circumstantial evidence, which is "evidence of some subordinate fact from which the existence of some ultimate fact in dispute is sought to be inferred").

Footnote: 20 Rule 19 of the W. Va. Rules of Procedure for Child Abuse and Neglect states:

The court may allow the petition to be amended at any time until the final adjudicatory hearing begins, provided that an adverse party is granted sufficient time to respond to the amendment. After the final adjudicatory hearing begins, a petition may be amended if the amendment does not prejudice an adverse party. If the petition is amended after the conclusion of a preliminary hearing in which custody has been temporarily transferred to the Department or a responsible person, it shall be unnecessary to conduct another preliminary hearing.

Footnote: 21 Emily also complains that the circuit court erred in permitting Julie G.'s pre-adjudication improvement period to continue for more than a year when Julie G. exhibited no substantial improvement. Because we have granted the relief requested by Emily, and because W. Va. Code § 49-6-12 (1996) (Repl. Vol. 1996), which became effective shortly before Julie's improvement period was terminated, now limits a pre-adjudication improvement period to three months, we need not address this issue. See also W. Va. R. Proc. for Child Abuse & Neglect, Rule 23(b) (Preadjudicatory Improvement Period Status Conferences).

Footnote: 22 Pursuant to W. Va. Code § 49-1-3(b) (1994) (Repl. Vol. 1996), "'[a]busing parent' means a parent, guardian or other custodian, regardless of his or her age, whose conduct, as alleged in the petition charging child abuse or neglect, has been adjudged by the court to constitute child abuse or neglect."

Workman, Chief Justice, dissenting:

I take issue with the majority's conclusion that evidence relating to a pre- adjudicatory improvement period is only "proper"(whatever that means) See footnote 1 for a circuit court's consideration if it relates back to conditions that existed at the time of the filing of the petition and that were actually alleged in the petition. The majority takes a far too narrow and technocratical view of what evidence can properly be considered by the circuit court in an abuse and neglect proceeding. While the source of the majority's reasoning is clearly West Virginia Code § 49-6-2(c) (1995), that same statute also provides that the rules of evidence are applicable to abuse and neglect proceedings. Thus, any determination as to the admissibility of evidence in an abuse and neglect petition is governed by Rule 401 of the West Virginia Rules of Evidence. See footnote 2 Clearly, even the statutory language at issue which states that the circuit court's "findings must be based upon conditions existing at the time of the filing of the petition" does not preclude a circuit court's consideration of other relevant evidence concerning a parent's performance during a court-ordered improvement period, especially in light of the clear language and substantive tenor of abuse and neglect law the last ten years.

While I am not suggesting that evidence concerning matters not alleged in the original petition could alone support an adjudication of abuse and neglect absent an amendment, such evidence is clearly relevant insofar as it would "tend[] to make the existence of any fact that is of consequence to the determination of the action more probable or less probable than it would be without the evidence." W. Va. R. Evid. 401. Moreover, as we recognized in Teter v. Old Colony Co., 190 W. Va. 711, 441 S.E.2d 728 (1994), "it is clear that a legislative enactment which is substantially contrary to provisions in our Rules of Evidence would be invalid." Id. at 726, 441 S.E.2d at 743. Thus, if a conflict arises between a statute and a rule relating to evidence, then the rule of evidence prevails. See id. Furthermore, whenever a child appears in court, he is a ward of that court. W. Va. Code § 49-5-4 (1996); Mary D. v. Watt, 190 W. Va. 341, 438 S.E.2d 521 (1992). Courts are thus statutorily reposed with a strong obligation to oversee and protect each child who comes before them. As Justices Cleckley and Albright stated in West Virginia Department of Health and Human Resources ex. rel. Wright v. Brenda C., 197 W. Va. 468, 475 S.E.2d 560 (1996), "[a]bove all else, child abuse and neglect proceedings relate to the rights of an infant. Id. at 477, 475 S.E.2d at 569. We have also recognized on more than one occasion that a circuit court should have before it all relevant evidence, which would clearly include evidence adduced after the petition's filing concerning any court-ordered improvement period. See In re Carlita B., 185 W. Va. 613, 626, 408 S.E.2d 365, 378 (1991) (recognizing that court's determination at the conclusion of the improvement period in an abuse/neglect case involves a decision regarding "whether sufficient improvement has been made in the context of all the circumstances of the case to justify the return of the child") (emphasis supplied). Moreover, this approach is consistent with the whole tenor of the case law as enunciated by this Court over the last ten years. See Carlita B., 185 W. Va. at 625, 408 S.E.2d at 377. Otherwise, we are asking judges to be like ostriches with their heads in the sand. See footnote 3

The majority opinion faults the circuit court for its failure to consider all the relevant evidence, while at the same time holding that such evidence is not "proper" unless it relates back to the allegations set forth in the petition. Further, the majority (which should be functioning as an appellate body, not a fact-finder) actually makes its own determination of abuse and neglect sufficient to terminate the parental rights of Julie G See footnote 4 essentially on the basis of a cold and dirty trailer and on the mother's inability to manage her money well. Despite the fact that I have historically been rather rabid about the protection of abused and neglected children, I hope we have not reached the Orwellian day where parental rights are terminated for dirty housekeeping and lack of judgment with money. These problems can be corrected with educational intervention and homemaker services. But evidence of a truly significant parental deficit arose when it became clear that Julie G. was unwilling or unable to comport with the clear objectives of her improvement period by affording her child protection from a man with a record of violence and child molestation.

The primary purpose of the statutory requirement of West Virginia Code § 49-6-2(c) that the court's "findings must be based upon conditions existing at the time of the filing of the petition" is to assure that one whose parental rights are on the line has adequate notice of the allegations and to provide him/her with an adequate opportunity to meet those charges. Once a parent, fully represented by legal counsel, is placed on an improvement period by court order, they are clearly on notice with respect to what is expected of them. Their level of compliance is clearly relevant, at a minimum to circumstantially show the degree of willingness to remedy the circumstances leading to the abuse and neglect changes.

Lastly, this case points out that it is absolutely incumbent upon petitioners and guardian ad litems in abuse and neglect proceedings to formally amend the petition when additional facts evidencing abuse or neglect which are substantial in nature arise subsequent to the filing of the initial petition. The instant case should have been remanded to the circuit court with directions that it consider evidence relating to the mother's compliance (or lack thereof) with the improvement period, and that the court make competent findings of fact and conclusions of law with regard thereto.

For the foregoing reasons, I respectfully dissent.

Footnote: 1 The meaning of the term "proper" in this context is unclear, but I take it to mean admissible. Evidence is admissible when it is authentic, relevant and competent. See 1 Franklin D. Cleckley, Handbook of Evidence for West Virginia Lawyers § 1-5(B) at 22 (3rd ed. 1994).

Footnote: 2 West Virginia Rule of Evidence 401 provides that "'Relevant evidence' means evidence having any tendency to make the existence of any fact that is of consequence to the determination of the action more probable or less probable than it would be without the evidence."

Footnote: 3 This ostrich-like stance is reflected by the dramatic inconsistency in the circuit court's finding in its order of November 7, 1996, "that no substantial improvement in the said respondent's [Julie G.'s] circumstances has occurred under the preadjudicatory improvement period" as the predicate to its termination of the improvement period, and the court's almost simultaneous finding during the January 17, 1997, adjudicatory proceeding that Emily G. was not an abused or neglected child.

Footnote: 4 The majority remands for further proceedings, but does not specify what sort of proceedings remain under this holding.

SYLLABUS BY THE COURT

1. "'"The exercise of discretion by a trial court in awarding custody of a minor child will not be disturbed on appeal unless that discretion has been abused; however, where the trial court's ruling does not reflect a discretionary decision but is based upon an erroneous application of the law and is clearly wrong, the ruling will be reversed on appeal." Syllabus point 2, Funkhouser v. Funkhouser, 158 W.Va. 964, 216 S.E.2d 570 (1975), superseded by statute on other grounds as stated in David M. v. Margaret M., 182 W.Va. 57, 385 S.E.2d 912 (1989).' Syl. Pt. 1, In re Abbigail Faye B., 222 W.Va. 466, 665 S.E.2d 300 (2008)." Syl. Pt. 2, In re Antonio R.A., 228 W.Va. 380, 719 S.E.2d 850 (2011).

2. "In reviewing a final order entered by a circuit court judge upon a review of, or upon a refusal to review, a final order of a family court judge, we review the findings of fact made by the family court judge under the clearly erroneous standard, and the application of law to the facts under an abuse of discretion standard. We review questions of law de novo." Syllabus, Carr v. Hancock, 216 W. Va. 474, 607 S.E.2d 803 (2004).

3. "In a contest involving the custody of an infant the welfare of the child is the polar star by which the discretion of the court will be guided." Syl. Pt. 1, State ex rel. Cash v. Lively, 155 W.Va. 801, 187 S.E.2d 601 (1972).

4. "A psychological parent is a person who, on a continuing day-to-day basis, through interaction, companionship, interplay, and mutuality, fulfills a child's psychological and physical needs for a parent and provides for the child's emotional and financial support. The psychological parent may be a biological, adoptive, or foster parent, or any other person. The resulting relationship between the psychological parent and the child must be of substantial, not temporary, duration and must have begun with the consent and encouragement of the child's legal parent or guardian. To the extent that this holding is inconsistent with our prior decision of In the Interest of Brandon L.E., 183 W.Va. 113, 394 S.E.2d 515 (1990), that case is expressly modified." Syl. Pt. 3, In re Clifford K., 217 W.Va. 625, 619 S.E.2d 138 (2005).

5. "In the law concerning custody of minor children, no rule is more firmly established than that the right of a natural parent to the custody of his or her infant child is paramount to that of any other person; it is a fundamental personal liberty protected and guaranteed by the Due Process Clauses of the West Virginia and United States Constitutions." Syl. Pt. 1, In re Willis, 157 W.Va. 225, 207 S.E.2d 129 (1973).

6. "A parent has the natural right to the custody of his or her infant child, unless the parent is an unfit person because of misconduct, neglect, immorality, abandonment or other dereliction of duty, or has waived such right, or by agreement or otherwise has transferred, relinquished or surrendered such custody, the right of the parent to the custody of his or her infant child will be recognized and enforced by the courts." Workman, Chief Justice:

This is an appeal by Glenna. H. (hereinafter "grandmother")[1] from an order of the Circuit Court of Kanawha County affirming an order of the family court terminating the grandmother's eight-year guardianship of her granddaughter, K.H. The family court granted full custody to Anthony B., the child's father (hereinafter "father") with no ongoing visitation granted to the grandmother. On appeal, the grandmother contends that the family court erred in failing to recognize her as the psychological parent of the child; failing to properly consider the child's best interests or material changes in circumstances; and failing to grant any ongoing visitation to the grandmother.

Subsequent to a thorough review of the appendix record, the parties' briefs, and oral arguments of counsel, this Court affirms the family court and circuit court orders terminating the grandmother's guardianship of the child, but we remand this matter with directions to the circuit court to remand to the family court for a hearing on the issue of visitation and the entry of an order granting liberal visitation rights to the grandmother, the specific contours of which are to be fashioned by the family court.

W.Va. Dept. of Human Servs. v. Cheryl M.*, 177 W.Va. 688, 689 n.1, 356 S.E.2d 181, 182 n.1 (1987).

I. Factual and Procedural History

K.H. was born in June of 2006. The father had no contact with the child during the first year of her life and requested multiple paternity tests. He first saw the child on August 1, 2007. The child's mother and brother died in an automobile accident on September 15, 2007, and the maternal grandmother, petitioner Glenna H., thereafter filed for guardianship of the child on September 27, 2007. By order dated October 30, 2007, the family court appointed the grandmother as guardian of the child. The father appeared at the guardianship hearing and did not object to the grandmother's appointment.

On November 6, 2008, the father filed a petition to establish custodial responsibility for the child. This action resulted in an April 2009 agreed order granting primary custody to the grandmother with parenting time to the father every other weekend and one night per week. The father also began paying child support. On November 18, 2010, the father filed a petition to revoke or terminate the grandmother's guardianship. This action resulted in a 2011 agreed order granting the father additional parenting time. The father and grandmother also agreed to refrain from seeking further modification of the custody arrangements until December 31, 2012.

On January 16, 2013, the father filed another petition to terminate the grandmother's guardianship of the child.[2] By order dated April 11, 2013, Attorney Woody Hill was appointed as the guardian ad litem for the child. Subsequent to his investigation, Mr. Hill opined that the child should be placed in the custody of the father.[3] Mr. Hill reported that he considered the child's best interests and determined that the father was capable of providing a stable environment for the child, with no further need for guardianship.

On July 16, 2013, the grandmother filed a motion with the family court seeking to be designated as the child's "psychological parent" and also objected to the termination of her guardianship of the child. The family court held hearings in July, October, and November, 2013. In addition to the parties and the guardian ad litem, Dr. Timothy Saar, a psychologist retained by the grandmother, testified that the grandmother and the child have

[2]The appendix record indicates that the father is employed by the State of West Virginia and pays his daughter's health insurance and private school tuition, fees, books, etc. He is also on active status in the National Guard and has ample room in his residence for the child.

[3]The guardian ad litem also reported that the grandmother had permitted the child to remain in the custody of her friend, Franklin Newsom, a few days a week. Mr. Newsom is a seventy-six-year-old man who had served a sentence for marijuana distribution and had been convicted for making threats to murder an Assistant United States Attorney who had prosecuted him. Mr. Newsom was also charged with battery in 1999 and DUI in 2011. The DUI charges were later dismissed. According to the father, the grandmother placed Mr. Newsom's name on school records as the contact individual and was reluctant to give the father access to the daughter's school records. After the issues regarding Mr. Newsom's background were brought to the attention of the family court, the court entered an order prohibiting overnight visitation with Mr. Newsom and also prohibited Mr. Newsom from being alone with the child.

a significant bond and that the child honestly views the grandmother as "mom." Dr. Saar did not meet with the father.[4]

By order dated December 18, 2013, the family court terminated the grandmother's guardianship and denied her motion to be considered a psychological parent. The grandmother appealed to the Circuit Court of Kanawha County on January 17, 2014. The circuit court refused the appeal, and the grandmother thereafter appealed to this Court.

II. Standard of Review

This Court has held that the standard of review in custody decisions, including guardianships, is as follows:

> "'The exercise of discretion by a trial court in awarding custody of a minor child will not be disturbed on appeal unless that discretion has been abused; however, where the trial court's ruling does not reflect a discretionary decision but is based upon an erroneous application of the law and is clearly wrong, the ruling will be reversed on appeal.' explained as follows:

> In reviewing a final order entered by a circuit court judge upon a review of, or upon a refusal to review, a final order of a family court judge, we review the findings of fact made by the family court judge under the clearly erroneous standard, and the application of law to the facts under an abuse of discretion standard. We review questions of law de novo.

III. Discussion

A. West Virginia Code § 44-10-3, Best Interests, and Changed Circumstances

The grandmother asserts that the family court and lower court erred in the consideration of the father's petition to terminate the guardianship by failing to properly evaluate the best interests of the child and the existence of changed circumstances. In so arguing, the grandmother raises the issue of the legislative amendments to the requirements articulated in West Virginia Code § 44-10-3 that became effective between the father's filing of the petition for termination of the guardianship and the court's hearings on the matter.[5]

[5]The pre-July 9, 2013, version, the relevant portion of which was articulated in § 44-10-3(c)(4), provided as follows:

> (c) The court, the guardian or the minor may revoke or terminate the guardianship appointment when:
> (4) A petition is filed by the guardian, the minor,

The grandmother contends that the family court erred by applying the version of the statute in effect at the time of the filing, rather than the amended version. The primary distinction between the prior and amended versions is the addition of the requirement for consideration of the best interests of the child and a material change in circumstances supporting the need to terminate the guardianship.

> an interested person or upon the motion of the court stating that the minor is no longer in need of assistance or protection of a guardian.

The requirements of that guardianship statute were amended, effective July 9, 2013, approximately six months after the father's petition but before the hearings on the petition. That amended statute, in relevant portion, provides as follows:

> (i) The court, the guardian or the minor may revoke or terminate the guardianship appointment when:
>
> > (4) A petition is filed by the guardian, the minor, a parent or an interested person or upon the motion of the court stating that the minor is no longer in need of the assistance or protection of a guardian due to changed circumstances and the termination of the guardianship would be in the minor's best interest.
>
> (j) For a petition to revoke or terminate a guardianship filed by a parent, the burden of proof is on the moving party to show by a preponderance of the evidence that there has been a material change of circumstances and that a revocation or termination is in the child's best interest.

W.Va. Code § 44-10-3(i)(4) and 44-10-3(j) (emphasis supplied).

This Court's review of the record reveals that the family court recognized the existence of the statutory amendment in its order, but it did not specifically identify the statutory underpinnings for its conclusion that the grandmother's guardianship should be terminated. It simply stated that the father had filed his petition for termination under West Virginia Code § 44-10-3(c)(4), and it thereafter proceeded to articulate its findings. The family court did, however, address the issue of the best interests of the child and the change in circumstances that had gradually occurred in the father's level of participation in his daughter's life. The family court observed that "striking a balance between a biological parent's constitutional rights and the child's best interests can be difficult." The court also recognized the immeasurable importance of the child's best interests, as discussed by this Court in In re Antonio. 228 W.Va. at 388, 719 S.E.2d at 858. The court explained that the "record clearly reflects that throughout the years Father has continually stepped up to care for his child and has willingly assumed additional and substantial parental responsibilities as well as all caretaking functions for his minor daughter."

This Court finds the parties' arguments regarding deficiencies in the application of the statute to be unavailing. Beyond any statutory requirement for consideration of best interests and changed circumstances, this Court has emphatically declared the requirement for a thorough consideration of the best interests of the child and changed circumstances in all matters relating to altering custody of children. The substantive law in effect at both the time of filing of the petition and the time of hearings on the matter required such consideration. This Court addressed these requirements in the specific context of a termination of guardianship in In re Haylea G., 231 W. Va. 494, 745 S.E.2d 532 (2013), and has consistently required analysis of best interests and changed circumstances in matters involving custody of children. Id. at 498, 745 S.E.2d at 536. A child's best interests have been heralded as the paramount consideration by which all custody determinations should be made. We have repeatedly held that "[i]n a contest involving the custody of an infant the welfare of the child is the polar star by which the discretion of the court will be guided." Syl. Pt. 1, State ex rel. Cash v. Lively, 155 W.Va. 801, 187 S.E.2d 601 (1972) (internal citation omitted); see also Syl. Pt. 3, in part, In re Katie S., 198 W.Va. 79, 479 S.E.2d 589 (1996) ("Although parents have substantial rights that must be protected, the primary goal . . . in all family law matters . . . must be the health and welfare of the children."); Syl. Pt. 5, Carter v. Carter, 196 W.Va. 239, 470 S.E.2d 193 (1996) ("In visitation as well as custody matters, we have traditionally held paramount the best interests of the child.").

We find that the family court, while not clearly specifying the statutory basis for its conclusions regarding termination of the guardianship, satisfactorily considered both K.H.'s best interests and the change in circumstances that had occurred over the several years in which the father's level of participation had increased. Moreover, the family court also considered the advice and conclusions of the guardian ad litem, formulated subsequent to a thorough investigation. In his January 2015 update on the current status of the child, the guardian ad litem specifically informed this Court that the child reported a preference to live with her father and also expressed a desire to spend additional time with her grandmother. This Court finds neither clear error nor abuse of discretion in the family court's conclusion that the guardianship should be terminated and custody granted to the father.[6]

B. Psychological Parent

The grandmother also contends that the family court and circuit court erred by failing to recognize her as the psychological parent of the child based upon her eight-year guardianship and the relational bonds created during that time. The "psychological parent" concept, as employed in this state, was originally associated with an individual's right to intervene in child custody matters pursuant to West Virginia Code § 48-9-103 (2014).[7] As

[6]The father contends that the grandmother raised this issue of erroneous application of the statute for the first time on appeal. The appendix record reveals, however, that the grandmother repeatedly argued that there had not been a change of circumstances and that termination of the guardianship was not in the child's best interest. This Court also notes the exception to the general rule of prospective statutory application, as addressed in Shanholtz v. Monongahela Power Co., 165 W.Va. 305, 270 S.E.2d 178 (1980). "[W]here an amended statute incorporates common law that had existed before the amendment to the statute, the statute may be applied retroactively." Myers v. Morgantown Health Care Corp., 189 W. Va. 647, 650, 434 S.E.2d 7, 10 (1993).

[7]The general legal principles associated with the psychological parent concept were addressed in a 1995 Wisconsin case, and the criteria enumerated in that four-element test have now become incorporated within the definitions of the psychological parent doctrine utilized by most reviewing courts. See In re Custody of H.S.H.-K., 533 N.W.2d 419 (Wis.), cert. denied sub nom. Knott v. Holtzman, 516 U.S. 975 (1995). These four elements include the following:

enunciated in syllabus point three of In re Clifford K., 217 W. Va. 625, 619 S.E.2d 138 (2005),

> A psychological parent is a person who, on a continuing day-to-day basis, through interaction, companionship, interplay, and mutuality, fulfills a child's psychological and physical needs for a parent and provides for the child's emotional and financial support. The psychological parent may be a biological, adoptive, or foster parent, or any other person. The resulting relationship between the psychological parent and the child must be of substantial, not temporary, duration and must have begun with the consent and encouragement of the child's legal parent or guardian. To the extent that this holding is inconsistent with our prior decision of In the Interest of Brandon L.E., 183 W.Va. 113, 394 S.E.2d 515 (1990), that case is expressly modified.

In establishing those parameters for the psychological parent concept in Clifford K., this Court specifically warned:

> With the announcement of this holding we also wish to make it abundantly clear that the mere existence of a psychological parent relationship, in and of itself, does not automatically permit the psychological parent to intervene in a proceeding to

---

> (1) that the biological or adoptive parent consented to, and fostered, the [third party's] formation and establishment of a parent-like relationship with the child; (2) that the [third party] and the child lived together in the same household; (3) that the [third party] assumed obligations of parenthood by taking significant responsibility for the child's care, education and development, including contributing towards the child's support, without expectation of financial compensation; and (4) that the [third party] has been in a parental role for a length of time sufficient to have established with the child a bonded, dependent relationship parental in nature.

> determine a child's custody pursuant to W. Va. Code § 48-9-103(b). Nothing is more sacred or scrupulously safeguarded as a parent's right to the custody of his/her child.

217 W. Va. at 644, 619 S.E.2d at 157; see also Syl. Pt. 1, In re Willis, 157 W.Va. 225, 207 S.E.2d 129 (1973) ("In the law concerning custody of minor children, no rule is more firmly established than that the right of a natural parent to the custody of his or her infant child is paramount to that of any other person; it is a fundamental personal liberty protected and guaranteed by the Due Process Clauses of the West Virginia and United States Constitutions."); Syllabus, Whiteman v. Robinson, 145 W.Va. 685, 116 S.E.2d 691 (1960) ("A parent has the natural right to the custody of his or her infant child, unless the parent is an unfit person because of misconduct, neglect, immorality, abandonment or other dereliction of duty, or has waived such right, or by agreement or otherwise has transferred, relinquished or surrendered such custody, the right of the parent to the custody of his or her infant child will be recognized and enforced by the courts."). Recognizing the inherent rights of a biological parent to his or her child, this Court observed in Clifford K. that "the limited rights of a psychological parent cannot ordinarily trump those of a biological or adoptive parent to the care, control, and custody of his/her child." 217 W. Va. at 644, 619 S.E.2d at 157; see also Honaker v. Burnside,182 W.Va. 448, 452, 388 S.E.2d 322, 325 (1989) (stating that "[a]lthough we recognize the attachment and secure relationship" between a child and a psychological parent, "such bond cannot alter the otherwise secure natural rights of a parent[.]").

This Court also addressed the concept of psychological parent in In re Visitation & Custody of Senturi N.S.V., 221 W. Va. 159, 652 S.E.2d 490 (2007), and observed:

> In the cases in which this Court has determined a person to be a psychological parent to a child, that person typically has resided in the child's household and interacted with the child on a daily basis. See, e.g., In re Clifford K., id.; In re Jonathan G., 198 W.Va. 716, 482 S.E.2d 893 (1996); Simmons v. Comer, 190 W.Va. 350, 438 S.E.2d 530 (1993); Honaker v. Burnside, 182 W.Va. 448, 388 S.E.2d 322 (1989). Moreover, a psychological parent is one who essentially serves as a second parent to a child and is a relationship to which the child's parent has consented. See generally In re Clifford K., 217 W.Va. 625, 619 S.E.2d 138; Simmons, 190 W.Va. 350, 438 S.E.2d 530; Honaker, 182 W.Va. 448, 388 S.E.2d 322."

221 W.Va. at 167, 652 S.E.2d at 498. In Senturi, the Court was also deliberate in its recognition of the potential for the concept of psychological parent to be inappropriately extended.

> Obviously, a child will hold in high esteem any person who looks after him/her, attends to his/her needs, and lavishes him/her with love, attention, and affection. However, simply caring for a child is not enough to bestow upon a care giver psychological parent status. Were this the law of the State, any person, from day care providers and babysitters to school teachers and family friends, who cares for a child on a regular basis and with whom the child has developed a relationship of trust could claim to be the child's psychological parent and seek an award of the child's custody to the exclusion of the child's parent. Clearly, this is not the result contemplated by this Court's prior holding [in Clifford K.] . . . .

Id. at 168, 652 S.E.2d at 499.

This Court also exhibited reluctance to apply the psychological parent concept in a manner that would unnecessarily detract from the rights of the natural parents in In re N.A., 227 W. Va. 458, 711 S.E.2d 280 (2011):

> Simply because a person is found to be a child's psychological parent, however, does not translate into the psychological parent getting custody of the child. Rather, this Court has only gone so far as to hold that the status of "psychological parent" entitles the individual to intervene in a custody proceeding, "when such intervention is likely to serve the best interests of the child(ren) whose custody is under adjudication." . . . Thus, custody determinations regarding a child or children are still controlled by what is in the best interests of the child(ren).

227 W.Va. at 469, 711 S.E.2d at 291 (quoting Clifford K., 217 W.Va. at 640, 619 S.E.2d at 153).

This Court had occasion to speak to the psychological parent issue again in In re Antonio. In that case, the child's maternal grandmother had filed a petition for guardianship, and the child's biological mother had objected. In appealing the denial of her petition, the grandmother argued that she had been the psychological parent to the child for ten years. 228 W.Va. at 384, 719 S.E.2d at 854. This Court held that the statutory scheme granting a trial court discretion to appoint a nominee selected by a minor over the age of fourteen did not obligate the trial court to appoint the grandmother as guardian, over the mother's objection and absent a showing of the mother's unfitness. Id. at 388, 719 S.E.2d at 858. The grandmother in Antonio argued that she should be appointed as Antonio's guardian. However, Antonio had been living with his mother for the three years preceding the filing of the guardianship petition. "While [the grandmother] might have been able to succeed under this theory during the approximately ten years that Antonio lived with her, at this point in time, this Court cannot find that [the mother] has voluntarily transferred or relinquished custody of Antonio." Id. at 392, 719 S.E.2d at 862.

The Court recognized Antonio's desire to have a continued relationship with his grandmother, and found that while the guardianship should be terminated, Antonio would be entitled to have visitation with his grandmother. In so ruling, this Court relied upon Honaker for the proposition that the best interests of the child may, in certain cases, necessitate visitation with other parties: "[a]lthough custody of minor child should be with the natural parent absent proof of abandonment or some form of misconduct or neglect, the child may have a right to continued visitation rights with the stepparent or half-sibling." 182 W.Va. at 451, 388 S.E.2d at 325, syl. pt. 2.

In In re A.C., No. 13-1120, 2014 WL 2782131, at *1 (W. Va. Supreme Court, June 19, 2014) (memorandum decision), this Court affirmed the lower court's determination that a non-parent had served the role of a psychological parent and observed that the family court had > made detailed findings regarding the child's living situation with Brooke B. in Kanawha County, detailing how, for example, > Brooke B. maintained A.C.'s school papers, how A.C. celebrated holidays in the Kanawha County home, how friends of A.C. dropped her off at the home, how Brooke B.'s address was A.C.'s official school address, and how Brooke B.'s authority to give consent for medical treatment of A.C. was never challenged.

2014 WL 2782131, at *1. This Court affirmed the order appointing the psychological parent as the guardian and granted custody to the psychological parent while the biological father was incarcerated. Id.

In the case sub judice, the family court found that the grandmother was not the psychological parent of K.H. because she failed to satisfy the second two elements of the "psychological parent" test. Specifically, it found that her guardianship was only temporary and was not begun with the consent of the father. Upon review of the record, this Court finds that the family court clearly erred. The grandmother had custody of this child for eight years, albeit increasingly a shared-custody arrangement as the father became gradually more involved in the life of his daughter and sought additional custodial responsibilities. The child's mother, prior to her death, had sought assistance from her mother and had encouraged the relationship between grandmother and grandchild. The father, while not involved in the child's life for over a year, consented to the guardianship arrangement and entered into agreed orders resolving custody issues in favor of joint custody arrangements with the grandmother. From the child's birth and over the course of the next eight years, the grandmother has served as a parent to K.H. in every conceivable capacity. Such relationship is not properly characterized as temporary. This was a significant relationship that unquestionably qualifies as a psychological parenting situation under this Court's definition in Clifford K., as well as the subsequent cases chronicled above. We consequently find that the family court erred in finding that the grandmother's relationship with K.H. was temporary and that it was begun without the consent of her parents. We find that the grandmother is a psychological parent to K.H.

C. Right of Psychological Parent to Continued Association

The psychological parent doctrine is an equitable theory and judge-made construct which permits courts, under appropriate circumstances, to recognize an individual who has maintained a parent-like relationship with a child and consequently has a right to continued visitation with that child. See Nicole M. Onorato, Note, The Right to Be Heard: Incorporating the Needs and Interests of Children of Nonmarital Families into the Visitation Rights Dialogue, 4 Whittier J. Child & Fam. Advoc. 491, 519-20 (2005) (explaining the psychological-parent doctrine).[8] In such instances, a court will evaluate the issue of whether [8]Prior to recent attempts to articulate a legal standard for this theory, proponents of the concept analyzed it from a psychological perspective and explained that "[i]t is this psychological parenthood, rather than the biological events which may precipitate such a relationship, which many psychologists identify as the sine qua non of successful personality development." Note, Alternatives to "Parental Right" in Child Custody Disputes Involving Third Parties, 73 Yale L.J. 151, 158 (1963). Child psychoanalyst and Yale professor, Anna Freud, opined that the term "psychological parent" denotes "one who, on a continuing, day-to-day basis, through interaction, companionship, interplay, and mutuality, fulfills the child's psychological needs for a parent." Joseph Goldstein, Anna Freud, and Albert J.

an adult has formed a bonded relationship with a child and whether the continuation of such relationship is in the best interests of the child.[9]

These principles are consistent with this Court's approach to the right of a child to continued association, as expressed quite concisely in Honaker. In that case, this Court determined that the natural father had a right to custody of his child, but also considered whether it was in the child's best interests to maintain a continued relationship with her stepfather and half-brother. 182 W.Va. at 452, 388 S.E.2d at 325. This Court stated:

> [u]ndoubtedly, . . . [the child's] best interests must be the primary standard by which we determine her rights to continued contact with other significant figures in her life. Clearly, "these interests are interests of the child and not of the parent. Visitation is, to be sure, a benefit to the adult who is granted

Solnit, Before the Best Interest of the Child, 39, 46-48 (1979) (advocating the use of the psychological parent doctrine where child was separated from biological or adoptive parents for a long period of time and proposing "maximum intervals beyond which it would be unreasonable to presume that a child's . . . ties with his absent [natural] parents are more significant than those that have developed between him and his longtime caretakers").

[9]In some states utilizing the psychological parent concept, a court finding the existence of such a relationship will generally "treat the third party as equal to the natural parent and will apply the 'best interests of the child' standard to decide visitation, much the same as if two biological parents were vying for visitation or custody in a divorce proceeding." Lindsy J. Rohlf, Note, The Psychological-Parent and DeFacto-Parent Doctrines: How Should the Uniform Parentage Act Define "Parent"?, 94 Iowa L. Rev. 691, 700 (2009); see also V.C. v. M.J.B., 748 A.2d 539, 554 (N.J. 2000) ("Once a third party has been determined to be a psychological parent to a child, . . . he or she stands in parity with the legal parent. Custody and visitation issues between them are to be determined on a best interests standard . . . ." (citation omitted)).

> visitation rights with a child. But it is not the adult's benefit about which the courts are concerned. It is the benefit of the child that is vital." "Visitation is not solely for the benefit of the adult visitor but is aimed at fulfilling what many conceive to be a vital, or at least a wholesome contribution to the child's emotional well being by permitting partial continuation of an earlier established close relationship." Looper v. McManus, 581 P.2d 487, 488 (Okla. Ct. App.1978).

Honaker, 182 W.Va. at 452, 388 S.E.2d at 325 (footnotes omitted). In Honaker, this Court also explained:

> The best interests of the child concept with regard to visitation emerges from the reality that "[t]he modern child is considered a person, not a sub-person over whom the parent has an absolute and irrevocable possessory right. The child has rights. . . ." Another concern is "the need for stability in the child's life. . . . [T]ermination of visitation with individuals to whom the child was close would contribute to instability rather than provide stability.["]

Id., 388 S.E.2d at 326 (footnotes omitted). "[C]ontinuity and stability in a child's life most certainly count for something . . . . Children are not dogwood trees, to be uprooted, replanted, then replanted again for expediency's sake." Guardianship of Kassandra H., 64 Cal.App.4th 1228, 1238 (Cal. App. 1998).

As apparent from the extensive line of cases decided by this Court, the rights of K.H. to continued association with her grandmother must be a vital part of this equation. The father emphasizes the United States Supreme Court's decision in Troxel v. Granville, 530 U.S. 57 (2000), and the fundamental right of a parent to make decisions concerning the care, custody, and control of his or her children. In Troxel, the United States Supreme Court held that awarding visitation to a non-parent, over the objections of a parent, is subject to constitutional limitations. The Court in Troxel invalidated a Washington statute authorizing "any person" to petition for visitation rights "at any time[,]" and described the statute as "breathtakingly broad." Id. at 67.[10] This Court has examined the Troxel case, noting that it "instructs that a judicial determination regarding whether grandparent visitation rights are

[10]A legal commentator analyzed the effect of Troxel on children's constitutional rights and concluded as follows:

> Before Troxel, it was abundantly clear that under the U.S. Constitution children possessed rights to equal protection, to due process, and to privacy in a wide variety of settings. After Troxel, it appears that at least six of the justices would weigh children's interest in protection of intimate relationships in the balance of constitutional rights.
>
> As the least powerful of groups and most vulnerable of persons, children are arguably most in need of rights. In a conceptual scheme in which adults have rights and children have mere interests, children's interests too often are trumped by the more powerful notion of rights. Judges and legislatures are increasingly unwilling to view the rights of parents as paramount . . . . The Supreme Court has recognized children's rights in many different settings, from juvenile justice to education. After Troxel, it seems clear that in a properly presented custody case, the Court can be expected to recognize children's rights to due process, equal protection, and privacy in the context of custody as well. The challenge for scholars (and for judges) is to acknowledge children's rights in custody cases in a manner that does not treat them like small adults, that takes account of their essential difference, and that respects their complex needs for nurture, protection, identity, and connection.

Barbara Bennett Woodhouse, Talking About Children's Rights in Judicial Custody and Visitation Decision Making, 36 Fam. L.Q. 105, 113-14 (2002) (footnotes omitted).

appropriate may not be premised solely on the best interests of the child analysis." Cathy L.M. v. Mark Brent R., 217 W.Va. 319, 327-28, 617 S.E.2d 866, 874-75 (2005) (emphasis supplied). Instead, this Court emphasized in Cathy L.M. that the evaluating court "must also consider and give significant weight to the parents' preference, thus precluding a court from intervening in a fit parent's decision making on a best interests basis." Id. That is the gravamen of the Troxel decision; the true failing of the Washington statute in Troxel was "not that the [trial court] intervened, but that when it did so, it gave no special weight at all to [the parent's] determination of her daughters' best interests." 50 U.S. at 69.

As this Court explained in footnote seven of In re Visitation of A.P., 231 W. Va. 38, 743 S.E.2d 346 (2013):

> Although Troxel does not define "special weight," state courts attempting to interpret and apply Troxel have reasoned that "special weight" indicates considerable deference. In In re M.W., 292 P.3d 1158 (Colo. App. 2012), for instance, the Colorado Court of Appeals explained that "[g]iving special weight means that the presumption favoring the parent's decision can be rebutted only by clear and convincing evidence that granting parental responsibilities to the nonparent is in the child's best interests." Id. at 1161.

231 W.Va. at 42 n.7, 743 S.E.2d at 350 n.7. In State ex rel. Brandon L. v. Moats, 209 W.Va. 752, 551 S.E.2d 674 (2001), this Court held that the West Virginia grandparent visitation statute was constitutional because it is much narrower than the Washington statute evaluated in Troxel. Id. at 760, 551 S.E.2d at 682. This Court, in Brandon L, did not identify "the amount of weight that should attach to the factor of parental preference . . . ." Id. at 763, 551 S.E.2d at 685. We noted, however, that "in light of the *Troxe*l decision it is clear that 'the court must accord at least some special weight to the parent's own determination' provided that the parent has not been shown to be unfit." Id. (quoting Troxel, 530 U.S. at 70).[11]

An enlightening discussion regarding Troxel was included a dissenting opinion in In re Marriage of Winczewski, 72 P.3d 1012 (Or. Ct. App. 2003) (Brewer, J., dissenting), as follows:

> When the competing rights of child and parent are pitted against each other, a balancing of interests is appropriate. That notion finds support in the Troxel test. As discussed, Troxel teaches that a court cannot award parenting time to a nonparent over the objection of a fit parent based solely on best interest considerations. Troxel, 530 U.S. at 69, 120 S.Ct. 2054 (O'Connor, J., plurality opinion). However, the presumption [11]Even states adhering to a strict scrutiny methodology in evaluating nonparent child access statutes recognize the child's interest in the preservation a relationship with a nonparent. In Rideout v. Riendeau, 761 A.2d 291 (Me. 2000), for instance, the Maine Supreme Court, based upon the theory that a compelling state interest is required to justify intervention in the context of Maine's nonparent parenting time statute, observed that the interest in continued access "springs not from any common law right of the grandparent to visitation with the child, but from the child's significant need to be assured that he or she will not unnecessarily lose contact with a grandparent who has been a parent to that child." Id. at 301-02; see also Troxel, 530 U.S. at 86 (Stevens, J., dissenting) ("There is at a minimum a third individual, whose interests are implicated in every case to which the statute applies-the child."). It is therefore imperative to acknowledge that "the understanding of visitation as a parental right, which marginalizes the nurture and care of children and disregards their relational interests, is incompatible with a relational understating of visitation." Ayelet Blecher-Prigat, Rethinking Visitation: From A Parental to A Relational Right, 16 Duke J. Gender L. & Pol'y 1, 2 (2009).

> that must be applied before best interests are considered focuses solely on the parent's ability to act in the child's best interests. In other words, the presumption relates to the very factual determination that must be made if it is rebutted. Because, in a real sense, the Troxel presumption blends with the best interests test, there is a certain circularity to the Court's analysis. That circularity leaves one to wonder whether there is less to the presumption than initially meets the eye. As one commentator has observed:
> > The significance of Troxel lies in its subtlety, not in any rigid analysis of recognized and established constitutional law doctrine. The opinion marks an evolution in parental autonomy protection by what it pronounces as well as by what it avoids. By balancing the State's interest in protecting the child with the parent's interest in making child-rearing decisions free from unnecessary State interference, the Court no longer accords blind, unquestioning deference to the decisions of presumptively fit parents. Ideally, when courts decide to balance the competing interests equally, the child's needs will be served and will prevail.
>
> Sandra Martinez, The Misinterpretation of Troxel v. Granville: Construing the New Standard for Third Party Visitation, 36 Fam. L.Q. 487, 499 (2002). In sum, Troxel neither requires nor presages a strict scrutiny analysis of rights in nonparent custody and parenting time cases; instead, the deference to parental prerogative that it requires entails a balancing of distinct family interests.

72 P.3d at 1057-58 (Brewer, dissenting).

A fundamental principle, properly gleaned from the scholarly writings and legal opinions reviewed by this Court, is that the pronouncements of Troxel do not predispose every case to an ultimate determination favoring the natural parent in a complete and conclusive manner.[12] An assessment of the specific circumstances of each case is still required, and while the reviewing court must accord special weight to the preferences of the parent, the best interests of the child are not to be ignored and must be included as a critical component of the dialogue regarding visitation or custody.

As the New Jersey Supreme Court in Moriarty v. Bradt, 827 A.2d 203 (N. J. 2003), concisely stated, "[t]he possibilities are as varied as the factual scenarios presented." 827 A.2d at 224. These possibilities should be deliberated in a manner conducive to the protection of the child. The Supreme Court of Pennsylvania summarized the process aptly in Hiller v. Fausey, 904 A.2d 875 (Pa. 2006): "[W]e refuse to close our minds to the possibility that in some instances a court may overturn even the decision of a fit parent to [12]It has been noted that "[b]ecause the various opinions in Troxel prevented the Court from speaking with a clear and unified voice, its decision is subject to misinterpretation." Winczewski, 72 P.3d 1012, 1056 (Brewer, dissenting). As insightfully explained by the New Jersey Supreme Court in Moriarty v. Bradt, 827 A.2d 203 (N. J. 2003):

> The [Troxel] Court avoided the basic issue of the appropriate level of scrutiny and the standard to be applied. It also stopped short of invalidating nonparental visitation statutes per se and declined to define "the precise scope of the parental due process right in the visitation context" because "the constitutionality of any standard for awarding visitation turns on the specific manner in which that standard is applied" as "much state-court adjudication in this context occurs on a case-by-case basis."

exclude a grandparent from a grandchild's life, especially where the grandparent's child is deceased and the grandparent relationship is longstanding and significant to the grandchild." Id. at 886-87.[13]

The father in the present case contends that the family court allowed for a gradual transition and that nothing further is necessary. In reality, the family court order only provided for a limited period of gradual transition, the terms of which have now expired.[14]

[13]In a concurrence in Hiller, the writer addressed the issue of according proper deference to the requirements of Troxel and noted as follows:

> [T]he due process right that the Supreme Court affirmed in Troxel is important but limited: a court may not override a parent's decision about the care or custody of a child simply because the court determines that the decision is not in the child's best interest, as the trial court did in Troxel regarding a grandparent's interest in visitation. Instead, the court must presume that a fit parent's decision is in the best interest of the child, and the court may reach a decision contrary to the wishes of the parent only if there is evidence sufficient to overcome that presumption. Troxel goes no further.

904 A.2d at 902 (Newman, J., concurring).

[14]The family court order stated as follows:

> Th[e] following schedule or gradual transitional period shall be followed:
> a. Commencing November 21, 2013 through January 31, 2014 the minor child shall be with Grandmother every other weekend (Friday after school or at 3pm until Sunday evenings at 5). The minor child shall also be with Grandmother every Wednesday after school or 3pm through Thursday morning at 8am or drop

No further visitation is delineated in the family court order. While the grandmother has apparently continued to exercise visitation during the pendency of this appeal, the family court order did not actually require any ongoing visitation.

Based upon a thorough evaluation of the appendix record, this Court finds that K.H. and her psychological parent/grandmother are entitled to continued visitation. This Court is confident that such visitation can be structured in a manner which will not substantially interfere with the parent-child relationship or adversely affect the father's fundamental rights to custody of K.H.

IV. Conclusion

For the foregoing reasons, this Court finds that the family court did not abuse its discretion by terminating the grandmother's guardianship of K.H., and the decision terminating the guardianship is consequently affirmed. However, due to the grandmother's status as psychological parent to the child, the grandmother and the child are entitled to continued association with one another. Thus, we remand this matter for the entry of an order, consistent with this opinion, specifying a liberal visitation schedule to permit significant and meaningful opportunity for the grandmother to interact with K.H. In formulating such arrangement, the family court must also be cognizant of the grandmother's recent filing of a petition for grandparent visitation rights under West Virginia Code §§ 48-10-101 to-1201 (2014), and the two separate and distinct methods of seeking relief initiated by the grandmother should be merged for consideration by the family court.[15]

The court must also be cognizant of the need to formulate a visitation schedule "as expeditiously as possible[,]" as this Court explained in *Honake*r. 182 W.Va. at 453, 388 S.E.2d 326. Transitions in the life of a child should be fashioned in a manner which minimizes the trauma to the child. The plan "should give due consideration to both parties' work and home schedules and to the parameters of the child's daily school and home life, and should be developed in a manner intended to foster the emotional adjustment" of the child "while not unduly disrupting the lives of the parties or the child[]." Id. As this Court in Honaker advised:

> No matter how artfully or deliberately the trial court judge draws the plan for these coming months, however, its success and indeed the chances for [the child's] future happiness and emotional security will rely heavily on the efforts of these two [caretakers]. The work that lies ahead for both of them is not without inconvenience and sacrifice on both sides. Their energies should not be directed even partially at any continued rancor at one another, but must be fully directed at developing

Affirmed in part; reversed in part; and remanded.

[16]As in other child custody matters, the visitation schedule will be subject to modification as circumstances warrant.

The Opinion of the Court was delivered PER CURIAM.

SYLLABUS BY THE COURT

1. "Although conclusions of law reached by a circuit court are subject to de novo review, when an action, such as an abuse and neglect case, is tried upon the facts without a jury, the circuit court shall make a determination based upon the evidence and shall make findings of fact and conclusions of law as to whether such child is abused or neglected. These findings shall not be set aside by a reviewing court unless clearly erroneous. A finding is clearly erroneous when, although there is evidence to support the finding, the reviewing court on the entire evidence is left with the definite and firm conviction that a mistake has been committed. However, a reviewing court may not overturn a finding simply because it would have decided the case differently, and it must affirm a finding if the circuit court's account of the evidence is plausible in light of the record reviewed in its entirety." Syl. pt. 1, In Interest of Tiffany Marie S., 196 W. Va. 223, 470 S.E.2d 177 (1996).

2. "[This Court] may, sua sponte, in the interest of justice, notice plain error." Syl. pt. 1, in part, State v. Myers, 204 W. Va. 449, 513 S.E.2d 676 (1998).

3. "To trigger application of the 'plain error' doctrine, there must be (1) an error; (2) that is plain; (3) that affects substantial rights; and (4) seriously affects the fairness, integrity, or public reputation of the judicial proceedings." Syl. pt. 7, State v. Miller, 194 W. Va. 3, 459 S.E.2d 114 (1995).

4. "[T]he burden of proof in a child neglect or abuse case does not shift from the State Department of [Health and Human Resources] to the parent, guardian or custodian of the child. It remains upon the State Department of [Health and Human Resources] throughout the proceedings." Syl. pt. 2, in part, In Interest of S.C., 168 W. Va. 366, 284 S.E.2d 867 (1981).

5. "The presence of one of the factors outlined in W. Va. Code, 49-6-5b(a)(3) [1998] merely lowers the threshold of evidence necessary for the termination of parental rights. W. Va. Code, 49-6-5b(a)(3) [1998] does not mandate that a circuit court terminate parental rights merely upon the filing of a petition filed pursuant to the statute, and the Department of Health and Human Resources continues to bear the burden of proving that the subject child is abused or neglected pursuant to W. Va. Code, 49-6-2 [1996]." Syl. pt. 5, In re George Glen B., Jr., 207 W. Va. 346, 532 S.E.2d 64 (2000).

6. "To be 'plain,' the error must be 'clear' or 'obvious.'" Syl. pt. 8, in part, State v. Miller, 194 W. Va. 3, 459 S.E.2d 114 (1995).

7. "Assuming that an error is 'plain,' the inquiry must proceed to its last step and a determination made as to whether it affects the substantial rights of the [petitioner]. To affect substantial rights means the error was prejudicial. It must have affected the outcome of the proceedings in the circuit court . . . ." Syl. pt. 9, in part, State v. Miller, 194 W. Va. 3, 459 S.E.2d 114 (1995).

8. "In the law concerning custody of minor children, no rule is more firmly established than that the right of a natural parent to the custody of his or her infant child is paramount to that of any other person; it is a fundamental personal liberty protected and guaranteed by the Due Process Clauses of the West Virginia and United States Constitutions." Syl. pt. 1, In re Willis, 157 W. Va. 225, 207 S.E.2d 129 (1973).

9. "The standard of proof required to support a court order limiting or terminating parental rights to the custody of minor children is clear, cogent and convincing proof." Syl. pt. 6, In re Willis, 157 W. Va. 225, 207 S.E.2d 129 (1973).

10. "Failure to observe a constitutional right constitutes reversible error unless it can be shown that the error was harmless beyond a reasonable doubt." Syl. pt. 5, State ex rel. Grob v. Blair, 158 W. Va. 647, 214 S.E.2d 330 (1975).

Per Curiam:

Petitioner Ashley L. appeals the August 21, 2013, order of the Circuit Court of Wetzel County that terminated her parental rights to her daughter, K.L.[1] Because this Court finds plain error in the proceedings below, we reverse the circuit court's order and remand for proceedings as directed in this opinion.

I. FACTS

On or about July 17, 2012, Respondent Department of Health and Human Resources (hereinafter "DHHR" or "the Department") filed a petition to institute abuse and neglect proceedings against Petitioner Ashley L. regarding her child K.L. The petition was filed pursuant to W. Va. Code § 49-6-5b(a)(3) (2006), which requires the DHHR to file such a petition when the parental rights of the parent to a sibling of the subject child have been terminated involuntarily.[2] The petition alleged, inter alia, that on May 6, 2008, in Marion County, the petitioner's parental rights were terminated as to child C.W., a sibling of K.L.[3]

[1] As is customary in cases involving children and sensitive facts, this Court uses initials to identify the parties.

[2] West Virginia Code § 49-6-5b(a)(3) provides in pertinent part: "(a) Except as provided in subsection (b) of this section, the department shall file or join in a petition or otherwise seek a ruling in any pending proceeding to terminate parental rights . . . (3) [if] the parental rights of the parent to a sibling have been terminated involuntarily."

[3] The petition also indicated that the petitioner voluntarily relinquished her parental rights to three other children in 2010.

The DHHR's petition against the petitioner was based solely on the prior involuntary termination. The DHHR requested in the petition that K.L. be placed in the legal custody of the Department and that the physical custody remain with the petitioner pending further proceedings. After a subsequent hearing, the circuit court found in its adjudication order that the petitioner admitted that there was a prior involuntary termination of her parental rights, and therefore the petition was substantiated. The circuit court ordered that K.L. remain in the legal custody of the Department and the physical custody of the petitioner.

In February 2013, the petitioner was the victim of domestic violence when Curtis L., her husband and K.L.'s father, beat the petitioner. Curtis L. was arrested, and the petitioner shortly thereafter filed for divorce. As a result of this domestic violence incident, K.L. was removed from the petitioner's physical custody.

The circuit court held the disposition hearing on the abuse and neglect petition against the petitioner on August 2, 2013. At the beginning of the hearing, the circuit court noted that "the unique posture of [the case] is that the burden of proof is upon the parents to prove a substantial change in circumstances such that their parental rights should not be terminated." At the close of the hearing, the circuit court found as follows:

> I believe it's West Virginia 49-6 and 5; burden is upon, not the Department, being represented by the Prosecuting > Attorney, but upon the parents in this instance, Curtis and Ashley [L.] to prove substantial change in circumstances.

>
> I would suppose and would believe that the burden of proof would be by clear and convincing evidence insofar as that's what the burden of proof is on the Department to prove that, at an adjudication, abuse and/or neglect, but even if I lowered the standard to preponderance of the evidence, the Court is not satisfied that Curtis and Ashley [L.] have, with all due respect, met their burden of proof to satisfy the Court that they have substantially changed their circumstances as since having previously been involuntarily terminated from the parental rights of prior children.
> With that, the burden does not shift to the Department then to put on a case to prove otherwise.[4]

(Footnote added). Accordingly, by order dated August 21, 2013, the circuit court terminated the petitioner's parental rights to K.L. after finding that the petitioner failed to meet her burden of showing a change in her circumstances since the termination of her parental rights to C.W.[5] The petitioner now appeals this order.

II. STANDARD OF REVIEW

In this case, we are asked to review an order that terminated the petitioner's parental rights. Our applicable standard of review is as follows:

> Although conclusions of law reached by a circuit court are subject to de novo review, when an action, such as an abuse and neglect case, is tried upon the facts without a jury, the circuit court shall make a determination based upon the evidence and shall make findings of fact and conclusions of

[4] This burden of proof was reiterated in the circuit court's disposition order which stated: "Whereupon, the Court further found that even if he lowered [the burden of proof] to just preponderance that the Court would not be satisfied that a change in circumstances had occurred since the involuntary relinquishment of the other children."

[5] The circuit court's order also terminated the parental rights of Curtis L., K.L.'s father, to K.L.; however, he is not a party to this appeal.

> law as to whether such child is abused or neglected. These findings shall not be set aside by a reviewing court unless clearly erroneous. A finding is clearly erroneous when, although there is evidence to support the finding, the reviewing court on the entire evidence is left with the definite and firm conviction that a mistake has been committed. However, a reviewing court may not overturn a finding simply because it would have decided the case differently, and it must affirm a finding if the circuit court's account of the evidence is plausible in light of the record reviewed in its entirety.

Syl. Pt. 1, In Interest of Tiffany Marie S., 196 W. Va. 223, 470 S.E.2d 177 (1996). Our decision in this case hinges on an issue of law which we review de novo.

III. DISCUSSION

The petitioner's sole assignment of error is that the circuit court erred in terminating her parental rights to K.L. because the evidence did not meet the standard required for termination of parental rights under our law. The DHHR and the guardian ad litem posit that the petitioner's parental rights were properly terminated. This Court finds, however, that the parties' arguments are not dispositive of our decision in this case. Instead, we find that the circuit court committed reversible error below by shifting the burden to the petitioner to show a change in her circumstances since the previous involuntary termination of her parental rights. Even though the petitioner did not raise this issue in her appeal, this Court sua sponte notices plain error in the circuit court's burden shifting.[6]

[6] Although the practice of noticing plain error sua sponte is usually applied in criminal cases, it is not exclusive to such cases. Recently, in Cartwright v. McComas, 223

In syllabus point 1, in part, of State v. Myers, 204 W. Va. 449, 513 S.E.2d 676 (1998), we held that "[this Court] may, sua sponte, in the interest of justice, notice plain error." Our plain error analysis involves a four-step test. "To trigger application of the 'plain error' doctrine, there must be (1) an error; (2) that is plain; (3) that affects substantial rights; and (4) seriously affects the fairness, integrity, or public reputation of the judicial proceedings." Syl. pt. 7, State v. Miller, 194 W. Va. 3, 459 S.E.2d 114 (1995). This Court finds that the circuit court's burden-shifting below constitutes error, in that it deviated from a rule of law of this Court. See Syl. pt. 8, in part, Id. (holding that "[a] deviation from a rule of law is error unless there is a waiver" which is "a knowing and intentional relinquishment or abandonment of a known right"). The rule of law from which the circuit court deviated is found in syllabus point 2, in part, of In Interest of S.C., 168 W. Va. 366, 284 S.E.2d 867 (1981), which holds that "the burden of proof in a child neglect or abuse case does not shift from the State Department of [Health and Human Resources] to the parent, guardian or custodian of the child. It remains upon the State Department of [Health and Human Resources] throughout the proceedings."

More recently and more specific to the instant case, this Court held in syllabus point 5 of In re George Glen B., Jr., 207 W. Va. 346, 532 S.E.2d 64 (2000):

> The presence of one of the factors outlined in W. Va. Code, 49-6-5b(a)(3) [1998] merely lowers the threshold of

W. Va. 161, 672 S.E.2d 297 (2008), this Court applied the doctrine in an appeal involving a claim of medical malpractice. In that case, we cited, inter alia, 2A Fed. Proc., L.Ed. § 3:860 (acknowledging the power of federal courts to apply the plain error doctrine in appeals of civil as well as criminal cases).

> evidence necessary for the termination of parental rights. W. Va. Code, 49-6-5b(a)(3) [1998] does not mandate that a circuit court terminate parental rights merely upon the filing of a petition filed pursuant to the statute, and the Department of Health and Human Resources continues to bear the burden of proving that the subject child is abused or neglected pursuant to W. Va. Code, 49-6-2 [1996].

This Court made clear in In re George Glen B., Jr., that "while the Department does have a mandatory duty to file a petition, a circuit court may not terminate parental rights without additional evidence of abuse or neglect of the current child." Id., at 350, 532 S.E.2d at 68. Therefore, under our law, it is clear that the DHHR retains the burden of showing by clear and convincing evidence, even in a case in which there has been a prior termination of parental rights, that the subject child is neglected or abused.[7] [7] With regard to neglect and abuse cases involving prior termination of parental rights, this Court has held:

> Where there has been a prior involuntary termination of parental rights to a sibling, the issue of whether the parent has remedied the problems which led to the prior involuntary termination sufficient to parent a subsequently-born child must, at minimum, be reviewed by a court, and such review should be initiated on a petition pursuant to the provisions governing the procedure in cases of child neglect or abuse set forth in West Virginia Code §§ 49-6-1 to -12 (1998). Although the requirement that such a petition be filed does not mandate termination in all circumstances, the legislature has reduced the minimum threshold of evidence necessary for termination where one of the four factors outlined in West Virginia Code § 49-6-5b(a) (1998) is present.

Syl. pt. 2, In re George Glen B., Jr., 205 W. Va. 435, 518 S.E.2d 863 (1999). In addition, we have held:

> When an abuse and neglect petition is brought based solely upon a previous involuntary termination of parental

In addition, this Court finds that the error is plain. "To be 'plain,' the error must be 'clear' or 'obvious.'" Syl. pt. 8, in part, Miller, 194 W. Va. 3, 459 S.E.2d 114. The circuit court stated clearly on the record that under the facts of this case the burden shifted to the petitioner to show a substantial change in circumstances since the previous termination of her parental rights. Thus, the circuit court's error is obvious to this Court.

Finally, "[a]ssuming that an error is 'plain,' the inquiry must proceed to its last step and a determination made as to whether it affects the substantial rights of the [petitioner]. To affect substantial rights means the error was prejudicial. It must have affected the outcome of the proceedings in the circuit court . . . . " Syl. pt. 9, in part, Id. There can be no doubt that the circuit court's burden shifting prejudiced the substantial rights of the petitioner. This Court has recognized that > rights to a sibling pursuant to West Virginia Code § 49-6-5b(a)(3) (1998), prior to the lower court's making any disposition regarding the petition, it must allow the development of evidence surrounding the prior involuntary termination(s) and what actions, if any, the parent(s) have taken to remedy the circumstances which led to the prior termination(s).

Syl. pt. 4, In re George Glen B., Jr., supra.

Syl. pt. 1, In re Willis, 157 W. Va. 225, 207 S.E.2d 129 (1973). As a result, "[t]he standard of proof required to support a court order limiting or terminating parental rights to the custody of minor children is clear, cogent and convincing proof." Syl. pt. 6, Id. Significantly, this burden of proof is a constitutional imperative. In Santosky v. Kramer, 455 U.S. 745, 747 (1982), the United States Supreme Court held that the Due Process Clause of the Fourteenth Amendment of the Federal Constitution demands more than a showing of "a fair preponderance of the evidence" to extinguish the parent-child relationship." Instead, opined the Court, "[b]efore a State may sever completely and irrevocably the rights of parents in their natural child, due process requires that the State support its allegations [of abuse and/or neglect] by at least clear and convincing evidence." 455 U.S. at 747–48. Thus, we find that the circuit court below violated the petitioner's constitutional due process rights when it shifted the burden to her to show a change in circumstances since the previous termination of the petitioner's parental rights to another child.

Further, this Court has held that "[f]ailure to observe a constitutional right constitutes reversible error unless it can be shown that the error was harmless beyond a reasonable doubt." Syl. pt. 5, State ex rel. Grob v. Blair, 158 W. Va. 647, 214 S.E.2d 330 (1975). In the instant case, the constitutional error in burden shifting was not harmless beyond a reasonable doubt. Significantly, the circuit court did not require the DHHR to adduce evidence or provide testimony at the dispositional hearing that the petitioner abused or neglected K.L. Moreover, the circuit court's termination of the petitioner's parental rights to K.L. clearly was based on the fact that the petitioner failed to meet her burden of showing a change in circumstances. Therefore, this Court finds that the circuit court violated the petitioner's due process rights when it shifted the burden of proof to the petitioner, and that this violation clearly prejudiced the petitioner.

Finally, this Court notes the legally unsound arguments of the DHHR and the guardian ad litem before this Court to the effect that despite any procedural irregularities in the proceedings below, the dispositive factor in this case is the best interests of K.L. First, terminating the parental rights of the petitioner to K.L. based on shifting the burden of proof to her to show that she did not neglect and or abuse K.L. is not a mere procedural irregularity, but rather a constitutional due process error. Second, the best interests of the child do not become paramount until the child's parents are found to be unfit. Until that time, the best interests of the parents and children are presumed to be the same. As the Supreme Court said in Santosky, it is not until "[a]fter the State has established parental unfitness . . . that the interests of the child and the natural parents do diverge. . . . [U]ntil the State proves parental unfitness, the child and his [or her] parents share a vital interest in preventing erroneous termination of their natural relationship." 455 U.S. at 760 (footnote omitted). Indeed, if a parent's unfitness did not have to be shown prior to considering a child's best interests, the State could simply dispense with due process procedures and simply remove children from fit parents who may be poor or uneducated and place them with fit parents who may be more affluent and or better educated based on the State's belief that it knows what is best for a child.

In sum, this Court finds that the circuit court committed reversible error in shifting the burden to the petitioner in the instant abuse and neglect case. As noted above, the burden of proof never shifts from the DHHR to the parent throughout a case involving allegations of child abuse and neglect. Upon remand of this case, if the DHHR chooses to go forward in alleging abuse and neglect against the petitioner, we direct the circuit court to follow the points of law set forth by this Court in In re George Glen B., Jr., 207 W. Va. 346, 532 S.E.2d 64 (2000). Specifically, the burden remains with the DHHR to show by clear and convincing evidence that the petitioner committed abuse and/or neglect of K.L. in addition to showing the previous termination of the petitioner's parental rights to a sibling of K.L. As noted above, the DHHR's petition against the petitioner was based solely on the prior involuntary termination, without further allegations. There must be specific allegations and evidence of abuse or neglect of K.L., which could include demonstrating that K.L. was abused and/or neglected by showing the petitioner failed to correct the conditions that led to the prior termination of her parental rights and/or that other circumstances exist which would establish abuse and/or neglect.

Consequently, on remand, if such circumstances exist, the DHHR should file an amended abuse and neglect petition that includes any developments subsequent to the filing of the original petition that are relevant to the petitioner's fitness as a parent to K.L., including anything that occurred during the petitioner's improvement period. However, the circuit court must remain mindful that > [i]n making the final disposition in a child abuse and neglect proceeding, the level of a parent's compliance with the terms and conditions of an improvement period is just one factor to be considered. The controlling standard that governs any dispositional decision remains the best interests of the child.

Syl. pt. 4, In Re B.H., 233 W. Va. 57, 753 S.E.2d 743 (2014). Because the child is in placement, such petition should be filed within sixty days of this opinion. If no such petition is filed and if the child is to be returned to the mother, the lower court should develop a plan of gradual transition, pursuant to James M. v. Maynard, 185 W. Va. 648, 408 S.E.2d 400 (1991),[8] calculated to minimize emotional trauma to the child.

IV. CONCLUSION

For the reasons set forth above, this Court reverses the August 21, 2013, order of the Circuit Court of Wetzel County that terminated Petitioner Ashley L.'s parental rights to K.L., and we remand this case to the circuit court for proceedings as directed in this opinion.

Reversed and remanded with directions.

[8] Syllabus point 3 of James M. provides as follows:

> It is a traumatic experience for children to undergo sudden and dramatic changes in their permanent custodians. Lower courts in cases such as these should provide, whenever possible, for a gradual transition period, especially where young children are involved. Further, such gradual transition periods should be developed in a manner intended to foster the emotional adjustment of the children to this change and to maintain as much stability as possible in their lives.

SYLLABUS BY THE COURT

LOUGHRY, Justice:

The joint petitioners, the West Virginia Department of Health and Human Resources ("DHHR") and Rebecca Tate, guardian ad litem ("GAL") for all of the minor children in this abuse and neglect case, appeal the "Amended Final Adjudication Order Dismissing Petitions" entered by the Circuit Court of Marion County on September 3, 2014. The circuit court dismissed an abuse and neglect petition that was filed against the respondents herein, R.C. and A.C.,[1] upon concluding that the DHHR failed to prove the allegations in the petition by the requisite standard of clear and convincing evidence. Based upon this Court's thorough review and consideration of the appendix record, arguments of counsel, and applicable precedent, we reverse the circuit court's order and remand this case for further proceedings consistent with this opinion.

I. Factual and Procedural Background

On July 1, 2013, K.P., a thirteen-year-old girl, disclosed that her stepfather, the respondent R.C., had engaged in sexual misconduct against her. Following an investigation, the DHHR filed a petition in the circuit court initiating the underlying abuse and neglect case

[1]Because this case involves children and sensitive matters, we follow our practice of using initials to refer to the children and their parents. See W.Va. R. App. P. 40(e); State v. Edward Charles L., 183 W.Va. 641, 645 n. 1, 398 S.E.2d 123, 127 n. 1 (1990). Two of the minor children who have the same initials are referred to herein as I.C.-1 and I.C.-2.

pursuant to the provisions of West Virginia Code §§ 49-6-1 to -12 (2014).[2] The DHHR removed all of the children from the home.[3] The initial petition filed in this matter alleged that R.C. sexually abused K.P., and that K.P.'s mother, the respondent A.C., failed to protect K.P. from the abusing parent. Subsequently, after additional information was obtained, the DHHR amended its petition to add allegations that A.C. committed acts of emotional abuse against K.P.

In multiple interviews conducted for purposes of this abuse and neglect proceeding, K.P. consistently made the following assertions.[4] On the morning of July 1, [2]During the 2015 Regular Session, the West Virginia Legislature repealed West Virginia Code §§ 49-1-1 through 49-11-10 and recodified these statutes, with some revisions, into West Virginia Code §§ 49-1-101 through 49-7-304. The references in this opinion are to the statutes as they existed during the pendency of the proceedings below.

[3]On July 1, 2013, K.P. lived in the home of her mother and stepfather, A.C. and R.C. Other children in the home were four-year-old I.C.-1, who is the daughter of R.C. and A.C.; and ten-year-old I.C.-2 and fourteen-year-old G.C., who are R.C.'s children from a prior relationship. K.P. was placed with her biological father; I.C.-1 was placed with an aunt; and I.C.-2 and G.C. were placed with their biological mother with whom they resided during the school year.

[4]Regarding her allegations of abuse, K.P. was interviewed by Detective Jeanette Williamson of the Marion County Sheriff's Department, Child Protective Services Worker Stacy Miller, Psychologist Dr. Adrienne A. Bean, and, upon the respondents' motion, Psychiatrist Dr. Bobby A. Miller. All four of the interviewers testified at the adjudicatory hearing, and video recordings of the interviews conducted by Ms. Miller and Dr. Miller are in the appendix record. Finding that the information K.P. gave in each of the interviews was "consistent with no discrepancies," and that forcing the child to testify in court could be detrimental to her psychological well-being, the circuit court quashed a subpoena that would have required K.P. to testify. Accordingly, for purposes of adjudication, the circuit court relied upon K.P.'s statements made in the interviews.

2013, she was texting from her cellular telephone while lying on her bed in the home she shared with her mother, stepfather, and other family members. Her mother was not home. At approximately 10:00 a.m., her stepfather R.C. entered her bedroom and began rubbing her back both over and under her shirt. When she rolled over, he rubbed her stomach, lifted her shirt, and rubbed her breasts. She was not wearing a bra. R.C. also rubbed K.P.'s vaginal area over her clothes, going back and forth between rubbing her vaginal area and breasts. He then asked if he could lick her breasts, to which K.P. responded "no." K.P. asked him to leave the bedroom, but he remained for approximately thirty minutes longer and rubbed her back. K.P. communicated via text messages with a friend who told her to lock herself in a room and telephone her parents for help.[5] After R.C. left the bedroom, K.P. tried to call her mother, her biological father R.P., and R.P.'s wife A.P. She was able to reach A.P., who agreed to immediately come and remove K.P. from the house. As K.P. was packing some personal belongings and waiting for her stepmother, R.C. returned to her bedroom, begged her not to tell anyone what had happened, and offered to buy her whatever she wanted if she kept the events secret. He followed K.P. into the kitchen, making the same pleas. He said that she would ruin his life, he would go to jail, and he would be unable to see his other kids. When K.P. told him that A.P. was on the way, R.C. said that he needed to get out of there because he was going to jail.

[5]No text messages were offered into evidence in the adjudicatory hearing. However, A.C. testified that she saw these texts on K.P.'s telephone.

K.P. also revealed that R.C. had touched her in this manner on multiple occasions throughout the previous year.[6] She indicated that in the initial occurrences, he had just rubbed her back and she had not realized that the touching was sexual. In later episodes, R.C. rubbed additional areas of her body including her breasts, her buttocks, and her vaginal area both over and under her clothes but without penetration. She reported that this misconduct occurred both at home and when she traveled with her stepfather for his work. K.P. explained that she had not previously disclosed her stepfather's actions because she was "creeped out" and did not know what to do. She felt that her mother would not believe her and would take her stepfather's side. She also had some fear that her stepfather might hurt her.[7] K.P. explained that the episode on July 1, 2013, was the first time R.C. had ever asked to lick her breasts, and she worried that this request could lead to sexual intercourse. K.P. indicated that it was the request to lick her breasts that convinced her of the need to tell someone.

The stepmother, A.P., testified that when K.P. called her on July 1, 2013, K.P. was crying and unable to speak about what had happened. K.P. agreed to explain the problem in a text message. A.P. testified that after reading the text message, she told K.P.

[6]K.P. gave consistent reports about what her stepfather did to her in the prior incidents. However, as discussed below, the circuit court found that K.P. gave varying accounts regarding the frequency of the prior abuse.

[7]Both K.P. and I.C.-2 revealed in their respective interviews that R.C. had hit A.C. in the past. However, A.C. testified that R.C. had never hit her.

to pack a bag because she would immediately leave work and pick K.P. up. A.P. testified that when she arrived at the home, which was about a one-hour drive from her workplace, K.P. was outside and hiding behind a neighbor's house. A.P. observed that K.P. had been crying, had a shaky voice, and was upset.

A.P. drove K.P. to a nearby gas station where she had arranged to meet K.P.'s father, R.P. Meanwhile, the respondent mother A.C., having received calls on her cellular telephone from both R.P. and the respondent R.C., also arrived at the gas station. A.C. brought K.P. into her parked car and began questioning K.P. while recording the conversation on her telephone. The recording was later played for the investigating sheriff's deputy and a child protective services ("CPS") worker, but was not offered into evidence at the abuse and neglect adjudicatory hearing. Reportedly, during this conversation A.C. told her daughter that she was going to ruin R.C.'s life, that A.C. herself had been sexually abused, and that sexual abuse "is something you just live with in shame." K.P. says that A.C. also "fake cried" and expressed concern that the allegations could hurt A.C.'s job. A.P. testified that when K.P. got out of the parked car, K.P. was upset that her mother did not believe her.

After K.P.'s father, R.P., arrived at the gas station, they all proceeded to the Marion County Sheriff's Department to file a report. Sheriff's Deputy, now Sheriff's Detective, Jeanette Williamson conducted an initial interview of K.P. At Detective Williamson's request, R.C. was telephoned and came to the police station. However, he refused to speak with police without a lawyer. Detective Williamson referred the matter to CPS for a further interview of the child.

A CPS worker, Stacy Miller, interviewed K.P. the next day, July 2, 2013. During the adjudicatory hearing Ms. Miller testified about this interview, including K.P.'s description of the sexual abuse and A.C.'s reaction to her daughter's report. Ms. Miller also testified that she observed K.P. lose eye contact and shy away when telling about R.C.'s request to lick her breasts. Ms. Miller did not perceive that K.P. was exaggerating her allegations. Detective Williamson testified that K.P.'s disclosures to Ms. Miller, which were videotaped and which Detective Williamson observed from another room, had no major differences or elaborations from the initial report.

During the course of the abuse and neglect investigation, K.P. underwent an interview and diagnostic testing by psychologist Dr. Adrienne A. Bean. Dr. Bean testified at the adjudicatory hearing and recounted K.P.'s allegations of sexual abuse. Dr. Bean also provided information that K.P. revealed about her mother, including that A.C. obsessed about K.P.'s weight and placed limits on the food K.P. could have. K.P. said that while she and her parents were at the gas station and she was reporting the sexual abuse, A.C. was more concerned that K.P. had eaten macaroni and cheese that morning. K.P. also told Dr. Bean that A.C. hit her, called her vulgar names such as "fing fat a" and "csucker," and told K.P. that she would rather be dead than have K.P. as a daughter.

Dr. Bean reported that the test results showed K.P. to be slightly defensive, but there was nothing to indicate she is untrustworthy, deceitful, or has delinquency issues. The psychologist found K.P. to be very insightful and mature with good self esteem. Dr. Bean also felt that K.P. was being open and honest about the things she had been through, and found she was consistent in describing the alleged abuse. K.P. was not exhibiting any mental health or social-emotional symptoms, but Dr. Bean explained that not all child victims exhibit such symptoms and these issues may develop later. Dr. Bean concluded that K.P. is resilient and has been able to cope using her current skills.

R.P. testified that on July 1, 2013, he spoke with his wife on the telephone and learned of the allegations. He immediately called the respondent A.C. According to R.P., even though A.C. had not yet talked to their daughter, A.C. disputed that any sexual abuse had occurred. Rather, A.C. suggested that R.C. had merely rubbed the child's shoulders. A.C. arrived at the gas station before R.P. did. R.P. recalled that when he arrived, instead of focusing on the report of molestation, A.C. was more concerned that K.P. had been talking to a boy online and had eaten macaroni and cheese. R.P. testified that after K.P. told him about her stepfather's actions, he made the decision that they would immediately go to the sheriff's office to make a report. He said that his daughter is well-behaved and truthful with him.

R.P. also testified that he had witnessed A.C. engage in inappropriate parenting in the past, including calling K.P. derogatory names and obsessing about their daughter's diet. Both R.P. and A.P. testified about a bruise they saw on K.P.'s foot, which K.P. said was inflicted by A.C. Furthermore, A.C.'s sister testified that she saw A.C. smack K.P. in the mouth a few times when the child was younger.

The respondent stepfather, R.C., who was also facing criminal charges for the alleged sexual conduct against K.P., did not testify in the abuse and neglect adjudicatory hearing. However, his lawyer presented the testimony and report of psychologist Dr. William Fremouw, who had administered diagnostic tests to R.C. According to Dr. Fremouw, the test results indicate that R.C. lacks the two most common characteristics of convicted sex offenders: an antisocial-psychopathic personality combined with the presence of cognitive schemas or attitudes that justify adult-child or adult forced sexual interactions. Nonetheless, Dr. Fremouw made clear that his evaluation could not prove whether R.C. did, or did not, commit the alleged abuse.

The respondent mother, A.C., did testify at the adjudicatory hearing. She denied abusing K.P., denied calling K.P. vulgar names or calling her fat, and asserted she only restricted unhealthy food from K.P.'s diet. She denied engaging in any physical abuse, stating she had only spanked K.P. when the child was younger. A.C. admitted, however, that two or three months before these allegations, she had "smacked" K.P. in the mouth after repeatedly telling her to "shut up." A.C. indicated that K.P. has behavioral issues, lies, and is difficult to parent. A.C. testified that on July 1, 2013, her husband called her at work to say that K.P. was alleging inappropriate touching. Although she did not yet know any specific information about the allegations, A.C. immediately thought that R.C. had just rubbed the girl's back, something she had seen him do in the past. At the adjudicatory hearing, A.C. acknowledged that she does not believe her daughter's allegations of sexual abuse, finding the allegations to be unlikely and illogical. She testified that she knew K.P. was lying on July 1, 2013, by the look on her daughter's face.

A.C. asserted that K.P. was upset over the recent death of K.P.'s maternal grandmother, who was K.P.'s primary caretaker for many years. A.C. related that she and K.P. often argued, and K.P. did not like that she placed limits on junk food and access to electronic devices. According to A.C., K.P. fabricated the abuse allegations because she wanted to move to her father's home. A.C. indicated that K.P. prefers her father, and her father imposes fewer restrictions.

Dr. Amy Wilson Strange performed a parental fitness evaluation on A.C. and testified on A.C.'s behalf. Dr. Strange concluded that A.C. possesses the qualities and abilities needed to appropriately parent her daughters and has a very low risk of maltreating her children or allowing another person to do so. However, Dr. Strange admitted that she knew little about the allegations in this case, and all of her information came from interviewing and testing A.C.

Finally, upon the motion of the respondent parents, K.P. was interviewed and tested by psychiatrist Dr. Bobby A. Miller. Dr. Miller concluded that K.P. is an adolescent who believes she can manage herself better than the adults in her life; that her allegations are "very simple" and impossible to physically prove or disprove; that K.P.'s presentation was a reaction to her grandmother's death; and that this legal proceeding is actually about K.P.'s mother and K.P.'s desire to not live in her mother's home. Dr. Miller admitted, however, that K.P.'s allegations are consistent and there are no indications that she is untrustworthy.

After a multi-day adjudicatory hearing, the circuit court concluded that the DHHR had not met its burden of proving that K.P. was abused by either of the respondents.[8] The court also found that R.C.'s refusal to testify and rebut the abuse charges could not be used as evidence against him. Accordingly, the circuit court dismissed the abuse and neglect petition in an amended final order entered on September 3, 2014. It is from this order that the DHHR and GAL jointly appeal.[9]

II. Standard of Review

For appeals of abuse and neglect orders, "we employ a compound standard of review: conclusions of law are subject to a de novo review, while findings of fact are weighed against a clearly erroneous standard." In re Emily, 208 W.Va. 325, 332, 540 S.E.2d 542, 549 (2000). These standards were announced in syllabus point one of In re Tiffany Marie S., 196 W.Va. 223, 470 S.E.2d 177 (1996):

> Although conclusions of law reached by a circuit court are subject to de novo review, when an action, such as an abuse and neglect case, is tried upon the facts without a jury, the circuit court shall make a determination based upon the evidence and shall make findings of fact and conclusions of law as to whether such child is abused or neglected. These findings shall not be set aside by a reviewing court unless clearly erroneous. A finding is clearly erroneous when, although there is evidence to support the finding, the reviewing court on the entire evidence is left with the definite and firm conviction that a mistake has been committed. However, a reviewing court may not overturn a finding simply because it would have decided the case differently, and it must affirm a finding if the circuit court's account of the evidence is plausible in light of the record viewed in its entirety.

With these standards in mind, we turn to the parties' arguments.

[9]On September 17, 2014, this Court stayed the circuit court's order pending appeal.

III. Discussion

A. Respondent R.C.'s Silence

We begin our analysis with the issue of the respondent stepfather's refusal to testify at the abuse and neglect adjudicatory hearing. The DHHR and GAL argue that R.C.'s failure to respond to the evidence offered against him should be considered as affirmative evidence of his culpability. R.C. disagrees, arguing that the circuit court correctly ruled that a respondent parent's silence during the adjudicatory stage of an abuse and neglect proceeding is not evidence of misconduct.

This legal issue was squarely addressed in West Virginia Department of Health and Human Resources ex rel. Wright v. Doris S., 197 W.Va. 489, 475 S.E.2d 865 (1996). In Doris S., an adult referred to as David E. was living in the household of a child who died as a result of shaken baby syndrome. Although David E. was not the deceased child's parent and was not accused of inflicting the fatal injuries, an abuse and neglect petition was filed against him alleging that he knowingly allowed the abuse to occur. See W.Va. Code § 49-1-3(1)(A) (2014) (defining "abused child" to include one whose parent, guardian, or custodian knowingly allows another person to commit abuse in the home). David E. chose to remain silent in the abuse and neglect proceeding, thereby failing to take steps to identify the perpetrator who caused the child's death. Ultimately, we affirmed the circuit court's order terminating David E.'s parental rights to his own children, recognizing that his actions in failing to identify the abuser created such a hostile and unsafe atmosphere that it effectively placed his children in jeopardy had they remained in his custody. Doris S., 197 W.Va. at 499, 475 S.E.2d at 875.

With regard to David E.'s silence, we found "[t]here is no basis in law for requiring that a court be disallowed from considering a parent's or guardian's choice to remain silent as evidence of civil culpability." Id. at 497, 485 S.E.2d at 873. In reaching this conclusion, this Court reasoned as follows:

> [A]s the United States Supreme Court stated in Baxter v. Palmigiano, 425 U.S. 308, 96 S.Ct. 1551, 47 L.Ed.2d 810 (1976), "the prevailing rule [is] that the Fifth Amendment does not forbid adverse inferences against parties to civil actions when they refuse to testify in response to probative evidence offered against them: the Amendment 'does not preclude the inference where the privilege is claimed by a party to a civil cause.'" Id. at 318, 96 S.Ct. at 1558 (quoting 8 J. Wigmore, Evidence 439 (McNaughton rev. 1961); see 1 Franklin D. Cleckley, Handbook on Evidence for West Virginia Lawyers § 5–2(B)(1) (3rd ed. 1994). Moreover, "aside from the privilege against compelled self-incrimination, the Court has consistently recognized that in proper circumstances silence in the face of accusation is a relevant fact not barred by the Due Process Clause." 425 U.S. at 319, 96 S.Ct. at 1558. "'Silence is often evidence of the most persuasive character.'" Id. (quoting United States ex rel. Bilokumsky v. Tod, 263 U.S. 149, 153–54, 44 S.Ct. 54, 56, 68 L.Ed. 221 (1923)).

Doris S., 197 W.Va. at 498, 475 S.E.2d at 874 (footnote omitted). We also recognized the remedial, non-punitive, purpose of abuse and neglect proceedings and determined that the invocation of silence by a parent or guardian goes to the very heart of the issue of whether the situation is treatable. Id. Accordingly, we held the following:

> Because the purpose of an abuse and neglect proceeding is remedial, where the parent or guardian fails to respond to probative evidence offered against him/her during the course of an abuse and neglect proceeding, a lower court may properly consider that individual's silence as affirmative evidence of that individual's culpability.

Id. at 492, 475 S.E.2d at 868, syl. pt. 2.

We acknowledged in Doris S. that a parent or guardian might decide to remain silent because he or she is also facing criminal charges. However, even if he or she makes that choice, the silence can nonetheless be considered in the abuse and neglect proceeding. The rights of the criminally accused are sufficiently protected by various statutory protections. Id. at 497-98 n. 22, 475 S.E.2d at 873-74 n. 22.[10]

[10]The statutes cited in Doris S. as providing protections for a parent or guardian who is also charged criminally include West Virginia Code § 49-6-4(a) (1995), prohibiting evidence acquired as the result of a person's medical or mental examination from being used against that person in a subsequent criminal proceeding, and West Virginia Code § 57-2-3 (1966), providing that in a criminal prosecution other than for perjury or false swearing, evidence shall not be given against the accused of any statement made by him as a witness upon a legal examination. See also In re Daniel D., 211 W.Va. 79, 562 S.E.2d 147 (2002) (discussing statutory protections accorded persons accused of both civil and criminal abuse and neglect).

The situation of a parent or guardian facing simultaneous criminal charges was discussed more fully in a subsequent abuse and neglect case, In re Daniel D., 211 W.Va. 79, 562 S.E.2d 147 (2002). In Daniel D., the circuit court adjudicated a father as abusive for engaging in sexual conduct against his daughter. The father had elected to remain silent in the abuse and neglect proceeding because of related criminal charges. He argued that he faced a "Hobson's Choice" in the abuse and neglect case because he could not satisfy a post-adjudication improvement period without obtaining sex offender treatment, but no provider would provide this treatment unless he admitted committing sexual abuse. Id. at 83-84, 562 S.E.2d at 151-52. The father contended he was being required to admit to criminal conduct in violation of his Fifth Amendment privilege against self-incrimination. Id. Unpersuaded by the father's arguments, we reaffirmed syllabus point two of Doris S. as being "soundly supported by the authorities and . . . consistent with the policy of this State which encourages prompt hearing of abuse and neglect cases and a paramount concern for the best interests of the children involved in such proceedings." Id. at 87, 562 S.E.2d at 155. We reiterated that "[a]s applied to the issue of culpability, the rule simply confronts the accused parent with a choice: Assert the privilege against self-incrimination with the risk that silence will be considered in the civil proceeding as evidence of culpability, or waive the privilege and offer such evidence as the accused may alone possess to refute the charge of abuse and neglect." Id.[11]

Despite our clear holdings in Doris S. and Daniel D., the circuit court in the case sub judice found that R.C.'s silence could not be considered as evidence that he sexually abused K.P. In the amended order dismissing the abuse and neglect petition, the circuit court attempted to distinguish our case law with the following analysis:

> Neither West Virginia Dept. of Health and Human Resources ex rel. Wright v. Doris S. . . . nor In re Daniel D. . . . controls here. In both [Doris S.] and Daniel D., the court held that a parent's or guardian's silence in the face of an affirmative remedial duty may be considered as substantive evidence in terminating parental rights. In [Doris S.], the parent's silence evinced his failure "to cooperate in the identification of the person responsible for the homicide" of his [sic] child. . . . Similarly, in Daniel D., the parent's silence evinced a "failure to comply with an order to obtain meaningful therapy or rehabilitation" after the trial court had definitively found that the parent had in fact abused the child. . . . In neither case, however, was silence considered substantive evidence that criminal abuse actually occurred. In fact, in Daniel D., the court acknowledged "a very fine, although very important, distinction between terminating parental rights based upon a refusal to waive protections against self-incrimination and terminating parental rights based upon a parent's failure to comply with an order to obtain meaningful > therapy or rehabilitation . . . . The latter is constitutionally permissible; the former is not." 563 S.E.2d at 152-53 (quoting In re Clifford M., 577 N.W.2d 547 (Neb. 1998)). Because [R.C.] is under no duty to comply with a remedial order or affirmative duty under law, this case falls on the other side of the "fine line" drawn in Daniel D.

[11]This Court did afford the father in Daniel D. some relief by remanding the abuse and neglect case with directions that he could obtain a protective order to prevent his statements made during a court-ordered medical, psychological, or psychiatric examination from being used in the criminal case. Id. at 90-91, 562 S.E.2d at 158-59. This protective order was to effectuate the protections afforded by West Virginia Code §§ 49-6-4 and 57-2-3. See supra note 10.

The circuit court's analysis is plainly wrong and reflects a misunderstanding of the law. We expressly held in syllabus point two of Doris S., as reiterated in Daniel D., that a court may properly consider silence as affirmative evidence of culpability for civil abuse and neglect. Contrary to the circuit court's discussion, our holding was not dependent upon the existence of a remedial order or some affirmative duty that the parent or guardian may have in the abuse and neglect proceeding. Moreover, although the circuit court found that R.C. had a basis for remaining silent because he was also facing criminal charges, that was the precise issue in Daniel D., wherein we reaffirmed our holding in Doris S.

The circuit court's reliance on the "fine line" discussed in the Nebraska case, Clifford M., is similarly misplaced. In the Daniel D. opinion, we discussed Clifford M. and other out-of-state cases in the context of examining how various jurisdictions have reconciled competing interests when parents charged with abuse and neglect will not participate in therapy due to concerns about self-incrimination in related criminal cases. Daniel D., 211 W.Va. at 84-86, 562 S.E.2d at 152-154. We proceeded to address that issue by holding that under our West Virginia statutory law, the parent or guardian in an abuse and neglect case is entitled to a protective order for statements given during a court-ordered examination. Id.

at 90, 562 S.E.2d at 158 (stating that "[o]ur review of the statutes, corresponding case law of this state, and authority from other jurisdictions compels our conclusion that West Virginia Code § 49-6-4 was intended to constitute a full and comprehensive prohibition against criminal utilization of information obtained through court-ordered psychological or psychiatric examination . . . ordered in conjunction with abuse and neglect proceedings."). The discussion of Clifford M. in no way modified our holding in Doris S. that silence may be evidence of civil culpability. Indeed, after discussing Clifford M., we emphasized that Doris S. remained viable law. Daniel D., 211 W.Va. at 87, 562 S.E.2d at 155.

We also reject R.C.'s suggestion that culpability may not be deduced from silence during the adjudicatory phase of an abuse and neglect proceeding. He argues that the application of Doris S. and Daniel D. should be limited to the disposition phase. Presumably, this suggestion is based upon the fact that the father in Daniel D. had already been adjudicated as an abusing parent and was confronted with his so-called "Hobson's Choice" in the context of the disposition. See W.Va. Code § 49-6-5 (2014) (pertaining to disposition after circuit court adjudicates child as being abused or neglected). However, nothing in Doris S. or Daniel D. restricted a court's consideration of a parent or guardian's silence to the disposition stage. Syllabus point two of Doris S. expressly addresses "culpability," and culpability for abuse and neglect is the focus of the adjudicatory stage.

Indeed, in Doris S., this issue was discussed with regard to David E.'s adjudication as an abusing parent.

Accordingly, we conclude that the circuit court erred as a matter of law when ruling that silence absent an affirmative remedial order or duty cannot constitute evidence of civil culpability for abuse and neglect. The circuit court's legal conclusion is contrary to syllabus point two of Doris S. See 197 W.Va. at 492, 475 S.E.2d at 868. Furthermore, the circuit court should have considered R.C.'s silence as evidence that he abused K.P. As discussed herein, K.P. gave multiple consistent statements about how her stepfather touched her breasts, buttocks, and vaginal area, and about his request on July 1, 2013, for oral sexual gratification. R.C. utterly failed to respond to those allegations.

B. Evidence of Abuse

Next we examine whether the circuit court erred in concluding that the DHHR did not present clear and convincing evidence that the respondents R.C. and A.C. committed abuse. With regard to the DHHR's burden, we have repeatedly held that

> "'"'W.Va. Code, 49-6-2(c) [1980], requires the State Department of Welfare [now the Department of Health and Human Resources], in a child abuse or neglect case, to prove "conditions existing at the time of the filing of the petition . . . by clear and convincing proof." The statute, however, does not specify any particular manner or mode of testimony or evidence by which the State Department of Welfare is obligated to meet this burden.' Syllabus Point 1, In Interest of S.C., 168 W.Va.

> 366, 284 S.E.2d 867 (1981)." Syllabus Point 1, West Virginia Department of Human Services v. Peggy F., 184 W.Va. 60, 399 S.E.2d 460 (1990).' Syllabus Point 1, In re Beth, 192 W.Va. 656, 453 S.E.2d 639 (1994)." Syl. Pt. 3, In re Christina L., 194 W.Va. 446, 460 S.E.2d 692 (1995).

Syl. Pt. 3, In re F.S., 233 W.Va. 538, 759 S.E.2d 769 (2014). Sexual abuse may be proven solely with the victim's testimony, even if that testimony is uncorroborated. Syl. Pt. 5, State v. Beck, 167 W.Va. 830, 286 S.E.2d 234 (1981).[12]

1. The Respondent Stepfather R.C.

Although the circuit court found that K.P. gave consistent statements regarding the sexual abuse, the court nonetheless found reasons to question K.P.'s veracity. Our review of the entire record leaves us with the definite and firm conviction that those reasons were unfounded. See Tiffany Marie S., 196 W.Va. at 225-26, 470 S.E.2d at 179-80, syl. pt. 1 (explaining that finding of fact is clearly erroneous when, although there is evidence to support it, reviewing court on entire evidence is left with definite and firm conviction mistake was committed). The lack of testimony from R.C. further highlights the questionable grounds upon which the circuit court based its decision to disregard K.P.'s assertions.

[12]Beck was a criminal case requiring proof beyond a reasonable doubt, which is a higher burden of proof than the clear and convincing standard applicable to abuse and neglect cases.

First, the circuit court found that K.P.'s strained relationship with her mother and strong desire to live with her father provided an "alternate explanation" for the allegations of abuse. The DHHR and GAL dispute that K.P. would fabricate these allegations so she could move out of her mother's home. During the interview with Dr. Bean, K.P. explained her understanding that as soon as she turned fourteen years old, she could choose the parent with whom she would reside. Her father, R.P., confirmed that this was also his understanding and that he and K.P. had discussed it. When K.P. disclosed the sexual abuse, her fourteenth birthday was just seven weeks away. The petitioners argue that K.P. would have no reason to fabricate the allegations so close in time to when she thought she could elect where to live. Moreover, K.P. acknowledged the seriousness of the allegations, and there was evidence that she and her stepfather otherwise got along well. The petitioners assert that K.P.'s credibility is supported by the manner in which she disclosed the sexual abuse without embellishing or dramatizing the nature of what occurred.

Second, the circuit court found an inconsistency in K.P.'s reports regarding the frequency of the abuse she alleged had occurred throughout the year leading up to July 1, 2013. The circuit court made this finding despite having previously ruled, when quashing a subpoena for K.P.'s testimony, that her statements were all consistent. According to the circuit court, the inconsistency was that K.P. told CPS Worker Miller that the abuse occurred

"every other day for a year"; she told Dr. Bean that it occurred "at least a couple times a week" for a year; and she told Dr. Miller that it occurred "around fifty times."

Contrary to the circuit court's ruling, we observe that K.P.'s statements concerning the frequency of the prior abuse are not appreciably different. For instance, "every other day" is analogous to a "couple times a week," particularly to a young person. Moreover, a review of the record shows that K.P.'s statements about the frequency of the prior occurrences were not as specific as the circuit court's findings suggest. In her videotaped interview with CPS Worker Miller, K.P. said the abuse occurred, "I don't know, like every other" night. In her videotaped interview with Dr. Miller, she said that "some weeks" the abuse occurred "like two times," while other weeks it did not happen at all. In fact, it was Dr. Miller who suggested the number fifty to her, and she agreed that it was "probably something like" fifty times and "maybe" fifty times. Importantly, K.P. never claimed to be able to state the exact number of prior occurrences.[13] K.P.'s inability to be more specific is readily attributable to the frequency of the conduct, that the conduct occurred throughout an entire year, and because the conduct escalated over time.[14]

[13]Dr. Miller was apparently not troubled by this alleged inconsistency. At the adjudicatory hearing, he was asked, "You talked about inconsistencies and consistencies. She has stated that this sexual abuse occurred about every other day. She told you about 50 times. That would – that's not consistent; is it?" Dr. Miller responded, "It's not inconsistent – [that] doesn't necessarily bother me. . . ."

[14]During the videotaped interview, K.P. told Dr. Miller that her stepfather's conduct throughout the preceding year was not the same, rather, "it kinda got more touchy

Third, although the circuit court found that the remainder of K.P.'s information was consistent across the several interviews, the court described her allegations as "very simple" and lacking witnesses or corroborating evidence. In a subsequent order denying a motion to stay, the circuit court elaborated on what it meant by "very simple" by comparing K.P.'s report to that of the child victim in In re F.S., 233 W.Va. 538, 759 S.E.2d 769 (2014). The victim in F.S. provided vivid accounts of sexual molestation, complete with "distinct graphic sensory details" about her abuser's ejaculations. Id. at 545-46, 759 S.E.2d at 776-77. The circuit court found that the account in F.S. was "a far cry from the account of abuse presented in this case, an account one examining psychiatrist [Dr. Miller] described as 'very simple.'"

The circuit court's reasoning about the "simple" nature of K.P.'s allegations is wholly unfounded. Not all sexual abuse of children involves the same type or degree of wrongful conduct. Fortunately, K.P. was not subjected to penetration or ejaculation, as was the child in F.S. Just because K.P. did not report being subjected to more graphic forms of sexual abuse, does not mean she fabricated the report of her stepfather fondling her and seeking oral sexual gratification.

throughout." She said that the first couple of times, R.C. just touched her back, but subsequently he touched her "butt" and other areas. She had not realized the initial occurrences were meant to be sexual. Other times, he rubbed her vaginal area, which she did realize was sexual, but she was afraid to tell anyone.

A review of the testimony of the individuals who interviewed K.P., and of the video recordings in the appendix record, confirms the circuit court's finding that K.P. was consistent in describing the abusive conduct. Even when the respondents' expert Dr. Miller challenged her, K.P. did not change her report.[15] Moreover, while K.P.'s report of the sexual abuse on July 1, 2013, was not particularly graphic in nature, it was detailed. She described exactly where she was and what she was doing when her stepfather began touching her; described where he touched her; and repeated what he said to her. K.P. also provided a detailed recounting of what both R.C. and A.C. said when trying to convince her not to reveal the misconduct. R.C. rebutted none of K.P.'s statements. Moreover, it is evident that [15]For example, Dr. Miller raised the issue of K.P. texting private photographs to an online boyfriend. She admitted having done so, and that it was a mistake. Dr. Miller asked her,

> Like you said, you know, you weren't thinking and you'll never do it again. What if [R.C.] just does the same thing? [He] wasn't thinking and will never do it again . . . Why can't we just leave it at that? It's good enough for you, it should be good enough for him. Know what I'm saying? I mean we all make mistakes. You made some mistakes. Nobody can have the best judgment all the time. Nobody really got hurt. I mean what you did didn't, nobody died. So why can't he just have the benefit of this, he made a mistake and he wasn't thinking and he won't do it again?

Later, Dr. Miller said "it's really not so much about [your stepfather], it's really about your mom?" When K.P. tried to explain that it was about both of them, Dr. Miller insisted that it could not be about both of them. Despite these challenges, K.P. did not back down from her report of abuse.

something occurred on July 1, 2013, to cause R.C. to telephone his wife and volunteer that he had not inappropriately touched the child.

Although K.P. does not exhibit any indications of psychological trauma, Dr. Bean explained that not all victimized children do.[16] Finally, the absence of witnesses to the abuse is not a basis to disbelieve K.P. It is axiomatic that most sexual abuse of children is not committed in front of an audience.

In considering the evidence in the case at bar, we are assisted by our discussion in F.S. about the measure of proof necessary to prove civil abuse and neglect:

> This is a classic case of the inability of a trial court to ascertain, with complete certainty, the truth of the allegations of abuse. As indicated by the circuit court's adjudicatory order, one could quite effortlessly compile an inventory of doubts and skepticism based upon the evidence presented. The evidence is simply not crystal clear, beyond all doubt. However, that is not the standard to be employed in an abuse and neglect case. In reviewing the entirety of the evidence, this Court must adhere to the appellate standard of review . . . according significant weight to the circuit court's credibility determinations while refusing to [16]Dr. Miller testified that K.P.'s lack of a psychological diagnosis and symptoms is "clinically difficult to understand." He testified, "in my experience an individual who has been profoundly, persistently, systematically and severely abused for over a decade is not an individual [who] would be asymptomatic." However, neither the DHHR nor K.P. claimed that the abuse was as severe as what Dr. Miller insinuated in this testimony. Moreover, K.P. did not reside with A.C. and R.C. for all of the prior decade, having lived with her grandmother for several years.

> abdicate our responsibility to evaluate the evidence and determine whether an error has been committed.
> It is imperative to note that the evidence in an abuse and neglect case does not have to satisfy the stringent standard of beyond a reasonable doubt; the evidence must establish abuse by clear and convincing evidence. This Court has explained that "'clear and convincing' is the measure or degree of proof that will produce in the mind of the factfinder a firm belief or conviction as to the allegations sought to be established." Brown v. Gobble, 196 W.Va. 559, 564, 474 S.E.2d 489, 494 (1996) (internal citations omitted). We have also stated that the clear and convincing standard is "intermediate, being more than a mere preponderance, but not to the extent of such certainty as is required beyond a reasonable doubt as in criminal cases." Cramer v. W.Va. Dept. of Highways, 180 W.Va. 97, 99 n. 1, 375 S.E.2d 568, 570 n. 1 (1988); see also Colorado v. New Mexico, 467 U.S. 310, 316, 104 S.Ct. 2433, 81 L.Ed.2d 247 (1984) (holding that party with burden of persuasion may prevail only if he can "place in the ultimate factfinder an abiding conviction that the truth of [his] factual contentions are 'highly probable.'").

F.S., 233 W.Va. at 546, 789 S.E.2d at 777. The same considerations are present in the instant case. Although the circuit court may have viewed the evidence as less than certain, the DHHR did not need to meet the higher standard of a criminal case. All that was required was clear and convincing evidence.

After carefully considering the evidence in the entire record, and taking into account R.C.'s silence in the face of these serious allegations, we conclude that the circuit court erred in finding a lack of clear and convincing evidence that R.C. sexually abused his stepdaughter. Accordingly, we find that the circuit court erred by not adjudicating K.P. as an abused child and R.C. as an abusing parent. See W.Va. Code §§ 49-1-3, 49-6-2(c).[17]

2. The Respondent Mother A.C.

Turning to the allegations against A.C., the DHHR asserted she failed to protect K.P. and engaged in emotional abuse of K.P. There is no evidence that A.C. knew, or had sufficient facts to know, of the sexual abuse before K.P. disclosed it. As such, A.C. should not be adjudicated as abusive for a failure to protect her daughter from sexual abuse in the time period before the disclosure was made.[18] The circuit court erred, however, in failing to recognize that A.C.'s actions after the disclosure constituted emotional abuse of K.P. West Virginia Code § 49-1-3 defines "abused child" to include a child whose health

[17]West Virginia Code § 49-1-3(1) provides, in relevant part, that

> "Abused child" means a child whose health or welfare is harmed or threatened by:
> (A) A parent, guardian or custodian who knowingly or intentionally inflicts, attempts to inflict or knowingly allows another person to inflict, physical injury or mental or emotional injury, upon the child or another child in the home; [or]
> (B) Sexual abuse or sexual exploitation[.]

[18]See Doris S., 197 W.Va. at 492, 465 S.E.2d at 868, syl. pts. 3, 4, and 7 (explaining that statutory definition of "abused child" includes child whose parent, guardian, or custodian "knowingly" allows another person to commit abuse, and "knowingly" means having sufficient facts from which to recognize that abuse occurred.).

or welfare is harmed or threatened by a parent who "inflicts [or] attempts to inflict . . . mental or emotional injury, upon the child[.]"[19]

Once K.P. revealed the allegations of sexual abuse, A.C. undertook a course of action directed at preventing K.P. from reporting the abuse to the authorities. Even before talking to her daughter about the allegations, A.C. claimed that R.C. had only rubbed the child's shoulders. Then, during the discussion in the car at the gas station, A.C. tried to persuade K.P. to keep quiet by pretending to cry, by threatening that the allegations would ruin R.C.'s life and hurt A.C.'s job, and by saying that sexual molestation is something that the victim "must live with in shame." Moreover, at the sheriff's office, A.C. asked if lie detector tests could be administered and disclosed to the detective that K.P. had texted pictures of herself to an online boyfriend. A.C. engaged in intimidation and psychological tactics in an effort to procure her daughter's silence. In short, when issues arose regarding the safety and well-being of her daughter, A.C. chose to protect her husband instead of her daughter–a position she has maintained throughout these proceedings.

The post-disclosure conduct of a parent, guardian, or custodian may constitute abuse and neglect. See Doris S., 197 W.Va. at 492, 475 S.E.2d at 868, syl. pt. 1 (stating that statutory definition of "abused child" implicitly includes child whose health or welfare is harmed or threatened by parent who fails to cooperate in identifying perpetrator of abuse). Moreover, we have recognized that > [i]n order to remedy the abuse and/or neglect problem, the problem must first be acknowledged. Failure to acknowledge the existence of the problem, i.e., the truth of the basic allegation pertaining to the alleged abuse and neglect or the perpetrator of said abuse and neglect, results in making the problem untreatable and in making an improvement period an exercise in futility at the child's expense.

In re Charity H., 215 W.Va. 208, 217, 599 S.E.2d 631, 640 (2004) (quoting Doris S., 197 W.Va. at 498, 475 S.E.2d at 874).

Such issues were recently addressed in In re K.C., No. 14-0493, 2014 WL 6634520 (W.Va. Supreme Court, Nov. 24, 2014) (memorandum decision). In K.C., a mother adamantly denied the allegations of sexual abuse that her daughter made against the mother's boyfriend. For approximately one and one-half years after the disclosure, the mother did not support her daughter, failed to believe the disclosure, and did nothing to assist the State in investigating or developing a case against the child's abuser. Id. at *3. The mother's conduct led a therapist to conclude that there was an irreparable break in the relationship between the mother and child. Id. Ultimately, we affirmed the circuit court's conclusion that the mother's conduct was also abusive.

In addition, the testimony of K.P.'s father, R.P., corroborated that A.C. called their daughter vulgar and hurtful names and obsessed about what the child ate. Moreover, A.C. admitting smacking K.P. in the mouth a few months earlier. The circuit court concluded that the name-calling and the physical striking, even if true, were isolated events that did not rise to the level of parental abuse and neglect. Furthermore, the circuit court found no evidence that K.P. was denied necessary food, noting that one parent's "obsession" can be another parent's "balanced diet." If we were to view this conduct in a vacuum, we might agree with the circuit court. However, when considering the entire record, including A.C.'s behavior when her daughter revealed the sexual abuse, A.C.'s prior conduct constitutes further evidence that she emotionally abused K.P.

Accordingly, we conclude that the circuit court erred in finding a lack of clear and convincing evidence that A.C. emotionally abused K.P. and, therefore, erred by failing to adjudicate A.C. as an abusing parent. See W.Va. Code §§ 49-1-3, 49-6-2(c).

3. I.C.-1, G.C., and I.C.-2

There are no allegations that R.C. or A.C. directly abused the other three children in the home, all of whom are R.C.'s biological children. However, West Virginia

Code § 49-1-3(1)(A) defines "abused child" to include "another child in the home" and "a child whose health or welfare is harmed or threatened[.]"[20] We have held that

> [w]here there is clear and convincing evidence that a child has suffered physical and/or sexual abuse while in the custody of his or her parent(s), guardian, or custodian, another child residing in the home when the abuse took place who is not a direct victim of the physical and/or sexual abuse but is at risk of being abused is an abused child under W.Va. Code, 49-1-3(a) (1994).

Syl. Pt. 2, In re Christina L., 194 W.Va. 446, 460 S.E.2d 692 (1995). Because the respondents are abusing parents with regard to K.P., the health and welfare of the other children in the home is also at risk. Accordingly, the circuit court erred by refusing to adjudicate I.C.-1, G.C., and I.C.-2 as abused children.

IV. Conclusion

For the reasons set forth above, the circuit court erred when failing to adjudicate R.C. and A.C. as abusing parents and K.P., I.C.-1, G.C., and I.C.-2 as abused children. Therefore, we reverse the circuit court's September 3, 2014, order and remand this case to the circuit court for entry of adjudication orders consistent with this opinion, and for post-adjudication proceedings and disposition.[21]

Per Curiam:

This case is before this Court upon appeal of a September 24, 2009, order of the Circuit Court of Raleigh County which granted a six-month post-adjudicatory improvement period to the appellees and respondents below, Samantha and Christopher C.[1] In this appeal, the appellant and petitioner below, the West Virginia Department of Health and Human Resources (hereinafter "DHHR"), contends that the circuit court erred by granting the improvement period because neither parent has identified who abused their son, Ryan C., nor even admitted that he was abused, despite uncontroverted medical evidence to the contrary.

This Court has before it the petition for appeal and the entire record.[2] For the reasons set forth below, the order of the circuit court is reversed, and this case is remanded to the circuit court with directions to terminate the post-adjudicatory improvement period and hold a disposition hearing immediately.
